

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. THE SOUTHEASTERN REPORTER VOLUME 75

(138 Ga. 173)

DUKE v. HUFFMAN et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 16, 1912.)

1. DEEDS (§ 132*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CONVEYED.

Where a man conveyed property to his daughter for life, with remainder "to her children, or the representatives of children, living at the time of her death, and if she shall die without children, or the representatives of children, then living, said property is conveyed to her brother or brothers, and their children surviving," and where at the time of the making of the deed the grantor had two sons, both of whom died before the death of the life tenant, but each left children who survived her, upon her death without leaving children or representatives of children the children of her deceased brothers took the property per capita; there being nothing in the deed to indicate a different intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 366, 367, 372, 373; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. DEEDS (§ 132*)—CONSTRUCTION—PARTIES—"SURVIVING."

In a deed to the grantor's daughter for life, with remainder to her children or their representatives living at her death, or if she should die without children then to her brother or brothers and their children surviving, the word "surviving" refers to surviving the life tenant, and not surviving their respective parents.

Error from Superior Court, Jones County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Action by Mattie Huffman and others against N. L. Duke. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mattie Huffman and others filed their petition for partition of certain real estate, naming Mrs. Nannie L. Duke as defendant. The case was submitted to the presiding judge on an agreed statement of facts, in substance as follows: In 1872, Thad G. Holt, Sr., executed a "deed of conveyance to my wife, Nancy, and to my daughter, Ellen, to the property hereinafter described, on the considerations and with the reservations and conditions and limitations herein set forth." It recited a consideration of love and affection for his wife and daughter and a desire to save them the expense, trouble, and annoyance of administering on his estate after his death. It conveyed to his wife a house and lot where he resided, a farm containing 1,300 acres, another lot containing 90 acres, and certain personalty. It declared: "The above property is conveyed to and shall be for the sole and separate use of my said wife, Nancy, for and during her natural life, with the power of disposition by gift or will, to either or all of our children, in such proportions as she may deem proper." He conveyed to his daughter a plantation containing 600 acres and certain shares of stock. The deed then contained the following: "This property is conveyed to my daughter, deed shall be held for her sole and separate use for and during her natural life, and after death, to her children, or the representatives of children, living at the time of her death, and if she shall die without children, or the representatives of children, then living, said property is conveyed to her brother or brothers, and their children surviving. So likewise if my wife shall die without having disposed, by gift or will, of the property conveyed to her, the same is hereby conveyed to our children and the representatives of our children, in equal parts, then living." The grantor reserved to himself a use for life and a right to change the investment, if he should deem it best. Finally he constituted himself trustee for his wife and daughter. At the time of the making of the deed, the grantor had living his daughter, Ellen, and two sons, Allen and Thad, Jr. They died during the lifetime of the daughter. Allen left six children, who are still living. Thad Jr., left one child, now Mrs. Nannie L. Duke. When the deed was executed, Allen had two children. Four others were born to him thereafter. Nannie L. Duke was living when the deed was made. The grantor's daughter Ellen, died without children or representatives of children. The presiding judge held that the children of the deceased brothers of the grantor's daughter took per capita and not per stirpes, and that the land should be sold and the proceeds distributed accordingly. Mrs. Duke excepted.

Johnson & Johnson, of Gray, for plaintiff in error. West & Dasher, of Macon, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] A man made a deed, by one clause of which he conveyed certain property to his daughter for life, and after her death, to her children, or the representatives of children, living at the time of her death; "and if she shall die without children, or representatives of children, then living, said property is conveyed to her brother or brothers, and their children surviving." The daughter died without leaving children or representatives of children. Her two brothers died before she died. One of them left six children; the other left one child. All of them are still in life. The question is whether, under the deed, they took the property per stirpes or per capita. In 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 727, it is declared that: "Under a gift to 'children and grandchildren,' or to A. and the children of B., or to the children of several persons, whether it be to the children of A. and B., or to the children of A. and the children of B., or to A. and B. and their children, or to a class and their children, all take per capita in the absence of an intention to the contrary on the face of the will." This is quoted, as correctly stating the general rule, in Almand v. Whitaker, 113 Ga. 889, 890, 39 S. E. 295, though it is added that the presumption in favor of the per capita distribution yields readily in favor of any indication of a contrary intent. It was held that a will which gave property to named "children" of A., to named "heirs" of B., and to C., with provision for an "equal division," fell within such general rule, and, in the absence of anything to indicate a contrary intention on the part of the testator, gave the property to the beneficiaries per capita and not per stirpes. See, also, 2 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed., by Sweet and Sanger) 1711 et seq.

It would be unprofitable to discuss the numerous cases which have dealt with the question of whether a deed or will contemplated a distribution per capita or per stirpes. It will be found that often there was some peculiarity in the language or context which showed the intention of the grantor or testator, or that words of a different import from those employed in the deed now under consideration were used. The decision in MacLean v. Williams, 116 Ga. 257, 42 S. E. 485, 59 L. R. A. 125, was cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error as controlling in the present case. There the testatrix directed that two-thirds of the residue of her estate should "be distributed in equal shares to such persons in life at the time of my decease who would then be the heirs at law of my deceased husband had he survived me, and that the other one-third be distributed in equal shares to my own heirs at law then in life." It was held that the distribution provided for among the heirs at law of the testatrix should be per stirpes and not per capita. There are two lines of authority where the word "heirs" is employed. One class of decisions holds that, as it is necessary to look to the statute of distributions in order to ascertain who are the heirs, in the absence of any words indicating a contrary intention, the law presumes the intention to be that they take as heirs would by the rules of descent. Some decisions hold that the use of such words as "in equal shares" will not alone suffice to control this presumption. Other authorities hold that, when the objects of a grantor's or testator's bounty have been determined by referring to the statute of distributions, the method of division is not to be determined with reference to that statute, but by the terms of the will itself. But decisions dealing with gifts to heirs have no application to the present case; nor are cases applicable, in which the words indicate a purpose to substitute certain persons or a certain class of persons in lieu of an ancestor, should he die before the time of distribution arrives, or when he was dead when the deed or will was made.

[2] In the deed before us, in case of the death of the grantor's daughter without leaving children or the representatives of children, the property was conveyed "to her brother or brothers, and their children surviving." It was contended that the word "surviving" meant children surviving their respective parents. We think that the word "surviving" refers to surviving the life tenant. This construction is more in accord with the spirit of the Civil Code 1910, § 3680. The daughter of the testator having died without leaving children, or representatives of children, this conveyance stood as one to her brother or brothers, and their children surviving her. A conveyance to a person, whether designated by name or description, and his children, creates a tenancy in common; so likewise of a conveyance to two persons and their children. Suppose that both of the brothers of the grantor's daughter had survived her; the conveyance would have been to them and their children surviving. This would have created a tenancy in common; each taking per capita. Had one brother survived, the conveyance would have been to him "and their children surviving," not the children of the deceased brother alone. In that event, there would have been a tenancy in common between the surviving brother and the surviving children of both brothers. As both brothers died before the death of the grantor's daughter, the conveyance was to "their children surviving." This, under the general rule above stated, conveyed the property to the children of both brothers per capita, and not per stirpes, unless there is something in the deed to show a contrary intent.

It was urged that a general testamentary scheme of substitution or representation appeared, and that this was applicable to the children of the brothers of the life tenant, though the language used in regard to them was different from that employed elsewhere in the deed. In this view we cannot concur. Throughout the deed the grantor dealt with his sons and their children in a different manner from that employed in regard to his wife and daughter. He gave the sons nothing absolutely. He gave to his wife a considerable amount of land and personal property, for life, and empowered her to make a disposition thereof, by gift or will, to either or all of the children of herself and the grantor, in such proportions as she might deem proper. Thus she could discriminate among the children, or exclude one or more of them. It was provided that, if she should die without having exercised such power, the property conveyed to her "is hereby conveyed to our children, and the representatives of our children, in equal parts, then living." The word "representatives" was evidently not used as meaning administrators or executors, but those taking by representation or succession under deceased children, and persons who would stand in their stead. The grantor conveyed land and personalty to his daughter for life, and in that connection also provided for a remainder "to her children, or the representatives of children, living at the time of her death," and with a limitation over if she should die "without children, or the representatives of children, then living." The language thus employed shows that the grantor used words of representation wherever he intended for the descendants of a deceased child to stand instead of their parent and take per stirpes. But when he came to deal with the sons and their children, he abandoned this method of expression, and provided that, if his daughter should die without leaving children or representatives of children, "said property is conveyed to her brother or brothers, and their children surviving." Upon the happening of the contingency thus contemplated, the conveyance operated as one to the children of the grantor's sons; both sons being dead, and all their children surviving. A conveyance to the children of the grantor's two sons, with nothing to indicate a contrary intent, conveyed the property to them per capita.

It was contended that the use of the words "so likewise," in dealing with the contingency that the grantor's wife might die without exercising the power of disposition conferred upon her, showed an intent that the words of representation should apply to the clause of the deed now being considered. But the use of the words of representation in one case and not in the other tends to negative the idea that the grantor intended to make similar provisions in the two cases.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

HELMKEN v. FLOOD et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 16, 1912.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 261*) — REMEDIES OF CREDITORS—PLEADING.

An equitable petition filed against a tenant, who is alleged to have vacated the leased premises after fraudulently conveying "all of the personal property" and "all of her real estate" to certain near relatives of the tenant for the purpose of preventing the collection of the rent out of the property so transferred, is not demurrable because the "insolvency" of the tenant is not alleged in terms by the use of the words "insolvent," or "insolvency."

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 221*)—ACTIONS FOR RENT—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT — DEMAND.

Where a contract of lease has been breached by the tenant because of nonpayment of rent and abandonment of the leased premises, and no provision is made in the lease contract for a demand to be made on the tenant for the rent before an action can be brought for its recovery, it is not necessary to make such demand prior to the filing of such suit.

3. ACTION (§ 46*)—JOINDER OF CAUSES—LEGAL AND EQUITABLE CAUSES.

Since the uniform procedure act of 1887, a landlord may proceed in one action to obtain a judgment for rent alleged to be due, and for the equitable relief of having canceled conveyances fraudulently made for the purpose of defeating the collection of such rent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 449-468; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Mary Helmken against Mrs. Ellen M. Flood and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Oliver & Oliver, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. D. C. Barrow, of Savannah, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. Mrs. Mary Helmken filed her equitable petition against Mrs. Ellen M. Flood, Mrs. Lavina Flood, and Mrs. Ellen M. Flood, as trustee for Margaret Flood, alleging that Mrs. Ellen M. Flood was indebted to her in the sum of $610 for rent, by virtue of a certain lease contract, a copy of which was attached to the petition. It was also alleged that, in order to conceal her property and to remove it beyond reach of petitioner's claim for rent, Ellen M. Flood made two fraudulent conveyances, one to her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Lavina Flood, conveying to her all of the grantor's personal property, and the other to herself as trustee for her 12 year old daughter, Margaret Flood, conveying all of the grantor's real estate, with the stipulation that, upon the latter becoming of age, or marrying, the property should revert to the said Ellen M. Flood. A consideration of $100 was alleged in the case of the personal property, and "love and affection and one dollar" as the consideration for the deed to the real estate. It was alleged that there was no real consideration in either case, and that the title to the property was still in the debtor. Knowledge of the fraudulent intent was alleged in the transferees of the real and personal property, who were made parties to the suit. The petition prayed judgment in the sum of $610 for rent, and also the cancellation of the alleged fraudulent conveyances in order to subject the property to the payment of the debt, if found due. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was sustained by the court, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] Did the petition set forth a cause of action? It is insisted by the defendants in error that it does not, for the reasons: (a) That there is no allegation in the petition that Ellen M. Flood, against whom judgment was prayed, was insolvent. (b) That there is no allegation that demand was ever made upon Mrs. Ellen M. Flood for payment of the sum claimed, and that she refused to pay the rent due.

While it is true that no allegation of insolvency on the part of the debtor was alleged in so many words, it is alleged that the debtor fraudulently conveyed all of her personal property to her daughter-in-law, and all of her real estate to herself as trustee for her daughter. If these allegations are true (and the demurrer admits them to be true), it is difficult to perceive how a person without real or personal property could be solvent, or otherwise than insolvent, and how a debtor could be made to respond to a judgment against her for her debts. Insolvency is "the condition of a person who is insolvent, or unable to pay his debts." 2 Blackstone, 285, 471; Bouvier's Law Dict. title "Insolvent." We think the allegations of the petition were equivalent to an allegation in terms that the debtor was insolvent.

[2] B. Our law declares that "no demand is necessary to the commencement of an action except in such cases as the law of the contract prescribes." Civil Code 1910, § 5512. The law does not provide for a demand in the case of rent. And the contract in this case does not prescribe for any demand before an action shall be commenced for the collection of rent. But it is insisted that a demand in this case is necessary, for the reason that Mrs. Flood, the debtor, could not know what was the amount of her indebtedness for rent due Mrs. Helmken, because the debtor could not know whether the premises had been re-leased and rent collected therefor. It is hardly conceivable that a tenant who had rented certain premises at a specified sum for a term of years did not know the amount of rent due her landlord, or could not ascertain the amount due upon the slightest inquiry, especially if any disposition to pay the same was manifested. At any rate, we know of no law in a case like this which requires a demand to be made before suit is brought.

[3] Counsel for the defendant in error cite, among other authorities, Civil Code 1910, § 5495, which is as follows: "Creditors without a lien cannot, as a general rule, enjoin their debtors from disposing of property, nor obtain injunction or other extraordinary relief in equity." In the case of Booth v. Mohr, 122 Ga. 333, 50 S. E. 173, it was held: "Since the uniform procedure act of 1887 (Civil Code 1895, § 4937), creditors in one action may attack a sale made by their common debtor, as fraudulent, and obtain judgment against the debtor for their several demands." See, to the same effect, the cases of De Lacy v. Hurst, 83 Ga. 223, 9 S. E. 1052; Stillwell v. Savannah Grocery Co., 88 Ga. 144, 13 S. E. 963. Since the uniform procedure act of 1887, and the decisions of this court construing that act, it seems well settled that one who has legal and equitable rights may proceed in one suit to seek both legal and equitable relief. The present is such a case, and we think the petition set forth a legal and equitable cause for relief, and should not, therefore, have been dismissed on demurrer.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ZACHRY et al. v. MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF TOWN OF HARLEM et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 16, 1912.)

1. STATUTES (§ 64*)—REQUISITES AND VALIDITY—EFFECT OF PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

A portion of a statute held to be unconstitutional cannot operate to ingraft by implication into the valid part thereof a grant of power to exercise the right of eminent domain, not conferred by the latter standing alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 58-66, 195; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 9*)—EXTENT OF POWER—MUNICIPAL CHARTER.

A power in a municipal charter "to lay off, to open and lay out such new streets in said town as the public interest may require," without any express authority being given to take private property for such purposes, or any provisions which would imply the grant of a power of condemnation, gives to the municipality no right to condemn private property for the purpose of opening a new street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 27-34; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Error from Superior Court, Columbia County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by J. J. Zachry and others against the Mayor and Council of Town of Harlem and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Hamilton Phinzy, of Augusta, for plaintiffs in error. Jno. T. West, of Thomson, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. The municipal authorities of the town of Harlem sought to condemn a strip of land through the property of Zachry and others (hereinafter called the plaintiffs) for the establishment of a new street, and the latter petitioned to enjoin against the proceedings. Upon the hearing, the court refused an interlocutory injunction, and the plaintiffs excepted. The town of Harlem claimed that the right to condemn was conferred by its charter, approved August 6, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 797). The sole question at issue, as conceded by counsel for the defendants in error, is whether the municipality has authority under this charter to condemn property for the purpose of opening up a new street. In section 7 the power is given "to lay off, to open and lay out such new streets in said town as the public interest may require; to widen and straighten or otherwise change the streets, lanes, alleys, or sidewalks in said town." Section 32 provides: "And whenever the mayor and council shall exercise the power to lay out and open, to widen, straighten or otherwise change the streets and alleys in said town given by this act, they shall appoint two freeholders, and the owner or owners of the lots fronting on said streets or alleys shall, on five days' notice, appoint two freeholders, who shall proceed to assess the damage sustained or the advantage derived by the owner or owners of said lots in consequence of the opening, widening, straightening, or otherwise changing said streets and alleys." This language is followed by provisions for the appointment of an umpire in case the assessors cannot agree; for an appeal by either party from their award; and for the enforcement by execution of the final award in cases where it is against the lot owner. Upon the foregoing provisions of the charter depends the right of the municipality to condemn property for the purposes named. It is contended on behalf of the town that, even though section 32 be held to be invalid, the general powers given it by section 7, which have been quoted above, by necessary implication confer upon it the power of condemnation. And it is further insisted that although section 32 be invalid as a method of procedure, it is so far operative as to aid in construing the powers intended to be conferred by section 7, and that, so applied, it is clearly shown that in section 7 the Legislature impliedly gave the town the right to condemn land for the purpose of opening a new street. We consider first the contention last stated.

[1] Section 32 must be held to be invalid. At the time it was enacted in 1906, there was in existence the general law of 1894 (now embodied in Civil Code 1910, §§ 5206-5246), providing a uniform method of procedure to be used by all persons or corporations when taking or damaging private property for public uses. Section 32 is an attempt to enact a special law on the same subject, and is repugnant to article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia. Civil Code 1910, § 6391. Can this invalid section of the charter aid in the construction of what power the Legislature intended to confer on the municipality by granting it authority to open new streets, etc., in section 7, and add to the powers there enumerated an implied right to condemn property? In Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) pp. 259, 260, it is said: "When a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never been. Rights cannot be built up under it; it constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it, and no one can be punished for having refused obedience to it before the decision was made. And what is true of an act void in toto is true also as to any part of an act which is found to be unconstitutional, and which, consequently, is to be regarded as having never been at any time possessed of any legal force." Certainly to incorporate into the legal portion of a statute a power derived by implication from an invalid portion thereof would be to give legal force and effect to the latter. Whether the illegal part can be used for any purpose of construction (for instance, to resolve an ambiguity and to make clear an intent already existing in the legal part of the statute but imperfectly expressed) is not in question and need not be considered. Here it is sought to give additional meaning and effect, by implication, to words in the valid part which do not of themselves carry evidence of the intent sought to be supplied. In State v. Insurance Co. of North America, 71 Neb. 320, 99 N. W. 36, 100 N. W. 405, 102 N. W. 1022, 106 N. W. 767, it was held: "Where a part of an act is unconstitutional, because contravening some provisions of the fundamental law, the language found in the invalid portion of the act can have no legal force or effect for any purpose whatever." In that case it was also specifically ruled that the portion of the act held to be invalid could not by implication operate to repeal an existing act, or any portion thereof. And see Green v. Hutchinson, 128 Ga. 379 (2), 57 S. E. 353. We are of the opinion that the language in section 32 cannot operate to confer any grant of authority to condemn land for the purpose of opening a street, by reading an implication from that section into the construction of the powers conferred by section 7 on the town of Harlem.

[2] Stripping the charter of this invalid section, the present case is controlled by the decisions in Brunswick, etc., R. Co. v. Waycross, 94 Ga. 102, 21 S. E. 145, and Georgia Railroad Co. v. Union Point, 119 Ga. 809, 47 S. E. 183. These authorities hold, in effect, that the grant to a municipality of the power to lay out, open, widen, straighten, or otherwise change streets in the city, without any express grant of the power of condemnation, or provisions in the charter from which an intent to grant this power is necessarily implied, contemplates the acquisition of the property necessary for such purposes by contract, and there is no authority to take it by condemnation proceedings. And this principle is recognized in Stone v. Newborn, 127 Ga. 422, 56 S. E. 516; Georgia Railroad v. Decatur, 129 Ga. 505, 59 S. E. 217. The only case in seeming conflict with the foregoing is that of Trustees of Atlanta University v. Atlanta, 93 Ga. 468, 21 S. E. 74. This apparent conflict arises from the fact that the holding is broadly stated in the first headnote, to the effect that, under a grant of power to the city of Atlanta, "to open, lay out, widen, straighten, or to otherwise change streets, alleys, and squares in said city," the corporate authorities may condemn property for public use. But in the opinion (at pages 476 and 477 of 93 Ga., at page 75 of 21 S. E.) it is made to appear that section 60 of the charter, in which the words above quoted appear, contained also the provision that, "whenever the said mayor and general council shall exercise the power above delegated," they shall proceed in a named manner to assess damages, etc. This was prior to the general law of 1894, hereinbefore referred to, and the constitutionality of such provisions was not in question. And, continuing, the court said: "Subsequent amendments of the charter, while they vary somewhat the details of the procedure, do not restrict the power of condemnation itself." One of these amendments, approved December 24, 1886 (Acts 1886, p. 239, § 4), made provision that, "whenever it is proposed that any property be taken for public use," it should be optional with the city to decline to take it if the price fixed, or the award made, was deemed by the general counsel to be unreasonable. And another amendment, approved December 27, 1890 (Acts 1890-91, vol. 2, p. 446), changing the method of arriving at an award when the city shall desire or may be taking steps to open streets, etc., had the following title: "An act to amend 'an act establishing a new charter for the city of Atlanta,' approved February 28, 1874, and the several acts amendatory thereto, so as to provide for a more perfect method of condemning private property for opening or widening streets, lanes, and alleys in said city, and for other purposes." From the foregoing it will appear that the decision in Trustees v. Atlanta, supra, was made when construing a general power to open, lay out, etc., streets, considered in connection with additional charter provisions which indicated that it was intended to give the municipality the right to exercise the powers granted, by compelling the property owner to part with his land when needed by the municipality; and the decision was not founded solely on the charter provisions quoted in the first head-note. Whenever the question has depended upon whether a general charter power to lay out, open, widen, or change municipal highways, standing alone, by implication gave the municipality the right to condemn property for such purposes, the decisions have uniformly adhered to the doctrine that such naked powers conferred no such right, but contemplated the acquirement by contract of whatever property was needed for the purposes referred to. As we have pointed out above, the charter of the town of Harlem, with respect to the powers in reference to streets conferred upon it by section 7, must be construed as though the invalid provisions of section 32 had never been enacted, and so construed with that section stricken does not confer on that municipality any power to condemn private property for the purposes of opening a new street.

The court below erred in refusing to grant the plaintiffs the injunction for which they prayed.

KELLEY BROS. v. STOVALL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 18, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION (§ 196*)—CLAIMS BY THIRD PERSONS—QUESTIONS OF LAW OR FACT.

On the trial of a claim case, where the issue is the bona fides of a transfer of property by the defendant in execution to the claimant, and there are circumstances which, if not satisfactorily explained, may be regarded as badges of fraud, it is for the jury, and not the judge, to pass upon such issues.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 576; Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

A fi. fa. in favor of Kelley Bros., for the use of Kelley Bros. Company, was levied against M. E. and C. C. Stovall, and a claim was filed by Beulah W. Stovall. Judgment for claimant, and plaintiffs in fi. fa. bring error. Reversed.

Jas. L. Key, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. D. K. Johnston and J. D. Kilpatrick, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. A fi. fa. in favor of Kelley Bros., for the use of Kelley Bros. Company, against M. E. and C. C. Stovall, was levied on certain real estate as the property of the defendants, and a claim was filed by Beulah W. Stovall. On the trial of the claim case it appeared that the defendants in fi. fa. were husband and wife, and began doing a grocery business in 1906, making during this year a report to a commercial agency, showing that they were partners, and listed the property levied on as a firm asset. The suit out of which the fi. fa. issued was filed on January 23, 1908. To this suit a plea of no partnership was filed by M. E. Stovall, and the jury found against the plea. On December 28, 1907, C. C. Stovall, on a consideration of love and affection, conveyed to his wife, M. E. Stovall, a half undivided interest in the property; and on January 25, 1908, Mattie E. Stovall deeded the property to the claimant. The plaintiff's debt was in existence at the time of these conveyances. The property was returned for taxes in 1907 by C. C. and M. E. Stovall as a firm asset, and returned by the claimant in 1908. The application of C. C. Stovall for homestead, dated January 9, 1909, showing 25 creditors and an indebtedness of $671.17, and assets in the nature of a stock of goods in the amount of $799.90, was introduced in evidence; also a petition in bankruptcy filed against the firm on February 2, 1908. The receiver appointed in this proceeding testified that he found the defendants, Mattie E. and C. C. Stovall, in possession, and that he made demand on Mrs. Stovall for the money and notes, the proceeds of the sale of the land, and she denied that she had either. Beulah W. Stovall claimed to have bought the property through her husband, Sam C. Stovall, the brother of C. C. Stovall, on March 1, 1907; the consideration being $3,000 in cash and the assumption of a $1,400 mortgage on the property. Claimant had never been on the property when she bought it, received no bond for title when she made the first payment of $1,500, and gave no notes for the balance of the purchase money. No time was agreed upon for the payment of the balance of the purchase price. Defendants in fi. fa. remained in possession of the property until March 10, 1908. The final payment of $500 was made on January 25, 1908, the date of the execution of the deed.

We think that the court should have allowed the jury to pass on the evidence as to bona fides of the transfer of the property by the defendants in fi. fa. to the claimant. The negotiation of the transfer of the property was between two brothers, one of whom was joint defendant with his wife, for whom he was acting, and the other was the husband of the claimant. The sale of the property was proposed over the telephone, and the price agreed upon, and most of it paid, without other inspection than seeing it from the outside. The claimant agreed to pay $3,000 and assume an incumbrance of $1,400. Of this sum the claimant contends that she paid $1,500 March 1, 1907, and $1,000 on September 2, 1907, without taking bond for title or other writing evidencing the sale. The defendants in fi. fa. remained in possession of the property about a year without the payment of rent, but only paid the interest on the $1,400. "On the trial of the right of property under our claim laws, the possession of the defendant in execution after an absolute sale of the property levied on is prima facie evidence of fraud." Carter v. Stanfield, 8 Ga. 49. The sufficiency of the explanation of such possession is for the jury's determination. Intermediate the time when the claimant contends she purchased the property from C. C. Stovall and his wife and paid them $2,500, and the time of the last payment and the making of the conveyance C. C. Stovall made a voluntary conveyance of his share in the property to his wife. About the time of this conveyance the creditor was threatening suit, and the suit was actually filed within about three weeks. Mrs. Mattie Stovall and C. C. Stovall were jointly sued, and she defended on the ground that she was not a partner in the firm, which issue was determined against her. What was the purpose of making this voluntary deed does not appear. It is not explained. The claimant and the defendants were positive that all the money was paid to Mrs. Mattie Stovall, and none to C. C. Stovall. We think the jury should have been permitted to pass upon the bona fides of the transfer of the property by the defendant in fi. fa. to the claimant.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. DISMISSAL OF WRIT OF ERROR — MOTION DENIED.

The motion to dismiss the writ of error was without merit.

2. EJECTMENT (§ 69*)—PLEADING — SUFFICIENCY.

To an action of ejectment the defendant filed an equitable plea, disclaiming title to a half interest, and asserting an equitable title to the other half interest. In brief he alleged that he became possessed of information as to a valuable source of water supply which could be purchased, located near a city and suitable for use in furnishing water thereto; that he entered into an agreement with a person in a distant state, who had no information as to these facts, by which it was agreed that such person (a lessor of the fictitious plaintiff) should furnish money to pay for the expenses of negotiation for the property and other incidental expenses, and to pay the purchase money, if the land could be procured, the defendant furnishing the information which he had and agreeing to perform certain services; that it was agreed they should each own a half interest, if the purchase was made; that he fully complied with his contract, and the property was bought, but, for certain purposes of exploitation through an engineering company, the title was made to the other party to the agreement; that the defendant took possession and managed the property for the benefit of himself and such party; and that another lessor of the plaintiff, who apparently took a deed from the party making such agreement with the defendant, did so with full knowledge of the facts. A decree establishing the equitable right of the defendant was prayed. Held, that such equitable plea was not subject to general demurrer.

(a) The special demurrers were not passed on by the presiding judge.

Error from Superior Court, Harris County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action of ejectment on the demise of Franklin Nevius against C. W. Swift. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

An action of ejectment in the common-law form was brought against Charles W. Swift; demises being laid from J. C. Reid, J. A. Reid, William C. McFarland, and Franklin Nevius. The defendant filed equitable pleading, of which it is only necessary to set out the following parts: Defendant discovered that certain property near Columbus, known as the Blue Spring property, and for which this suit is brought, had on it a fine supply of water, which could be carried to Columbus by the gravity system, and furnished to the public. The property was also valuable as an investment, aside from this. While defendant was in New York, he received a letter informing him of the existence of a lack of adequate water supply in Columbus, and of a serious condition resulting therefrom. He mentioned this letter to J. B. McFarland, and also remarked that he believed he knew of sources of water which were desirable for furnishing water to that place. This led to other conversations and negotiations between him and McFarland, and it was finally agreed that the defendant should go to Georgia, in order to negotiate for the purchase of the Blue Spring place; that McFarland should defray the expenses of the trip and all other expenses incident to the negotiation and purchase, and should furnish the purchase money; and that, if the purchase were made, they should be co-owners, with equal interests, and the written option and deed should be made accordingly. Defendant went to Columbus and obtained a written option to buy the land, which was made in the name of himself and McFarland. He also performed all the services which he had agreed to do. Various transactions were set out in detail. Among other things, in order to obtain a sufficient supply of water for municipal purposes, it developed that it would also be necessary to obtain what was called in the pleading the "Barnes Creek" watershed; and an option was obtained on it by the defendant, and ratified by McFarland. Deeds were made in escrow. When they were taken up, defendant agreed that the one to the Blue Spring place might be changed so as to be put in the name of McFarland, for no other purpose than as a matter of convenience in handling the property by him and by an engineering company, through which it was to be exploited, and for the use and benefit of defendant as to a half interest. Since the taking and record of the deeds to the two properties, defendant has been in the peaceable and undisturbed possession of his one-half interest, and caring for the whole property in the interest of himself and McFarland. It was agreed between them that they would not try to make any profit by renting the land, but only have a caretaker occupy the dwelling house, and have a small amount of cultivation done, to occupy the persons living on the land. No mesne profits have accrued, and the time and attention which the defendant has devoted to this has caused him loss much exceeding in value the taxes which have been paid. Certain lessors of the plaintiff were former owners before these transactions occurred. Nevius, if a grantee from McFarland, is such with full notice of all the facts. Defendant prayed for a decree establishing his interest. By amendment he prayed for partition, and for a sale of the land for that purpose. On general demurrer the court dismissed the defendant's equitable plea, and a verdict and judgment were rendered against him. He excepted.

G. Y. Tigner, Hatcher & Hatcher, and Chas. J. Swift, all of Columbus, for plaintiff in error. Slade & Swift and A. W. Cozart, all of Columbus, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). An action of ejectment was brought against C. W. Swift, upon the demises of W. C. McFarland, Frank Nevius, and others. The defendant filed an equitable defense as to an undivided half interest in the land, and this was later amended. The plaintiff filed general and special demurrers to the answer as amended. The court sustained the general demurrer, and upon the making out of a prima facie case by the plaintiff, and the failure of the defendant to introduce any evidence, directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and a judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant excepted, and specifically assigned error on the sustaining of the demurrer to his equitable defense.

[1] 1. A motion to dismiss the writ of error was made; but, under the ruling in Lyndon v. Georgia Ry., etc., Co., 129 Ga. 853, 58 S. E. 1047, it is overruled.

[2] 2. The essence of the equitable defense, as to the Blue Ridge place, is that the defendant and McFarland entered into an agreement to buy the property together. McFarland was to put up the money for expenses and for the purchase price, if the land was obtained. Swift, the defendant, gave certain valuable information which he had acquired as to the location, water supply, etc., and was to negotiate for the purchase, and perform certain other services. He fully complied with his agreement, and thus in effect paid his part of the purchase price. For convenience in exploiting the property in connection with a plan to furnish water to the city of Columbus, in which a certain engineering company was to take a part, the deed was taken in the name of McFarland, by agreement between him and the defendant, and for the benefit of both. The defendant took possession of the property, and has managed it in accordance with the agreement between him and McFarland on that subject. If Nevius, a lessor of the fictitious plaintiff, has taken a conveyance from McFarland, he has done so with full knowledge of the facts. If these facts are true, as the demurrer admits them to be, an implied trust exists in favor of the defendant as to a half interest in the Blue Spring property. Civil Code 1910, § 3739. This is not an effort to set up an express trust by parol; nor is the defense subject to the objection that it is an effort to enforce a parol promise contemporaneous with the making of a deed. That there are many vague and indefinite allegations contained in the defendant's pleadings is undoubtedly true, as contended by counsel for the plaintiff. But enough clearly and distinctly appears to save the case from dismissal on general demurrer; and the judge of the trial court did not pass on the special demurrer, of which there were some 40 or 50 grounds.

In reference to what was referred to as the Barnes Creek watershed, the allegations of the equitable plea were entirely too indefinite for this court to determine whether the defendant has any equitable right as to it or not. But if not, this did not authorize the dismissal of the entire equitable defense on general demurrer; the action of ejectment having been brought to recover the Blue Spring place, and the defendant having set up an equitable right as to it, as above indicated.

Code 1910, § 5190), and while it has been repeatedly ruled by the Supreme Court and this court that this mandatory requirement as to notice must be obeyed, or there must appear in the record a written waiver of this notice, or the certiorari will be dismissed (McConnell v. Folsom, 4 Ga. App. 535, 61 S. E. 1051, and citations), yet where it appears from the record that the defendant in certiorari filed exceptions to the answer of the magistrate, and that these exceptions were heard and overruled by the judge of the superior court, it is too late to raise the question of want of the statutory notice. The defendant in certiorari having actually appeared in the case in the superior court, and filed exceptions to the answer of the magistrate, and having invoked a hearing on these exceptions, it would be trifling with the court for him subsequently to be allowed, when his exceptions had been overruled, to complain that he had not received the notice required by the statute.

A. L. Loyd, of Covington, for plaintiff in error. C. C. King, of Covington, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The accused was convicted in a municipal court of having intoxicating liquor for the purpose of unlawful sale. The city marshal testified that the accused was "believed to be a blind tiger of the worst kind," and he had been trying for two years to catch the accused with enough liquor to justify his arrest. Finally one night the accused stopped his buggy near a barber shop, got out of the buggy, and went into the shop. During his absence the marshal went to the buggy and found in it, under an oilcloth, one gallon bottle filled with whisky, and another gallon bottle with about a quart in it. The arrest of the accused followed. The chief of police testified that he had frequently made unsuccessful efforts to catch the accused selling whisky. It seems that the accused was permitted to testify. He denied having the whisky for the purpose of selling it, claimed that he had gotten it out of the express office some time before, and that he and some other persons had consumed about three quarts of the whisky from one of the bottles. This is all of the evidence.

The accused may have been, and probably was, a "traveling blind tiger"; but it takes something more to convict than suspicion or the "belief" of the city marshal that the accused had the whisky for an unlawful purpose. The police were overzealous and sprang the trap too soon. The next time, with the exercise of a little more patience, they may bag the game. The prohibition law encourages generosity. One may give, but not sell, his neighbor whisky. Many cities have passed ordinances designed to discourage the possession of whisky for the purpose of sale. Frequently the unlawful purpose can be shown only circumstantially; but, when an actual sale or attempt to sell cannot be shown, the circumstances proved must be so inconsistent with innocence as to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than guilt. They were not strong enough in this case.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 252*)—INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 198*)—ACCUSATION—AFFIDAVIT—VARIANCE.

Where the act creating a city court provides that all criminal accusations filed therein shall be founded upon affidavits, such an accusation cannot be broader than the affidavit, nor charge an offense different from that described in the affidavit. It follows that, where an affidavit charged the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, a count in an accusation founded thereon which charged the accused with keeping intoxicating liquors on hand at his place of business should have been quashed on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 526-536; Dec. Dig. § 252;* Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 218; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

H. D. Frazier was convicted of violating the liquor law, and brings error. Reversed.

C. R. Winchester and J. B. Hudson, both of Americus, for plaintiff in error. Zach Childers, Sol., of Americus, for the State.

POTTLE, J. The act creating the city court of Americus provides that "defendants in criminal cases in said city court of Americus may be tried on written accusation setting forth plainly the offense charged, founded on affidavit made by the prosecutor," and that, upon such affidavit and accusation being filed in the office of the clerk of the city court, it shall be the duty of the judge to issue a warrant for the arrest and apprehension of the defendant. Acts 1900, p. 100, § 30. An affidavit was made and filed, charging the plaintiff in error with the offense of selling intoxicating liquors, and upon this affidavit an accusation was drawn, containing two counts. The first count charged the sale of intoxicating liquors, and the second count charged that the accused kept on hand intoxicating liquors at his place of business. On arraignment the accused moved to quash the accusation, upon the ground that it was broader than the affidavit upon which it was founded, in that in the second count the accused was charged with keeping intoxicating liquors on hand at his place of business, and the affidavit charged only the sale of intoxicating liquors. The motion to quash was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were duly certified and filed, complaining of this ruling. The accused was convicted both of selling whisky and of keeping it on hand at his place of business. His motion for new trial was overruled, and a writ of error has been sued out to this court, complaining of this judgment and also assigning error upon the exceptions pendente lite.

An affidavit which charges the accused generally with the commission of a misdemeanor at a certain time and in a certain county is sufficient to support an accusation charging the accused with the commission of any misdemeanor. Williams v. State, 107 Ga. 693, 33 S. E. 641. But the accusation cannot be broader than the affidavit, and, where the affidavit charges a specific misdemeanor, the accusation must conform to the affidavit. So strictly has this rule been applied by the Supreme Court, that in Blake v. State, 112 Ga. 537, 37 S. E. 870, in which the affidavit charged the accused with the offense of selling whisky, it was held that an accusation founded thereon and charging generally the sale of intoxicating liquors should have been quashed on demurrer. In Glass v. State, 119 Ga. 299, 46 S. E. 435, the affidavit charged the offense of gaming, and it was held that this affidavit was sufficient foundation for an accusation charging any form of gaming. In the opinion the court said that, if the affidavit had charged the defendant with playing "seven up," he could not have been put on trial for playing any other game, or for gaming generally. Unless the act creating the city court requires it, an accusation need not be founded upon any precedent affidavit at all. Davis v. State, 11 Ga. App. —, 74 S. E. 442. But where the act provides, as does the act creating the city court of Americus, that the accusation shall be founded upon an affidavit, the accusation cannot be broader than the affidavit nor charge a different offense from that described in the affidavit. The court should have sustained the motion to quash the second count in the accusation. As everything else occurring on the trial was nugatory, it is not necessary to pass upon any of the other assignments of error. Judgment reversed.

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*) — CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The possession of an internal revenue special tax receipt for the retail or wholesale of spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors is, by the terms of the statute, only prima facie evidence of the guilt of one on trial for the unlawful sale of such liquors.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*) — CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—REBUTTAL.

In the present case, the inference of guilt, arising from the possession of such an internal revenue special tax receipt, was completely rebutted by the uncontradicted testimony of the only witness in the case that the accused had not in fact sold any intoxicating liquors, and that he was induced by an internal revenue officer of the United States government to take out a revenue license after he had come into the possession of a quantity of whisky which, according to the uncontradicted evidence, was ordered for himself and a number of others, and was delivered to the accused by a common carrier; the accused acting solely as agent for the buyer, and in no sense as agent for the seller, of the liquors.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 424*) — EVIDENCE — ACTS AND DECLARATIONS OF CONSPIRATORS.

The rule of evidence is elementary that acts and declarations of a co-offender or conspirator are admissible against the others only when made and done during the pendency of the criminal enterprise and in furtherance of its object, and that any subsequent declaration or conduct of a joint offender or conspirator is admissible only against himself, and, as against others, must be rejected as a narrative merely of past occurrences.

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; Price Edwards, Judge.

H. L. Hicks was convicted of burglary, and brings error. Reversed.

J. S. James, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Hutcheson, Sol. Gen., and W. T. Roberts, both of Douglasville, for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error, a negro boy, 15 years of age, was convicted of the offense of burglary, and was sentenced to seven years in the penitentiary. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error. The transcript of the record is very confusing and involved, and this court has found some difficulty in gathering from its careful perusal what actually occurred on the trial. In so far as we have been able to determine from this record, there is only one error which is of such serious character as to require the grant of another trial. The evidence against the accused consisted of several slight circumstances indicative of guilt, and, standing alone, would probably not have been sufficient to have produced conviction in the mind of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. In this state of the evidence the court permitted, over the objection of the attorney for the accused, declarations made by an alleged accomplice subsequently to the commission of the offense—a narrative merely of past occurrences. This accomplice had entered a plea of guilty to the offense of burglary charged against the accused, himself, and another, and was in jail when the prosecutor had a conversation with him relative to the offense; and in this conversation the accomplice stated to the prosecutor the particulars of the commission of the offense, declaring that the accused participated therein, and giving in detail the acts and conduct of the accused in its commission. The accused was not present when this statement was made to the prosecutor. On the trial, this accomplice testified in behalf of the accused, denying that he was present at the commission of the offense or had participated therein. The presiding judge stated that these subsequent declarations were admitted for the purpose of impeachment; but it does not appear that any foundation was laid for their introduction for this purpose.

This testimony was clearly inadmissible as evidence against the accused. "A confession of one joint offender or conspirator made after the enterprise is ended, is admissible only against himself." Pen. Code 1910, § 1035. This is but a codification of a well-settled rule of law. Reid v. State, 20 Ga. 681; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 184(a).

Another occurrence which the record shows took place at the trial, while not in itself sufficient to warrant the grant of a new trial, induces us all the more readily to grant another trial, because it probably may have resulted in injustice to the accused. After the evidence had been closed and the argument begun, the state asked permission to reopen the case for the purpose of introducing another witness. This witness testified that on the night of the alleged burglary he had seen the accused and this accomplice together. The attorney for the accused objected to the reopening of the case, but, of course, this was a matter in the discretion of the court. After this witness had testified, the attorney for the accused then asked the court to postpone the trial for a short time, in order that he might have an opportunity of sending for a witness, whom he named and located, by whom he could rebut the testimony of this new witness. The court refused to give him the time. While, as above indicated, this is a matter in the discretion of the court, yet where the witness thus introduced at this stage of the trial proved an additional fact which was damaging to the accused, and the accused stated that he could not have anticipated the evidence of this additional fact, and that he had a witness by whom he could rebut this evidence, naming and locating the witness, it would seem that the ends of justice required that the presiding judge should give to the accused a reasonable time to secure the presence of the witness for that purpose. We have said this much, not in criticism of the action of the learned trial judge, but because, in our opinion, the weak and inconclusive character of the evidence against the accused entitled him to the fullest opportunity to explain the incriminating circumstances. We grant a new trial in the case solely because of the admission of the subsequent declarations of the accomplice in the absence of the accused, which were simply a narrative of past occurrences, and which must have been hurtful to the accused.

CARRIERS (§ 277*)—TREATMENT OF PASSENGER—MISTAKE OF CONDUCTOR.

The law requires of a carrier of passengers, not only extraordinary care and diligence, in conveying passengers safely to the agreed destination, but also kind, considerate, and decorous treatment of passengers by employes of the carrier while the relationship of passenger and carrier continues, and any violation of this rule by which a passenger is humiliated or mortified or wounded in his feelings is tortious conduct, for which the carrier is liable in damages.

Error from City Court of Madison; K. S. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Annie Chivers against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, of Augusta, and E. W. Butler, of Madison, for plaintiffs in error. M. C. Few, of Madison, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Miss Annie Chivers recovered a verdict against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company for $100, as damages for the alleged tortious act of the conductor of the companies, based upon the following facts: Plaintiff got on a train of defendants at Buckhead, for the purpose of going to Atlanta. Before getting on the train, she went to the ticket agent at Buckhead and asked him for a ticket to Atlanta, and he replied that her father had already bought her ticket to Atlanta. After the train left Buckhead, and before reaching Madison, the conductor in charge of the train took up her ticket for Atlanta. After leaving Madison the conductor approached her and asked her why she did not get off the train at Madison. She told him that her ticket was for Atlanta. He replied that her ticket was for Madison, and that she would either have to get off the train or pay fare. "I knew my ticket was for Atlanta, having looked at it when my father gave it to me; but, as the conductor demanded fare and stated that he would put me off unless I paid it, rather than be humiliated, I paid him fare to Atlanta. I asked him to look and see if he had not taken up my ticket, for I had given it to him, and to see if it was not from Buckhead to Atlanta. He did not look, but stood me down that the ticket was only to Madison. He kept demanding that I pay the fare or get off the train. Everybody in the car saw and heard what was going on, and I saw that we were attracting attention. The car was full of people. After I had paid him the fare, the conductor approached me before we reached Atlanta, and wanted me to take back the money which I had paid him, and said he had found the ticket that I had given him, and he refunded me the money. His demand that I pay him fare was made in the ordinary tone of voice, but the passengers on the train heard him. His manner to me was respectful, and my complaint is that he demanded fare from me, first stating that my ticket read to Madison. He mortified me by stating that my ticket was to Madison and demanding that I pay my fare or he would put me off. It made the impression upon the passengers who heard the conversation that I was trying to beat my way. When he refunded me the money, he apologized and stated that he had found my ticket." This is substantially the testimony upon which the verdict was based, and it was insisted by counsel for the railroad company that it is insufficient to show any liability.

The rule of law governing the case is well settled. It is unquestionably the duty of the railroad company to protect a passenger against insult or injury from the conductor of the train upon which the passenger is riding. Any conduct of the conductor which reasonably and ordinarily tends to humiliate a passenger or subject him to mortification gives to the latter a right of action against the company. Cole v. Atlanta & West Point Railroad Co., 102 Ga. 474, 31 S. E. 107, and many cases there cited. As tersely expressed in the case of Head v. Georgia Pacific Ry. Co.: "Wounding a man's feelings is as much actual damage as breaking his limbs. The difference is that one is internal and the other external; one mental, the other physical." A carrier obligates itself to carry its passengers safely and properly, and to treat them respectfully, and if it intrusts the performance of this duty to servants, the law holds it responsible for the manner in which they execute the trust. As stated by Judge Thompson: "The law implies in the contract of carriage, not merely an agreement on the part of the carrier to use the high degree of care already described (extraordinary care), to the end of conveying the passenger safely to the agreed destination, but also an agreement for kind, considerate, respectful, and decorous treatment to the passenger at the hands of the carrier's own servants." 3 Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, § 3185. And as expressed by this court in Wolfe v. Georgia

Ry. & Electric Co., 2 Ga. App. 499, 58 S. E. 899: "A common carrier is responsible for the proper treatment of its passengers, and is bound to protect them from insult as well as from physical injury."

The rule of law being thus well settled—and we think wisely and properly settled—the only question is whether the conduct of the conductor in the present case amounted to a violation of this rule. We think that the statement of the conductor that the plaintiff did not hold a ticket which entitled her to transportation to Atlanta, notwithstanding her assertion that she did have such ticket and had given it to the conductor, his refusal to examine his tickets to see if her statement was not the truth, and his assumption that it was not the truth, and his demand for fare, under the threat of putting her off the train, was calculated to humiliate and mortify her, since the conversation took place in the hearing and presence of other passengers. It makes no substantial difference, except on the question of aggravation, that the manner of the conductor was respectful. The conduct of the conductor, with reasonable inferences therefrom, had necessarily a tendency to embarrass and humiliate the young lady passenger, and his conduct was at the peril of the company, and it turned out that his conduct was wholly unauthorized by the facts. Neither did the fact that when he discovered his mistake he offered to refund the money, and did refund it and apologize for his mistake, repair the wrong he had already perpetrated against the passenger in wounding negligently and unnecessarily her feelings.

It is insisted that the conductor simply made a mistake. This may be true; but it was a mistake due to his own negligence, and was a mistake for which he and his employer were responsible. We think the verdict of the jury was fully authorized and was conservative in amount, and that the bill of exceptions in the case contained no merit.

Judgment affirmed.

PHILLIPS v. STATE. (No. 4,163.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 5, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 116*)—JUSTIFICATION—SELF-DEFENSE—THREATS.

While provocation by mere words, threats, or menaces will not reduce the crime of assault with intent to murder to the statutory offense of shooting at another, yet, if such words, threats, or menaces were sufficient to arouse a reasonable fear on the part of the accused that his life was in danger, and he shot under the influence of this fear, the shooting would be justifiable.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 770, 828*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

In the absence of a timely written request, the trial judge is not bound to charge the jury upon a theory of law presented solely by the statement of the accused. But, if he does charge upon such a theory, he should give the law fully and fairly, both for the state and for the accused.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—JUSTIFICATION.

In the present case, it was error, requiring the granting of a new trial, to charge the jury that words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures will in no case free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder, without adding the qualification that it was for the jury to say whether the use of such words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures by the person shot was sufficient to arouse a reasonable fear on the part of the accused that her life was in danger.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County: J. W. Maddox, Judge.

Zella Phillips was convicted of shooting at another, and brings error. Reversed.

Ennis & Shaw, of Rome, for plaintiff in error. John W. Bale, Sol. Gen., of La Fayette, and Eubanks & Mebane, of Rome, for the State.

POTTLE, J. [1] The accused was placed on trial for the offense of assault with intent to murder, and was convicted of the statutory offense of shooting at another, and, upon the recommendation of the jury, was sentenced as for a misdemeanor. The evidence was amply sufficient to authorize the verdict. Complaint is made of the following instructions to the jury: "Provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder." The assignment of error upon this charge is that the jury were not instructed, either in connection with this charge or elsewhere, that they might consider whether or not the words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures were sufficient, under the circumstances surrounding the shooting, to arouse a reasonable fear on the part of the accused that his life was in danger, and that she shot while under the influence of that fear. In no case where the accused relies upon provocation arising from the use by the person assaulted of words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures, if the defense of reasonable fear is involved in the case under the evidence, should the trial judge charge broadly the language of the statute to the effect that in no case will provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures be sufficient to free the person killing from the crime and guilt of murder, without adding the qualification that if, however, such words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures were used, and were sufficient, under all the circumstances of the case, to arouse a reasonable fear on the part of the accused that his life was in danger, and if he shot while under the influence of such fear, he would be justifiable. The mere use of words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures will never be sufficient to reduce a crime from murder to manslaughter, or from assault with intent to murder to shooting at another, or stabbing, as the case may be, yet they are sometimes sufficient to justify the fear of a reasonable man that his life is in danger, and therefore authorize his acquittal. Cumming v. State, 99 Ga. 662, 27 S. E. 177; Rossi v. State, 7 Ga. App. 732, 68 S. E. 56; Landrum v. State, 9 Ga. App. 115, 70 S. E. 353.

[2. 3] Counsel for the state, while conceding the correctness of this general proposition, contend that in the present case it is no cause for ordering a new trial, for the reason that the defense of reasonable fear arose alone under the prisoner's statement, and that, as there was no written request for the instruction, the failure to qualify the charge is no cause for a new trial. Of course, it is well settled, under numerous decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court, that the judge is not bound, in the absence of written request, to charge upon a theory of defense arising solely from the prisoner's statement; but in the present case there was no evidence of any menaces or threats used by the person assaulted, and this contention likewise arose solely from the prisoner's statement. In other words, under the statement of the accused, the person assaulted used menaces and threats which may have aroused a reasonable fear on the part of the accused that her life was in danger. The judge, therefore, was not bound to charge the jury at all upon the subject of provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures, nor was he bound to charge upon the doctrine of reasonable fears; but, if he did charge in favor of the state upon facts which arose only from the prisoner's statement, it was manifestly unfair to the accused to fail to give the qualification in her favor which the law, as applied to her statement, demanded. In other words, the proposition may be stated broadly that, while the trial judge is not bound to charge upon a theory presented solely by the prisoner's statement, in the absence of timely written request so to do, yet, if he does so, he must charge the law correctly and give the accused the benefit of that theory of the law which her statement demands. Under this view of the matter, the principle decided in the cases above cited is controlling and a new trial should be granted.

1. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

It is not contributory negligence per se for a person to alight from a moving street car; but the question whether the person alighting was guilty of contributory negligence would depend upon the rate of speed, the place, and other circumstances.

2. CARRIERS (§§ 347, 320*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The evidence in the present case is not clear as to whether the plaintiff was injured while attempting to alight from a car that was actually moving, or whether, while he was in the act of alighting, the car suddenly moved and threw him to the ground. In either event, the question of his contributory negligence, and that of the negligence of the defendant company, were questions exclusively for the determination of the jury; and the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodgers, Judge.

Action by George Castopulon against the Macon Railway & Light Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ellis & Jordan, of Macon, for plaintiff in error. Napier & Maynard, of Macon, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff recovered a verdict for $400 for personal injuries received by him while alighting from a street car in the city of Macon. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, based upon the general grounds, which was overruled, and the case is before this court solely on questions of fact.

The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff shows that he boarded the defendant's street car for the purpose of going to Crump's Park, a pleasure resort near Macon. He asked the conductor if that car was going to Crump's Park, and the conductor told him it was not; that he would have to take a Vineville car; and he replied that he would get off, and the conductor said: "All right. Get out and catch the Vineville car." He put his foot on the ground. The car was going, and it threw him down, and his arm was broken by the fall. The evidence is not clear as to whether the car was moving when the plaintiff attempted to alight, and whether his foot coming in contact with the ground threw him, or whether while he was in the act of alighting from the car the car moved immediately, and the motion threw him down. It is insisted on the part of the railway company that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence of the plaintiff is that he attempted to get off the car as it was actually moving; and that in doing so he was guilty of such contributory negligence as would bar his right to recover. It may be stated that the only evidence as to the manner in which the injury occurred was that of the plaintiff himself. The only witness for the defendant was the conductor, who testified positively that no such incident occurred as was narrated by the plaintiff.

[1, 2] The question was exclusively for the determination of the jury. A careful examination of the plaintiff's evidence raises a reasonable inference that he may have been injured by the sudden motion of the car while he was attempting to alight therefrom. But it may be conceded that the car was actually moving when he attempted to alight, and yet this fact would not be per se such negligence as would prevent a recovery. The earlier cases in many instances recognized the principle of negligence per se in alighting from a moving train, but modern authority to a great extent has supplanted that doctrine with broader views upon the question; and it is now generally held, and especially by the courts of this state, that it is not contributory negligence per se for a person to alight from a moving street car, but the question of whether the person so alighting was guilty of contributory negligence depends upon the rate of speed, the place, and other circumstances. In the case of Myrick v. Macon Ry. & Light Co., 6 Ga. App. 38, 64 S. E. 296, this court quotes with approval the statement of Judge Thompson, in his Commentaries on the Law of Negligence (volume 3, § 2878), that "the weight of modern authority seems to sustain the view that an attempt by the passenger to alight from a railway train while it is passing a place at which it should stop to enable him to alight, or at which it has failed to stop a reasonable time to permit him to leave it, will not, as a matter of law, be considered a negligent act, unless the attending circumstances so clearly show that he acted imprudently or rashly that reasonable minds could fairly arrive at no other conclusion; and that the question whether the act of the passenger in so attempting to alight from the train was negligent (that is, whether he exercised for his safety that degree of care and caution which a person of ordinary prudence would be expected, under like circumstances, to exercise) must ordinarily be submitted to the jury." See, also, 3 Hutch. on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1179.

We think that this construction of the rule applies more clearly to attempts to alight from moving street cars than from cars propelled by steam; and the fact that, in attempting to alight from a moving street car, the passenger was encouraged to do so by the direction of the conductor in charge would be a strong circumstance supporting the view that the act did not amount to negligence. Certainly, under the facts in this case, the question was clearly one of fact, to be determined exclusively by the jury, and it is equally clear that the conclusion at which the jury arrived is not unsupported by the evidence or reasonable inferences therefrom.

Judgment affirmed.

Brown, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Lizzie Penn against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The evidence tended to show that on the morning of July 3, 1911, at 8 a. m., a message was delivered to defendant company by Herbert Penn, at Roanoke, Va., addressed to plaintiff at Winston-Salem, N. C., announcing the death of a child of Herbert Penn and grandchild of plaintiff, and that same was duly and properly transmitted by defendant to its office at Winston-Salem, and there defendant negligently failed to deliver it to plaintiff, whose place of residence was well known, and she only had notice that such a message was in the Winston office through a postal card from defendant's agent, delivered on the morning of July 5th; and by reason of such negligence and wrong on the part of defendant company and its agent plaintiff was prevented from going to Roanoke and being with her son in the time of his bereavement, and from attending the funeral of her grandchild, etc. Defendant, denying negligence, alleged, further, that the contract for transmission and delivery of the message was made in Roanoke, Va., and plaintiff's cause of action, if she had any, arose in that state, and that, by the law of that state, substantial damages for mental anguish could not be awarded in such an action; and the jury rendered the following verdict:

"First. Did the defendant negligently fail to deliver the message, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"Second. If so, did the acts and omissions constituting negligence occur in the state of North Carolina? Answer: Yes.

"Third. If the message had been delivered in a reasonable time, could and would the plaintiff have gone to Roanoke to be present at the funeral, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"Fourth. Under the law of the state of Virginia, can damages for mental suffering, independent of any injury to person or estate, be recovered against a telegraph company for negligent failure to deliver a message, or for negligent delay in the delivery of a message, although the telegraph company is advised of the character of the message? Answer: No.

"Fifth. What damage, if any, has the plaintiff sustained on account of mental anguish caused by the negligence of the defendant? Answer: $200."

The court, having declined to enter judgment on verdict for defendant, gave judgment thereon for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Geo. H. Fearons and Manly, Hendren & Womble, for appellant. John M. Robinson and W. Reade Johnson, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] It is well-established doctrine in this state that, under given circumstances, substantial damages for mental anguish may be awarded for wrongful and negligent failure to deliver or correctly transmit a telegraphic message, and this independent of bodily or pecuniary injury. The authorities are also to the effect that such recovery may be had by the sender or the addressee of the message or the beneficiary whose interest in its proper delivery has been sufficiently made known to the company. Christman v. Telegraph Co., 74 S. E. 325, present term; Kivett v. Telegraph Co., 156 N. C. 296, 72 S. E. 388; Woods v. Telegraph Co., 148 N. C. 1, 61 S. E. 653, 128 Am. St. Rep. 581; *Dayvis v. [3] A perusal of the numerous cases on the subject will disclose that this position, allowing recovery for mental anguish, not only obtains with us as a rule of interpretation and adjustment of the rights of the parties growing out of the contract between them, but it has become, also, a part of our public policy, adopted and recognized as necessary to enforce the proper performance of duties incumbent on these companies as public service corporations. Crosswell on Law of Electricity, § 634. From this it has been said to follow that, in a certain class of injuries involving a breach of these duties, an action may lie either in contract or in tort, a position upheld here as a general principle in reference to corporations of this character. *Carmichael v. [4] In the present case, the verdict has established an action in tort arising by reason of negligent default on the part of defendant company within the state of North Carolina, and the damages have been properly awarded which have naturally resulted from the wrong; that is, such as were reasonably probable under the circumstances existent at the time, and according to the law of the jurisdiction, statutory or otherwise, where same occurred. Young v. Western Union, 107 N. C. 370, 11 S. E. 1044, 9 L. R. A. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883; Peanut Co. v. Railroad, supra; Gray v. Telegraph Co., supra; Hughes v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 516, 52 S. Ed. 1105; Hale on Damages, p. 50; Jones, Tel. & Tel. Cos. § 518.

It is objected for defendant that the court, in numerous decisions, has said that the rules which obtain in awarding damages for breach of contract were properly applicable to cases of this character, and has repeatedly referred to Hadley v. Baxendale as the controlling authority on the subject. In many of these cases, the action was brought for breach of the contract, and the position as stated was in strictness correct. In others, the rules established or declared in Hadley v. Baxendale were applied, because they afforded a very safe guide to a correct estimate of damages, and because, on the facts as presented, there was no call for making discrimination in the two kinds of action. In so far as mental anguish is concerned, except in cases where punitive damages are sought and allowable, and except as to the time when the relevant circumstances are to be noted and considered, the amount is very much the same, whether the recovery is had in contract or in tort. In the one case, those damages are allowed which were in the reasonable contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, and in the other the consequential losses resulting from the tort, and which were natural and probable at the time the tort was committed. Hale on Damages, p. 48.

Speaking to these principles and their practical application in Scott and Jarnagan's Law of Telegraphy, it is said: "But when the contract between the parties does not show they had in contemplation this wider range in the estimate of damages (in contract) the measure of damages seems to be substantially the same in either kind of action. The true rule for estimating damages in actions ex contractu may be stated thus: The defendant is liable only for such damages as may fairly and substantially be considered as arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things—from the breach of the contract, or—and here is where the measure of damages takes the wider range—for whatever damages may fairly be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties. The rule in actions ex delicto is that the damages to be recovered must be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of. This is the rule when no malice, fraud, oppression, or evil intent intervenes. The damages which may be considered as arising naturally, according to the usual course of things, from the breach of the contract are substantially the same as damages which are the natural and proximate consequences of the wrong complained of." And in Jones on Telegraph and Telephone Companies, § 518, the author, while saying that, under some circumstances, the recovery in tort may take a wider range, is in support of the proposition that the amount of damages are usually the same.

It was in deference to this view, that, under all ordinary conditions, the damages to be awarded for mental anguish are practically one and the same, whether the action be in contract or in tort, that the court has thus far allowed the rules in Hadley v. Baxendale to prevail; but it was never intended, in cases requiring that the distinctions between the two classes of actions be observed, that when a tort was clearly established and committed within this jurisdiction that the usual rules for awarding damages in actions of that character should be modified or ignored. Thus, in Dayvis v. Telegraph Co., supra, the court, in speaking to this position, said: "In awarding damages for mental anguish, however, when the right thereto has been established, the decisions of this court have thus far uniformly applied the law governing cases of breach of contract." And in Williams v. Telegraph Co., 136 N. C. 84, 48 S. E. 560, 1 Ann. Cas. 359, Associate Justice Walker, delivering the opinion, said: "In order to ascertain the damages which a plaintiff, who sues for a breach of contract, is entitled to recover, the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale has generally been adopted as the one which will give the complaining party a fair and reasonable recompense for any loss he may have sustained, or for any injury he may have suffered." The opinions giving indication that when the action is for a tort, and under some conditions, the rules applied are not necessarily exclusive; and those which ordinarily obtain in actions of tort might, in proper cases, be applied.

Pursuing this same objection, there were several decisions called to our attention which, it is claimed, are in express denial of plaintiff's right to recover to the present verdict, notably, Hancock's Case, 137 N. C. 497, 49 S. E. 952, 69 L. R. A. 403, Hall's Case, 139 N. C. 369, 52 S. E. 50, Bryan's Case, 133 N. C. 603, 45 S. E. 938, and Johnson's Case, 144 N. C. 410, 57 S. E. 122, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 256, 119 Am. St. Rep. 961, and the doctrine of stare decisis is earnestly invoked in support of defendant's position. In Hancock's Case, supra, the action was by the sender, and was brought upon the contract; and it does not definitely appear that the default occurred in this state. In Hall's Case, supra, the right to recover for mental anguish was left as an open question, to be determined on the facts as they should be ultimately made to appear. In Bryan's Case, the action was upon breach of the contract, and recovery was sustained on the express ground that the contract was made in this state. In Johnson's Case, 144 N. C. 410, 57 S. E. 122, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 256, 119 Am. St. Rep. 961, the language of opinion is much broader, and seems to be an authority sustaining defendant's position; but a perusal of the case will clearly disclose that the learned judge was treating it throughout as an action for breach of the contract; and the decision was made to rest on Bryan's Case and other decisions applying the familiar principle that, in actions for breach of contract, when same originates in one state and is to be partly performed there, the laws of such state are ordinarily allowed as controlling on the question of interpretation and adjustment of the rights of the parties. These cases, then, when properly understood, do not, in our opinion, call for or permit an application of the doctrine of stare decisis.

In Mason v. Nelson, 148 N. C. 509, 62 S. E. 631, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1221, 128 Am. St. Rep. 635, speaking of this doctrine of stare decisis and its proper application, the court said: "We are not insensible to the great importance of the doctrine of stare decisis, a doctrine of recognized value in all countries whose jurisprudence, like our own, is founded so largely on precedents. We know that the courts in such countries, as a general rule, will adhere to a decision found to be erroneous, when it has been acquiesced in for a great length of time, so as to become accepted law, constituting a rule of property. And there are other conditions, restricted in their nature, where the doctrine may be properly applied; but none of them require or permit that a court should adhere to a decision, found to be clearly erroneous, which affects injuriously a general business law, and under the circumstances indicated here. As it has been well said, 'Where vital and important public or private rights are concerned, and the decisions regarding them are to have a direct and permanent influence upon all future time, it becomes the duty, as well as the right, of the court to consider them carefully, and to allow no previous error to continue, if it can be corrected. The foundation of the rule of stare decisis was promulgated on the ground of public policy; and it would be a grievous mistake to allow more harm than good to come from it.' 26 Am. & Eng. (2d Ed.) p. 184"—and the important and valuable case of Hill v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 539, 55 S. E. 854, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 606, is an illustration of the same view.

Recurring to the position sustained by these authorities, and more especially to the citation from 26 A. & E., supra, even if the doctrine of stare decisis was presented, it should not be allowed to prevail where a tort involving a breach of public duty, occurring within this state, has been clearly established and damages awarded on a principle recognized as necessary to enforce proper performance of such duties in this and all other cases of like kind.

It is also contended that if this proceeding and the principle upon which it rests are upheld that many persons could institute actions for the same breach of duty; that recoveries would be unduly multiplied and, in many instances, grave injustice done; but there would seem to be no good reason for this apprehension. As we have endeavored to show, in the large number of cases, the amount of damages to be awarded for mental anguish is practically the same, whether the action is on tort or contract. Where a tort is established, the consequential damages are only those which are natural and probable under the circumstances existent, or as they reasonably appeared, at the time the same occurred, and, applying the principle, when recovery for mental anguish is had in tort, the damages are properly confined to the parties to the contract, or to those whose interest, as beneficiaries of the message, has been sufficiently disclosed to the company. It is only as to those persons that such damages could be reasonably held either probable or natural.

[5] It is further insisted that the regulations of the company, requiring presentation of claims of this kind within 60 days, would be annulled; but, to our minds, no such result follows. These regulations, to the extent that they are reasonable, and not in excuse for negligence, have been upheld with us by express decision; and we see no reason why they should not be allowed to prevail, whether the action is in contract or tort. Forney v. Telegraph Co., 152 N. C. 494, 67 S. E. 1011; Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., 109 N. C. 527, 14 S. E. 94. We are aware that there are decisions to the contrary in other jurisdictions, more especially in respect to the addressee of the message; but they are not in accord with the principles established here. We were referred by counsel to the case of Cannaday v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 439, 55 S. E. 836, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 939, 118 Am. St. Rep. 821, as authority in contravention of our present ruling; but that was a case where the contract and all the facts relevant to plaintiff's cause of action had their origin and existence in another state, and the case has no application to the facts appearing in this record; and in two cases from the United States Supreme Court, to which we were cited, Primrose v. Telegraph Co., 154 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 1098, 38 L. Ed. 883, and Western Union v. Hall, 124 U. S. 444, 8 Sup. Ct. 577, 31 L. Ed. 479, the actions were considered and dealt with as for breach of the contract. In the present case, a tort, committed in this state, having been established by the verdict, we are of opinion that the damages have been awarded on correct principles, and the judgment in plaintiff's favor must be therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

CLARK, C. J. (concurring). When a message is sent from a point in this state to a point in another state, recovery can be had for mental anguish resulting from the breach of contract of prompt delivery. This is in accordance with the law of the place of contract. Bryan v. Telegraph Co., 133 N. C. 603, 45 S. E. 938, and numerous cases since. When the message is sent from another state into this state, and there is a failure to deliver promptly after the arrival of the message in this state, the party in interest is entitled to recover damages for the breach of the public duty which has occurred here. Such damages are to be measured according to the public policy of this state, where the breach of duty has occurred. Hence mental anguish can be allowed when it has been caused by reason of such breach of duty.

The first cases in this state in which mental anguish was allowed were cases in which the message had been sent from a point out of the state to a point in the state. Young v. Telegraph Co., 107 N. C. 371, 11 S. E. 1044, 9 L. R. A. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883, was a case where the message was sent from Greenville, S. C., to the plaintiff at New Bern, N. C. In Thompson v. Telegraph Co., 107 N. C. 449, 12 S. E. 427, the message was sent from Danville, Va., to Milton, N. C. These were the first two cases in which recovery was had for mental anguish.

There have been numerous cases since, in which mental anguish has been recovered, where the message was sent from a point outside of the state to a point in the state. Among them are Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., 109 N. C. 529, 14 S. E. 94; s. c., 116 N. C. 656, 21 S. E. 400; s. c., 117 N. C. 354, 23 S. E. 277; Lewis v. Telegraph Co., 117 N. C. 436, 23 S. E. 319; Lyne v. Telegraph Co., 123 N. C. 130, 31 S. E. 350; Higdon v. Telegraph Co., 132 N. C. 726, 44 S. E. 558; Williams v. Telegraph Co., 136 N. C. 82, 48 S. E. 559, 1 Ann. Cas. 359; Hall v. Telegraph Co., 139 N. C. 370, 52 S. E. 50; Whitten v. Telegraph Co., 141 N. C. 361, 54 S. E. 289; Woods v. Telegraph Co., 148 N. C. 9, 61 S. E. 653, 128 Am. St. Rep. 581; Marquette v. Telegraph Co., 153 N. C. 156, 69 S. E. 73; Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., 155 N. C. 251, 71 S. E. 830. At this term, in Alexander v. Telegraph Co., 74 S. E. 449, mental anguish was allowed in a case where the message was sent from Norfolk, Va., to a point in this state.

The only case contrary to the above was Johnson v. Telegraph Co., 144 N. C. 410, 57 S. E. 122, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 256, 119 Am. St. Rep. 961, which has not been followed since. In Jones on Telegraphs, § 598, it is said: "Under the rulings of the courts in those states which permit a recovery of damages for mental anguish or suffering, such damages may be recovered for the negligent transmission or delivery of a message sent into these states from those which refuse to allow such damages. Gray v. Telegraph Co., 108 Tenn. 39 [64 S. W. 1063], 56 L. R. A. 301, 91 Am. St. Rep. 706; Telegraph Co. v. Blake, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 224 [68 S. W. 526]. The same rule applies where the messages are sent from those states which permit to those which do not permit such recovery, when the action is brought in the former state. So, also, damages may be recovered where the message is sent, although it is to be delivered in a state which does not allow a recovery of such damages. Bryan v. Telegraph Co., 133 N. C. 603 [45 S. E. 938]; Telegraph Co. v. Waller, 96 Tex. 589 [74 S. W. 751, 97 Am. St. Rep. 936]; Telegraph Co. v. Cooper, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 591 [69 S. W. 427]. But if both the states from and to which the message is sent refuse to allow damages for mental suffering, such damages cannot be recovered, although the suit is brought in a state which does allow such damages, and is one through which the company has a line. Thomas v. Telegraph Co., 25 Tex. Civ. App. 398 [61 S. W. 501]. It seems that the statutes in those states (and, we may add, decisions) permitting a recovery of such damages raise the duty of these companies above that assumed in the contract of sending, and base their reasons upon the fact that a public duty has been violated for which damages may be recovered, either at the place of sending or receiving." The author cites to sustain the view that this is a breach of public duty. Thomp. Elec. § 427. This ground of recovery has always been recognized in this state. Woods v. Telegraph Co., 148 N. C. 9, 61 S. E. 653, 128 Am. St. Rep. 581.

In 2 Joyce, Tel. § 812c, it is said: "Under a South Carolina case, if a mistake occurs at the office in a state from which the telegram is sent, recovery may be had therein by the addressee for mental anguish, where it is a ground for recovery in such state; and it need not be shown that there has been a change in the common law of the state to which the message is sent. Walker v. Telegraph Co., 75 S. C. 512 [56 S. E. 38]. It is also determined in that state that, although the telegram is received for transmission in another state, yet, if there was failure to deliver in South Carolina, an action was maintainable there for the resulting mental suffering."

If there is breach of public duty, and damages for mental anguish are recoverable therefor, it logically follows that when the action is brought in this state such damages are recoverable, whether the message originated or was received here. And, for the very reason that permits either the sender, sendee, or beneficiary of a message to recover upon showing injury to himself from a breach of such duty, this state has allowed damages for mental suffering, irrespective of whether the message was originated here or was received here. The sole case to the contrary is Johnson v. Telegraph Co., 144 N. C. 410, 57 S. E. 122, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 256, 119 Am. St. Rep. 961, which is opposed to the numerous cases above cited, and in which the first paragraph in the headnotes requires us to overrule what is stated in the second headnote.

WALKER, J. (concurring in result). I agree with the majority of the court that damages are recoverable by plaintiff, the sendee of the message, in this state, to whom it was addressed by the sender at Roanoke, Va., although it appears that damages for mental anguish are not recoverable by the law of the latter state; but I cannot assent to the position that this decision is in harmony with Johnson v. Telegraph Co., 144 N. C. 410, 57 S. E. 122, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 256, 119 Am. St. Rep. 961; for I must think that the two cases are in irreconcilable conflict, at least in principle. In the Johnson Case, the suit was brought by the sendee, who was in this state, and the message originated in Virginia, where damages for mental anguish were not recoverable. The same principle, in my opinion, must necessarily govern both cases. In Bryan v. Telegraph Co., 133 N. C. 603, 45 S. E. 938, the sendee, who lived in South Carolina, where damages for mental anguish are not recoverable, was allowed to recover, but not for the reasons stated in support of the opinion of the court in this case.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). I am of opinion that this case is governed wholly by the decision in Bryan's Case, 133 N. C. 603, 45 S. E. 938, and Johnson's Case, 144 N. C. 410, 57 S. E. 122, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 256, 119 Am. St. Rep. 961. Bryan's Case was decided in 1903, and the opinion written by Clark, C. J. It has been cited and approved in 11 cases, which are cited in the notes to the report of the case. The Johnson Case was decided solely upon the authority of the Bryan Case, and by a unanimous court, and it was so understood by every member of this court, including the author of the opinion in the Bryan Case.

In Bryan's Case and in Johnson's Case following, it is held that "the liability of a telegraph company for damages for mental anguish, for negligence in transmitting telegraph messages from its office in one state to that of another for delivery, is determined by the laws of the state in which the message was received for transmission."

In Bryan's Case, which has been followed without deviation since its decision, the Chief Justice says: "A case exactly in point is Reed v. Telegraph Co. [135 Mo. 661, 37 S. W. 904], 34 L. R. A. 492 [58 Am. St. Rep. 609], which holds that, if a telegraph message is delivered to the company in one state, to be by it transmitted to a place in another state, the validity and interpretation of the contract, as well as its liability thereunder, is to be determined by the laws of the former state. The contract was made at Mooresville, in this state; it is a North Carolina contract, and damages for its breach are to be assessed according to the liability attaching to such contract under our laws."

It is to be noted that at the time that decision was rendered the laws of South Carolina did not permit a recovery upon the ground of mental anguish; and the sendee of the message, who lived in South Carolina, was permitted to come into this state and bring action in its courts, in order to recover damages for mental anguish. Now that the defendant company relies upon the very same principle announced in that case for its protection, the case is practically ignored. "It is a poor rule that does not work both ways."

(158 N. C. 489)

STATE v. WATKINS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 28, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 273*)—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the evidence whether it was justifiable or not was sharply conflicting, the question was for the jury.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 203*) — EVIDENCE — DYING DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Surrounding circumstances may be sufficient to show consciousness of approaching death and lay the foundation for a dying declaration, so that where it appeared that deceased asked if he was in any danger of dying, and said that otherwise he did not wish his people to know his condition, and the doctor said he did not have one chance in a hundred of living, but that they ought to operate, but would not operate without his consent, and deceased consented to communicate with his people and to the operation, the circumstances sufficiently show a sense of impending death to warrant the admission of dying declarations.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 221*)—EVIDENCE — DYING DECLARATIONS.

Because of necessity, dying declarations are admitted in homicide cases without the sanction of an oath, but they are only admitted as evidence and are not conclusive.

4. HOMICIDE (§ 204*)—EVIDENCE — DYING DECLARATIONS.

To be admissible, a dying declaration need not be in immediate proximity to death, being competent where there is an impending sense of dissolution.

5. HOMICIDE (§ 215*)—EVIDENCE — DYING DECLARATIONS—CONCLUSIONS.

Where the deceased stated that they had killed him and asked who shot him, and, on being told that an officer shot him, asked why he did so, saying that he did nothing to be shot for, those declarations are admissible, not being incompetent as an expression of opinion.

6. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the court erroneously charged that, if the jury found that the accused's conduct was as testified by a witness, they should find him guilty of murder in the second degree, and the jury found accused guilty of only manslaughter, the charge was not prejudicial.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 783*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

While the court cannot single out a witness or witnesses and charge the jury that if they believe those witnesses to render a certain verdict, the court may charge that if they believe a state of facts as deposed by certain witnesses then their verdict should be a conviction or acquittal as the case may be.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1734, 1735, 1872-1876; Dec. Dig. § 783.*]

8. HOMICIDE (§ 116*)—SELF-DEFENSE—REASONABLE CAUSE FOR APPREHENSION.

Where self-defense is urged in a prosecution for homicide, the prisoner's conduct must be judged by the facts and circumstances as they appeared to him at the time; the reasonableness of his apprehension of death or great bodily injury being a question for the jury to decide in view of the facts and circumstances, and not solely a matter for the accused to decide.

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The refusal of requested instructions, where covered by the charges given, is not erroneous.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1178*) — APPEAL — WAIVER OF ERROR.

Under Supreme Court rule 34 (140 N. C. 666, 66 S. E. ix), exceptions not urged in accused's brief on appeal are waived.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 923*)—TRIAL—OBJECTIONS.

A motion to set aside the verdict on the ground of disqualification of a juror should be made at the earliest opportunity, and where accused has taken the chances for a favorable verdict, the entertaining of such a motion rests in the sound discretion of the trial court.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 923*)—APPEAL—ABUSE OF DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, before the jury had retired, accused learned that one of the jurors had expressed an opinion before he entered the box, the denial of his motion to set aside the conviction is not an abuse of discretion, where the juror testified that not only was he not prejudiced, but he aided in reducing the verdict from murder in the second degree to manslaughter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Webb, Judge.

F. C. Watkins was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Murphy, A. T. Morrison, and Craig, Martin & Thomason, for appellant. The Attorney General and T. H. Calvert, Asst. Atty. Gen. for the State.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The prisoner was indicted for the murder of John Hill Bunting. There was a verdict of manslaughter. The deceased, Bunting, was shot in his room at the Black Mountain Hotel by the prisoner about an hour after midnight on August 6, 1909, and died next day in the hospital at Asheville. The prisoner was an officer and went to the room in which were Bunting and one Collins, having been sent for, upon the information that they were noisy and disorderly and disturbing the inmates of the hotel thereby. According to the evidence of the state, when the prisoner reached the room, Bunting and Collins were not aggressive and offered no resistance, and the shooting under the circumstances was entirely unnecessary and could not be justified as an act of self-defense or otherwise. According to the evidence for the prisoner, who testified in his own behalf, he acted under apprehension that he would be assaulted and was in immediate danger and under reasonable apprehension thereof, though no weapons were found in the possession of either Bunting or Collins. The conflict of testimony upon this point was a matter for the jury.

[2] The first exception is to the admission of the dying declarations of Bunting. He stated to the nurse that they "had killed him." He asked if he was in any danger of dying, and said that if he was not he did not wish his people to know his condition. The doctor told him that he was suffering from a severe internal hemorrhage; that he did not have "more than one chance in a hundred of living"; that they would have to cut open his abdomen, and were not willing to do so without his consent; and that he had better communicate with his people. Thereupon he asked Dr. Hilliard to send a telegram to them. The deceased, who had been quiet, then opened his eyes and said, "Who shot me?" Dr. Landress answered, "The officer at Black Mountain shot you," to which the deceased replied: "Why did he shoot me? I have done nothing to be shot for." Dr. Fletcher also testified as to the critical condition of the deceased at that moment, who "knew his condition" and was about to be put upon the operating table, and who died that night. Surrounding circumstances are sufficient to show consciousness of approaching death and to lay the foundation for a dying declaration. State v. Bagley, 73 S. E. 995, and State v. Laughter, 74 S. E. 913, at this term.

In Wigmore, Evl. § 1442, it is said: "In ascertaining this consciousness of approaching death, recourse should naturally be had to all the attending circumstances. It has been contended that only the statements of the declarant could be considered for this purpose; or, less broadly, that the nature of the injury alone could not be sufficient, i. e., in effect, that the declarant must have shown in some way, by conduct or language, that he knew he was going to die. This, however, is without good reason. We may avail ourselves of any means of inferring the existence of such knowledge; and if in a given case the nature of the wound is such that the declarant must have realized his situation, our object is sufficiently attained. * * * No rule can here be laid down. The circumstances of each case will show whether the requisite consciousness existed; and it is poor policy to disturb the ruling of the trial judge upon the meaning of these circumstances."

The evidence in this case shows that the deceased said that he did not wish his friends to know his condition unless he was in danger of dying; the physicians told him that he must be operated on; that he had but one chance in a hundred to live; that he should communicate with his friends; he immediately sent off a message showing his belief in what had been said to him; he was immediately lifted upon the operating table and died that night; and, indeed, the above declaration seemed to have been the last remark that he made. It is impossible to escape the conclusion upon this evidence that the declaration was made under a sense of impending death.

[3] The deceased had already stated that they had killed him, and he must have known, even independently of the physicians' statements, from the attendant circumstances, that his condition was desperate, and when the physicians told him that he had but one chance in a hundred to live, and he should wire his family, he understood their meaning, and at once sent the dispatch. The dying declarations of the deceased, under these circumstances, are taken, without the sanctity of an oath, because of necessity. Such declarations are, however, only admitted as evidence and are not conclusive. The jury are to weigh them like any other evidence and give them such weight only as they think proper.

[4] Though it seems that those were the last words that the deceased spoke, the admissibility of such declarations does not depend upon the immediate proximity of death, for they are competent where there is the impending sense of dissolution, though death may be much longer off than in this case. In State v. Peace, 46 N. C. 255, the declarations were admitted though the deceased did not die for two days thereafter, and there have been cases where such declarations were admitted when the death occurred after a still longer lapse of time. State v. Mills, 91 N. C. 581.

On the other hand, it is not necessary that the deceased should have expressly declared that he was about to die when, as here, the attending circumstances, as for instance the remark of the physician of his desperate condition and his acting upon this suggestion to send off the dispatch, show that his critical condition was known to him.

In Greenleaf, Ev. (16th Ed.) § 158, it is said that, while it is essential that the deceased was under the sense of impending death, it is not necessary that he should so state at the time. "It is enough, if it satisfactorily appears, in any mode, that the declarations were made under that sanction; whether it be directly proved by the express language of the declarant, or be inferred from his evident danger, or the opinion of the medical or other attendants, stated to him, or from his conduct or the circumstances in the case, all of which are resorted to in order to ascertain the state of the declarant's mind."

The rule for the admission of such testimony is also thus laid down in Taylor, Ev. § 648, and approved (State v. Mills, 91 N. C. 594): "(1) At the time the declarations were made the declarant should have been in actual danger of death. (2) He should have a full apprehension of his danger. (3) Death should have ensued."

[5] Nor is the language used: "Why did he shoot me? I have done nothing to be shot for"—incompetent as the expression of an opinion. It was the statement of a fact. If it was doubtful which it was, it should have been admitted, and the court should have been requested to instruct the jury to consider what the deceased meant as a matter affecting the weight to be given to the statement. In State v. Mills, 91 N. C. 594, the dying man stated that Eaton Mills had shot him. The witness asked, "What for?" to which the deceased replied, "Nothing." That reply is almost identical with the declaration here in evidence.

In Darby v. Ga., 79 Ga. 63, 3 S. E. 663, the deceased said that "the prisoner had cut him, and that he had done nothing to cause it." The court held that this was not a conclusion, but a fact, and that the declaration was competent. In White v. State, 100 Ga. 659, 28 S. E. 423, the dying declaration that the accused "shot me for nothing, without any cause," was held not the statement of conclusion, but rather a fact, and was competent. These two cases were cited and approved on this point in McMillan v. State, 128 Ga. 25, 57 S. E. 309.

[6, 7] The court charged the jury that, if they found that the prisoner "went into this room that night, and that his conduct and action were such as testified to by Collins and under the circumstances as testified by him (the court recapitulating the evidence), then the court charges you that it is your duty to find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree." The prisoner was acquitted of murder in the second degree, and therefore this language, even if erroneous, was not prejudicial, but in State v. Rollins, 113 N. C. 734, 18 S. E. 398, it is held that such language was not erroneous. The court said: "The court cannot single out a witness or witnesses and charge the jury that if they believe those witnesses to find so and so. State v. Rogers, 93 N. C. 523, and cases there cited. But there is no impropriety in saying to the jury that if they believe a certain state of facts, as deposed to by certain witnesses, then the law applicable is so and so, when the court, as in this case, calls to their attention the opposite state of facts as deposed to by other witnesses, and instructs as to the law applicable thereto. This directs the jury's attention, not to the credibility of such witnesses, but to a certain hypothesis or state of facts, and the reference to the witnesses is simply incidental to refresh them as to the evidence tending to show a particular state of facts."

[8] Exception 3 cannot be sustained, for the instruction asked was correctly given in the charge as follows: "If the defendant reasonably believed that he was about to suffer death or serious bodily harm, and shot to protect himself, he would not be guilty, and the jury should return a verdict of not guilty, and the jury need not be satisfied of these facts beyond a reasonable doubt, or by the greater weight of the evidence, but simply satisfied. The prisoner's conduct must be judged by the facts and circumstances as they appeared to him at the time he shot, and the jury, under the evidence, should ascertain whether he had at the time a reasonable apprehension that he was about to lose his life or receive great bodily harm. The reasonableness of his apprehension is for the jury to pass upon; but the jury must form their conclusion from the facts and circumstances as they appeared to the prisoner at the time he shot." The able counsel for the defendant insisted that the reasonableness of the apprehension was to be judged by the prisoner himself and not by the jury. The charge as given is strictly in accordance with the precedents and the reason of the thing. If the reasonableness of the apprehension of the prisoner must be decided by him conclusively, and not by the jury, upon consideration of the attendant circumstances, then the result depends upon his nerves, or rather upon his own statement as to them, and not upon the reasonableness of the apprehension under which the prisoner took the life of a fellow being. In short, a brave man, under such circumstances, would be guilty, and a coward justifiable. Such cannot be the law.

[9] Exceptions 6, 7, and 8 cannot be sustained, for the court gave the instructions asked even more strongly than requested. The court repeatedly charged that if the officer acted in self-defense as testified to by himself and witnesses, he could not be convicted. The same is true as to exception 10.

Nor can exception 16 be sustained. If the prisoner fired, not in the attempt to effect an arrest, but in defense of his own person, then his conduct must be measured by the rules applicable to any individual so assaulted, and the fact that he was an officer would not justify him in needlessly killing the deceased.

[10] The other exceptions are without merit and were properly abandoned by not being brought forward in prisoner's brief. Rule 34 of this court (140 N. C. 666, 66 S. E. ix).

[11, 12] The prisoner further assigned for error the action of the court in overruling a motion to set aside the verdict on the ground that one of the jurors had formed or expressed his opinion that prisoner was guilty before he entered the box, and did not let this be known when challenged. The court found as a fact that such knowledge as the prisoner had in regard to this matter was acquired before the argument of the case was completed and before verdict, but it was not communicated to the court till after the verdict. In Pharr v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 418, 44 S. E. 37, the court said: "Motions of this sort must be made in apt time. The knowledge of the alleged fact, upon which the defendant bases its motion, was acquired during the trial and before the verdict was rendered, and the matter should at the earliest opportunity have been brought to the attention of the court. It has been said by this court that, after a defendant has taken chances for a favorable verdict, the purposes of justice are not subserved by listening too readily to objections not taken in apt time." To a similar purport, Baxter v. Wilson, 95 N. C. 137; Spicer v. Fulghum, 87 N. C. 18; State v. Perkins, 66 N. C. 128. Such matters rest in the discretion of the trial court, certainly in the absence of a palpable abuse of discretion. This was not the case here, for the testimony of the juror himself is that he not only was not prejudiced against the prisoner, but that in considering the verdict several of the jurors were in favor of a verdict for murder in the second degree, and that he on the first vote stood out for manslaughter and aided to reduce the verdict accordingly, and that none of the jurors were for acquittal at any time.

Upon careful consideration of all the exceptions, we find no error.

MASON v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al.

CARRIERS (§ 356*)—PASSENGERS—EJECTION—GROUNDS.

A passenger, who purchases a mileage book and signs his name to the contract, there-in stipulating, "Issued in exchange for proper number of coupons from and valid only when presented on train in connection with interchangeable mileage ticket," and who presents the book to an agent who gives him the usual exchange ticket, must on the demand of the conductor present the book when presenting the exchange ticket, and where he refuses to do so he may be ejected, using only necessary force.

Clark, C. J., and Allen, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Adams, Judge.

Action by E. L. Mason against the Seaboard Air Line Railway and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This issue was submitted to the jury: "Was the plaintiff a passenger on the defendant's train, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No." There was a judgment for the defendants.

Tillett & Guthrie and Stewart & McRae, for appellant. Burwell & Cansler and R. S. Hutchison, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The question presented by this appeal and raised by the several assignments of error is whether the plaintiff was a passenger upon the defendant's train and unlawfully ejected. It is admitted that he was ejected by the conductor under direct orders from the authorities of the defendant, and it is not contended that there is any evidence that the said ejection was accompanied with undue force. There is no evidence of rudeness, insult, or other unnecessary force used in expelling the plaintiff from the train. The facts are practically undisputed.

The plaintiff purchased of the defendant a mileage book at the rate of two cents per mile. He signed his name to the contract contained in it. On April 14, 1910, he was a passenger from Charlotte to Ellenboro on the defendant's road. He had presented his mileage book to the agent at Charlotte, who pulled the proper number of coupons to cover the distance, and gave him the exchange ticket. On his trip he exhibited both the mileage book and the ticket to the conductor and completed his journey. On the return trip the same afternoon, he presented his mileage book to the agent, who pulled his mileage and gave him the usual exchange ticket. When the conductor asked him for his ticket, he handed him the exchange ticket, and upon being asked for his mileage book in order that the conductor might compare the exchange ticket with the book, the plaintiff refused to exhibit his book, but stated to the conductor that he had it in his vest pocket, and repeatedly declined to let the conductor see it.

The evidence of the plaintiff itself discloses that the conductor time and again requested him to show his mileage book, telling him the exchange ticket was not good for passage without it, and that he would be compelled to put him off. The conductor wired the general passenger agent for instructions, and received a reply ordering him to put the plaintiff off the train if he refused to comply with the conditions of his mileage book and exhibit it to the conductor in connection with the exchange ticket. The conductor showed this message to the plaintiff, who still refused to show his mileage book, although he had it in his vest pocket. Whereupon the conductor put the plaintiff off the train at the depot in Lincolnton. The plaintiff hired a vehicle, drove to Gastonia, and came over to Charlotte on another road, reaching there three hours later than he would have done had he remained on the defendant's train.

The court charged the jury, in effect, that if they believed the evidence in the case, the plaintiff was not a passenger on the defendant's train, and therefore was not entitled to recover.

In considering this question, it is well to bear in mind that the rate fixed by law for the sale of tickets upon common carriers is $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per mile, while mileage books are voluntarily sold by the railroad companies at the rate of 2 cents per mile. It should also be borne in mind that the Legislature has no power to require the railroads to sell mileage books at a less rate than that fixed for ordinary tickets. This has been settled finally by the Supreme Court of the United States in Lake Shore Ry. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 19 Sup. Ct. 565, 43 L. Ed. 858; and to the same effect are the decisions of the state courts of Virginia, New York, and others. Anderson v. Railway, 106 Va. 61, 55 S. E. 572, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1086, 117 Am. St. Rep. 983, 9 Ann. Cas. 1124; Beardsley v. Railway, 162 N. Y. 230, 56 N. E. 488.

So it must be conceded that the mileage book is a special contract of carriage between the carrier and the passenger, signed by the passenger, and made in consideration of a reduced rate of transportation, voluntarily granted by the railroad in consideration of the quantity of transportation purchased. Under such conditions the parties to the contract can incorporate in it such terms and conditions as they have mutually agreed upon. In respect to such contracts it may therefore be stated, as a general rule, that the passenger is entitled only to those rights which the ticket confers, and is bound himself to perform the obligations which the ticket imposes upon him. Hutchinson on Carriers, § 1053, where the author cites a great array of cases from the federal and state courts in support of his text.

In discussing a case similar to this, the Supreme Court of Georgia says: "The plaintiff paid a special fare under a special contract. The defendant agreed that the plaintiff might travel for a fare which is not the full fare the law allowed, and the defendant had a right to impose such conditions as they saw fit." To the same effect is Bitterman v. Railroad, 207 U. S. 205, 28 Sup. Ct. 91, 52 L. Ed. 171, 12 Ann. Cas. 693; Mosher v. Railroad, 127 U. S. 390, 8 Sup. Ct. 1324, 32 L. Ed. 249; Boylan v. Railroad, 132 U. S. 146, 10 Sup. Ct. 50, 33 L. Ed. 290; Watson v. Railroad, 104 Tenn. 194, 56 S. W. 1024, 49 L. R. A. 454.

The consensus of all the authorities, without a single exception so far as we have been able to find, is that by accepting such a contract at a reduced rate when he has the opportunity to purchase the usual and ordinary ticket, the passenger enters into a contract with the carrier different from that implied by law upon the purchaser of an ordinary ticket at full rate of fare. The purchaser is bound in such cases by the terms of the contract, and is entitled to its advantages of reduced fare.

The right of common carriers to attach special conditions and limitations to tickets issued at reduced rates seems to have been settled by the decisions of this court. Rose v. Railroad, 106 N. C. 168, 11 S. E. 526; Pickens v. Railroad, 104 N. C. 312, 10 S. E. 556.

The validity of this mileage contract was passed upon and upheld by this court in an opinion by Mr. Justice Hoke in Harvey v. Railway Co., 153 N. C. 567, 69 S. E. 627, in which it is held that: "A railroad mileage book is a contract of carriage with the purchaser or lawful holder, subject to certain restrictive stipulations, for the wrongful breach of which the holder may be expelled from the company's train." This case is cited and approved in Dorsett v. Railway (at the last term of this court) 156 N. C. 441, 72 S. E. 491. In both of these cases the railroad companies were held liable for violation of this very contract. These identical questions have also been recently passed upon in Desportes v. Railway, 87 S. C. 160, 69 S. E. 148; Perry v. Railroad, 9 Ga. App. 260, 70 S. E. 1122; B. & O. R. R. v. Evans, 169 Ind. 410, 82 N. E. 773; So. Ry. v. De Saussur, 116 Ga. 53, 42 S. E. 479; Harris v. Railroad, 77 N. J. Law, 278, 72 Atl. 50.

It is immaterial whether the plaintiff read this ticket, or not, for he knew of its conditions and complied with them on his trip in the morning. It was his own folly that he refused willfully and unnecessarily to comply with them on his return in the afternoon. The plaintiff admitted that he had his mileage book in his vest pocket, and boastfully refused to produce it. French v. Trans. Co., 199 Mass. 433, 85 N. E. 424, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1006, 127 Am. St. Rep. 506; Reed v. Railroad (Tex. Civ. App.) 50 S. W. 432. Assuming, for the sake of the argument only, that we have the right to pass upon the reasonableness of such regulation, we are unable to see any great hardship imposed upon a passenger who desires to save a half cent per mile in traveling to require him to produce his mileage book in connection with the exchange ticket. It is a well-known fact that the last General Assembly thoroughly investigated this question, and refused to interfere, even if it had the power. This regulation is devised to prevent impositions upon the railroad companies. As stated in the argument in this case, if the passenger was not required to exhibit his mileage book to the conductor, but only the exchange ticket, he could secure many exchange tickets at the railroad station and easily sell them at a small profit. Contract of mileage is a personal one and not assignable by its very terms, and were it not for this regulation, the railroad company would be utterly unable to prevent one person from traveling on the mileage book of another. It is useless to discuss the utility of this regulation, because it seems to be universally held that, if the passenger accepts the reduced rate, he must take with it these conditions which the carrier attaches to it. We find, however, in the books a great many regulations not a whit more unreasonable than this, which have been sustained by the courts. Reed v. Railroad (Tex. Civ. App.) 50 S. W. 432; Railroad v. Barlow, 104 Ga. 213, 30 S. E. 732, 69 Am. St. Rep. 166; Wenz v. Railroad, 108 Ga. 290, 33 S. E. 970; Eastman v. Railroad, 70 N. H. 240, 46 Atl. 54; England v. Railroad, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 86, 73 S. W. 24; McRae v. Railroad, 88 N. C. 526, 43 Am. Rep. 745; Railroad v. Hudson, 117 Ky. 995, 80 S. W. 454; Dangerfield v. Railroad, 62 Kan. 85, 61 Pac. 405; Boling v. Railroad, 189 Mo. 219, 88 S. W. 35.

From an unbroken line of authorities we are of opinion that the refusal of the plaintiff to present his mileage book in connection with the exchange ticket by the express terms of the contract disentitles the plaintiff to ride as a passenger upon the train. It was not optional with the conductor to waive any such violation, and he did not waive it, for he required the plaintiff to perform it that very morning, and the plaintiff voluntarily acknowledged his duty to perform it by producing the mileage book when demanded.

It is contended by the plaintiff that the conductor should have returned to him the exchange ticket. The question involved in this case is not the value of that exchange ticket, but the right of the plaintiff to continue as a passenger on the defendant's train when he willfully and obstinately refused to produce his mileage book in violation of the very contract which he had signed, a part of which reads as follows: "Good for Continuous Passage to Destination, Commencing Only on Date Stamped on Back Hereof. Issued in Exchange for proper number of Coupons from and Valid Only when presented on train in connection with INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKET." This exchange ticket was absolutely valueless without the production of the mileage book, and did not entitle the passenger to transportation. The failure, therefore, of the conductor at the time to return it to the plaintiff certainly could not entitle the plaintiff to ride upon the train when he still repeatedly refused to produce his mileage book in connection with it. The identical point is decided by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in Rahilly v. Railroad, 66 Minn. 153, 68 N. W. 853, wherein it is said: "We are all agreed that, even if the conductor had no right to take up the ticket, this would not give the plaintiff any right to refuse to pay his fare until and unless the ticket was returned. Having no right to ride on the ticket, it was his duty to pay the fare, or leave the train, and then pursue his own remedy against the defendant for wrongfully withholding the ticket from him." To the same effect is Elliot v. Railway, 145 Cal. 441, 79 Pac. 420, 68 L. R. A. 393, in which it is said: "It is further contended that the defendant could not, while retaining the void ticket, offered by plaintiff, legally demand the delivery of any other ticket or the payment of fare, and could not legally eject plaintiff for failure to comply with such demand. As already stated in our discussion of the findings of the court on this subject, the conductor expressly repudiated this ticket as absolutely void, and notified the plaintiff that he could not honor it. It was, as a matter of fact, entirely without value. We are not at all satisfied that the conductor had any right to retain this ticket, but we cannot see how an improper retention of a worthless ticket by the conductor could give the plaintiff any right to remain on the train without the presentation of a valid ticket or the payment of fare. He had not exhibited or surrendered a valid ticket, he had given nothing of value to the conductor, and he had refused and continued to refuse to pay his fare."

We are of opinion that the judge of the superior court was right in holding that, by his unreasonable conduct in refusing to exhibit the mileage book in his pocket, the plaintiff forfeited his right as a passenger, and was rightfully ejected from the defendant's train. Section 2629 of the Revisal of 1905 authorizes the ejection of passengers who refuse to pay fare, or violate the rules and regulations of the carrier.

No error

HOKE, J. (concurring in the result). I am of opinion that, under existent law, the mileage book, in its present form, constitutes a contract of carriage, subject to certain restrictive provisions, and to the extent that these provisions are reasonable and reasonably insisted on, they bind the parties according to their tenor. In my judgment, the stipulation in question here is a reasonable one, being necessary to prevent the improper use of these books by persons who do not own them, and there is nothing in the record that, to my mind, justifies or permits the conclusion that in this instance the conductor acted maliciously or in wanton disregard of plaintiff's rights as a passenger. I therefore concur in the decision denying recovery to plaintiff.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). It is too late to contest the proposition that common carriers are subject to public regulations, and that, when they make regulations themselves, such regulations must be reasonable.

It is not correct that the defendant company sold the plaintiff the mileage book at 2 cents per mile as a favor. When the General Assembly of this state, by chapter 216, Laws 1907, prescribed 2½ cents per mile as a maximum legal passenger rate, an injunction was sued out in the federal court to restrain the operation of this statute on the ground that it was confiscatory. Upon a reference to ascertain the facts, it was found that the railroad companies were making more money under the new rate than under the former higher rate. Thereupon the railroad companies proposed to the Governor of this state that, if the rate was made 2½ cents per mile, they would issue mileage books at 2 cents per mile. In consequence, the Legislature was called in Special Session in 1908 and adopted the 2½ cent rate. Laws 1908, Ex. Sess. c. 144. It was well understood at the time that the mileage book theretofore in use, and which is still in general use elsewhere, from which mileage is pulled on the train, was intended. No other kind had ever been heard of in this section. It was therefore by virtue of contract with the state, and not as an act of grace, that the plaintiff was enabled to buy this mileage book. It was a distinct violation of contract on the part of the defendant that the mileage book put on sale was hedged about with these restrictions. Good faith to the public and to the plaintiff requires that the defendant should pay damages for the wrongful ejection of the plaintiff.

Even if there had not been this contract between the railroad companies and the state, the regulations attached to this mileage book were unreasonable and should not be enforced. They are unreasonable because never known here, or required, till after the adjournment of the Legislature of 1908, and are practically unknown anywhere except in Virginia, Georgia, and in this state. Their enforcement in South Carolina has been prohibited by statute. These regulations, being unnecessary and vexatious, should not be upheld by the courts.

Having seen fit to require that a mileage book should be used to buy tickets with, certainly it was unreasonable to require thereafter anything more than the presentation of the ticket which had been issued in exchange for the mileage. The ticket was then on the same footing as any other local ticket good for that day and train. If the defendant feared that such ticket might be held by some one who did not own the mileage for which it was issued, then it should simply have required the mileage book to be presented to the conductor as formerly, and not to be exchanged for a ticket. The double requirement is inexcusable.

It is true, as argued before us by defendants' counsel, that it seems a discrimination to permit those who can advance $20 to purchase a mileage book at 2 cents per mile while those who cannot, or who do not wish to do so, are required to pay 2½ cents. But the railroads themselves originated the system of mileage books upon the ground that it saved them the expense and inconvenience of selling so many tickets, when 1,000 miles could be sold at once. It is in denial of the very reason given for issuing mileage books heretofore that the defendant now requires that tickets shall be bought with mileage books. The whole trouble can be redressed by the railroads voluntarily, or under compulsion of a statute, selling transportation to all, whether with or without mileage books, at 2 cents per mile—the rate which has been established and which is in force in so many other states and which experience has proven to be most profitable.

In view of the reason heretofore given for placing mileage books on sale, it would seem that the requirement now that these books should be exchanged for tickets puts a double expense upon the railroad, and it has been suggested that the reason therefor is the desire to discourage the public from buying the mileage books which the railroads agreed to issue provided the state would raise the passenger fare to 2½ cents.

If the defendant had shown that in fact the plaintiff was not the holder of a mileage book, and that his ticket was obtained of the agent by misrepresentations, the defense would admit of consideration. But here it is not denied that the plaintiff owned a mileage book, had shown it to this same conductor on this same train on his way up that morning, that in exchange for mileage out of that book he had obtained this ticket from the defendant's agent, that the conductor, evidently doubting his right upon that state of facts to ditch the plaintiff, wired to headquarters, and the company with knowledge of these facts ordered him put off. The ticket on its face recited the number of the mileage book, the company's record shows that the plaintiff had bought it, and the conductor had seen it in his hands that morning. Besides, the station agent who sold the ticket in exchange for the mileage was accessible.

Thus with the money of the plaintiff for this passage in its treasury and with ample proof of the fact as shown by the ticket issued in exchange for such mileage the defendant put the plaintiff off its train without returning his ticket or refunding the money which he had paid to the company for it and for which the ticket was a receipt. This conduct was arbitrary, unreasonable, and unjust, and the defendant should be made to pay such damages as a jury should deem a fair compensation for the humiliation and wrong it has thereby inflicted upon the plaintiff.

ALLEN, J. (dissenting). The opinion of the court, as announced by Mr. Justice BROWN, if carried to its legitimate conclusion, will permit common carriers to make contracts for mileage upon their own terms, and, however unreasonable any stipulation may be, it will be binding because, as he says, it is a special contract based upon a consideration. I think the error consists in assuming that the parties to the contract are upon equal terms, and, in a matter of this importance, that we ought not to go outside of the facts of this case, and prejudge questions not before us.

The question does not arise as to whether the General Assembly has the power to compel common carriers to issue mileage books because they are making such contracts, and I see no reason for suggesting that the power does not exist until the question is presented, nor for intimating that other, and perhaps more stringent, regulations may be adopted.

It is admitted in this case that the plaintiff had a mileage book, which is said in Harvey v. Railroad, 153 N. C. 571, 69 S. E. 627, to constitute a contract of carriage, subject to certain restrictive stipulations for a wrongful breach of which the company may, under given conditions, expel the holder from its train.

The restrictive conditions, so far as applicable to this case, are that a ticket shall be procured on the mileage book, and that when the ticket is presented to the conductor, the mileage book shall accompany it. The first of these conditions was complied with, and the plaintiff was on the train of the defendant with a ticket which he had lawfully procured upon his mileage book. He did not present his mileage book to the conductor with his ticket, and was expelled from the train. The question is therefore presented, under the rule adopted in the Harvey Case, as to whether the failure to present the mileage book with the ticket was a wrongful breach of the stipulation in the contract, created by issuing the mileage book, which justified the expulsion of the plaintiff from the train under the conditions then existing.

I think there is evidence that there was no wrongful breach of the stipulation, and, if so, the judgment of nonsuit should be set aside and a new trial awarded. I assume that the conductor has the right to demand the mileage book, when necessary to identify the holder, or for the purpose of seeing that the ticket presented corresponds with it; but I deny that he has any right to make such demand for the annoyance of the passenger, or in order that he may assert his authority. In this case, the plaintiff went from Charlotte to Ellenboro on the morning of the day he was expelled, and presented to the conductor his ticket and mileage book. There was a controversy at the time as to the right to see the book; the plaintiff telling the conductor to look at it good, as he would not see it again, and also informing him that he would be back that afternoon. He was expelled on the return trip from Ellenboro by the same conductor, who had compared the ticket and the mileage book on the morning of that day, and after he had accepted the ticket from the plaintiff, which he retained, and had been reminded of the conversation about the mileage book on the trip to Ellenboro. This, as it seems to me, furnishes some evidence that the demand to see the mileage book was not in good faith.

On petition for rehearing. Petition dismissed.

For former opinion, see 152 N. C. 472, 68 S. E. 190.

W. E. Daniel and Claude Kitchin, for appellant. M. L. Travis, Geo. Green, J. H. Pou, Rutledge & Hagood, Mordecai & Gadsden, and J. C. Spooner, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a petition to rehear the above-entitled case which was decided at spring term, 1910, and is reported in 152 N. C. 473, 68 S. E. 190.

A careful consideration of the briefs and arguments of counsel upon the rehearing have not disclosed any matter or authority that was overlooked by us at the former hearing. The case was then presented ably and learnedly by counsel with a full citation of the authorities, and, while it has been again argued with still more elaboration, nothing has been brought forward which induces us to change the opinion of the case we then held or the conclusion we reached.

[1] As to the arbitration of the controversy between George P. Phillips and the Roanoke Navigation & Water Power Company, and the award of Judge Armfield and Mr. Lanier, who were the arbitrators, we are still of the opinion that the submission to arbitration did not embrace the matters involved in this suit. The various controversies pending between Phillips and the Navigation Company and recited in the preamble of the submission are not set forth with sufficient particularity to enable us to determine their exact nature and extent, but it sufficiently appears that the question to be decided by the arbitrators was whether the Navigation Company could enlarge the canal on its own land and enjoy the use of the water of the Roanoke river, as it was accustomed to do at and before that time, without the consent of Phillips, and the arbitrators answered both questions affirmatively. A careful reading of the submission and award will show conclusively that the question now raised as to the right of the defendant, as successor to the Navigation Company, to dam up Little river by extending the present obstruction from bank to bank, so as to deprive lower proprietors altogether of the use of its waters, was not involved in that submission and award. The Navigation Company was making no such claim as against Phillips, and it is clear that the arbitrators, both among the most eminent lawyers of the state, did not understand that they had been asked to decide any such question. But, if they did so think, it is sufficient to say that the award does not disclose any attempt by them to render any such decision. So far as the use of the waters of Roanoke river was involved in the arbitration, the only question was whether the Navigation Company could exercise the rights and privileges with respect to the waters of the river which were conferred by its charter without the consent of Phillips, and the arbitrators, in making their award upon this part of the submission, use the language of the charter (Priv. Acts 1885, c. 57) in defining the rights of the Navigation Company in the river, without any reference to a larger and more comprehensive use thereafter, and without any suggestion in regard to it. It may be added to what we formerly said upon this subject, and to what we have already stated herein, that, even if the arbitrators had made any such ruling, it could bind and conclude the plaintiff only to the extent of its ownership of the land it acquired by purchase from Phillips, and not the other land below the Phillips tract, which will be injuriously affected by damming the river. Foster v. Parham, 74 N. C. 92; Kissam v. Gaylord, 46 N. C. 294; 16 Cyc. 695.

The agreement of May 5, 1897, which may not inappropriately be called a modus vivendi, cannot be allowed to prejudice the rights of the plaintiff so far as the matters now in controversy are concerned. It was manifestly not intended to have any such effect. The parties carefully guarded their rights against any such inference from their arrangement which was made to provide temporary relief for the parties pending a final adjustment or settlement of their controversies. This will appear from the language of the agreement. Defendant expressly stipulated that the license or permission therein granted by plaintiff should not be construed as a waiver or a concession to the Roanoke Navigation & Water Power Company "of any of its rights, franchises, and privileges to have the waters of Roanoke river flow by and through and upon its property to the extent it is entitled to use and enjoy said waters for any purposes for which it has the right to apply the same." And the plaintiff agreed that the license or permission therein granted the defendant should not be construed "as a waiver of or concession to the Roanoke Rapids Power Company of any of its rights, franchises, and privileges to draw the waters of Roanoke river into its canal to the extent and for the purpose it was entitled so to do." It would not be right, and of course not just, to permit defendant to construe or use that agreement in a way contrary to its own express stipulation.

The correspondence of the parties shows that plaintiff was all the time denying the right of defendant to use more of the water of the river than was necessary for the purpose of navigation, and warning defendant that it would assert its right to damages for any greater diversion of the water from the river into the canal. In that correspondence, at or about the time the said agreement was made, the following letters passed between the parties. Defendant wrote to plaintiff: "It is only necessary to refer to two statements contained in your communication: First the claim that your company 'under and by virtue of its charter owns the right to the exclusive use of so much of the waters of the Roanoke river as it may need for navigation, manufacturing or other purposes, now or at any future time,' and, secondly, that 'it objects to any use on your part (meaning the undersigned company) of the waters of the said river, or the construction of any dam or other works that will in any manner injure, impair or interfere with its property, rights, franchises or privileges.'" Plaintiff replied: "We do not propose, in the construction and maintenance of our works, to interfere with or encroach upon your company's property, rights, franchises and privileges 'in any unreasonable manner, to the substantial injury' of your corporation. We deny that you have any right, exclusive or otherwise, now or at any future time, to use the waters of Roanoke river for purposes other than navigation. The sole purpose of the incorporation of the Roanoke Navigation Company was to remove the obstructions in Roanoke river, from Halifax westward, so as to afford a safe and uninterrupted passage for boats carrying freight and adapted to the limited capacity of the stream. The quantity of water appropriated and drawn through the canal of that company at the time when the river was the only channel of commerce and in public demand and favor did not perceptibly affect the flow down the natural channels of the stream. The surplus water which continued to flow down these natural channels belongs to the owners of the water rights on the margin of the stream below." It then notifies the defendant that it will defend its rights as a lower riparian proprietor against any encroachment of the defendant by a greater diversion of the waters of Roanoke than it is authorized under the law to create by obstructions in the river. Then followed the agreement which we have before mentioned, by which active controversy was suspended and all rights of the parties reserved. It is useless to pursue this subject any further.

This brings us to a construction of the judgment in Bass v. Navigation Company, 111 N. C. 439, 16 S. E. 402, 19 L. R. A. 247, which, the defendant contends, brings into play the rule of stare decisis as to the issues involved in the present suit, so far as the same questions were decided in that case as are raised in this one. We have re-examined that case with the greatest care, and are unable to see that the issues in the two cases are at all identical. The fifth headnote states with sufficient accuracy the points decided in the Bass Case. It is as follows: "The Roanoke Navigation Company, having acquired the right of way through the plaintiff's land, permitted her, by parol license, to erect in 1852 a private bridge over the canal * * * which she has continuously used ever since until it was removed by the defendant, the purchaser and successor of the said company, in 1890 when engaged in improving the property. Held (1) that such possession did not raise a presumption of a grant to the easement to maintain the bridge; (2) that the right to the fee in the condemned land did not revert to the original owner, or those claiming under him, upon the dissolution of the original corporation; (3) that the license could be revoked, and, being revoked, the defendant had a right to remove it without paying compensation to the owner."

Justice Avery in that case says distinctly that the only reasonable interpretation of the charter of the defendant (Priv. Acts 1885, c. 57) is "consistent with the general purpose to permit the use of the water of the canal for mills in subordination to the main object of using it as an artery of commerce." The company was required, if convenient and possible to do so, to make the "canal answer both the purposes of navigation and water-works." He does state that "the new company is now contending for the privilege of using the water itself and farming it out for the purpose of manufacturing," but he does not pass upon that contention, as it was not one of the questions in the case, and besides it will be noted that what he says in respect to this claim does not extend so far as to embrace the right to the exclusive use of the entire flow of the Roanoke river. He refers only to the assertion of a right to use the canal in its then state or condition with the wing dam extending only partly across the river for the said purposes.

The leading question in the case is whether the defendant, as successor of the Roanoke Navigation Company, can appropriate all of the waters of Little river to its own use by extending its dam to the other bank and thereby depriving the plaintiff, a lower riparian proprietor, of all use of the stream which, as it alleges, will result in the destruction of its property. We held before that it could not be done, and we are still of the same opinion. In order to show that the defendant has no such right, we may well confine ourselves to a consideration of the Private Laws of 1885, c. 57, and the Private Acts of 1891, c. 2, being the amended charters of the two companies, without entering upon a discussion of the plaintiff's rights as a lower riparian owner in order to demonstrate that it has no such rights which the general law recognizes and will protect against invasion or impairment by the defendant.

In our former opinion we stated that the right of the defendant to use the waters of the canal under the Acts of 1817 and 1885 was incidental to the public navigation of the river. In other words, that the defendant and its predecessor are authorized by those acts to use for the said purpose only the surplus water of the canal that would otherwise run to waste. We think now that this view is sustained by an important decision upon the subject which was rendered in Kaukauna Co. v. Green Bay, etc., Canal Co., 142 U. S. 254, 12 Sup. Ct. 173, 35 L. Ed. 1004. As the case bears so directly upon the question now under discussion, we may be permitted to extract copiously from it: "It is probably true that it is beyond the competency of the state to appropriate to itself the property of individuals for the sole purpose of creating a water power to be leased for manufacturing purposes. This would be a case of taking the property of one man for the benefit of another, which is not a constitutional exercise of the right of eminent domain. But if, in the erection of a public dam for a recognized public purpose, there is necessarily produced a surplus of water, which may properly be used for manufacturing purposes, there is no sound reason why the state may not retain to itself the power of controlling or disposing of such water as an incident of its right to make such improvement."

Again at page 274 of 142 U. S., at page 278 of 12 Sup. Ct. (35 L. Ed. 1004), the court says: "In Little Miami Elevator Co. v. Cincinnati, 30 Ohio St. 629, 643, the right to lease surplus water for private use was recognized as an incident to the public use of a canal for the purpose of navigation, but it was held that such use was a subordinate one and that the right to the same might be terminated whenever the state, in the exercise of its discretion, abandoned or relinquished the public use. It was doubted whether the state could, after abandoning the canal as a public improvement, still reserve to itself the right to keep up a water power solely for private use and as a source of revenue. By so doing, says the court, "The water power would cease to be an incident to the public use, and the state would be engaged in the private enterprise of keeping up and renting water power after it ceased to act as a government in keeping up the public use." The same ruling was made by this court in Fox v. Cincinnati, 104 U. S. 783, 26 L. Ed. 928. See, also, Hubbard v. City of Toledo, 21 Ohio St. 379." The court also relies on Spaulding v. Lowell, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 71; French v. Inhabitants of Quincy, 3 Allen, 9; Attorney General v. Eau Claire, 37 Wis. 400; s. c., 40 Wis. 533—and then proceeds to say: "The true distinction seems to be between cases where the dam is erected for the express or apparent purpose of obtaining a water power to lease to private individuals, or where, in building a dam for a public improvement, a wholly unnecessary excess of water is created, and cases where the surplus is a mere incident to the public improvement and a reasonable provision for securing an adequate supply of water at all times for such improvement. No claim is made in this case that the water power was created for the purpose of selling or leasing it, or that the dam was erected to a greater height than was reasonably necessary to create a depth of water sufficient for the purposes of navigation at all seasons of the year. So long as the dam was erected for the bona fide purpose of furnishing an adequate supply of water for the canal and was not a colorable device for creating a water power, the agents of the state are entitled to great latitude of discretion in regard to the height of the dam and the head of water to be created; and, while the surplus in this case may be unnecessarily large, there does not seem to have been any bad faith or abuse of discretion on the part of those charged with the construction of the improvement. The courts should not scan too jealously their conduct in this connection if there be no reason to doubt that they were animated solely by a desire to promote the public interests, nor can they undertake to measure with nicety the exact amount of water required for the purpose of the public improvement. Under the circumstances of this case we think it within the power of the state to retain within its immediate control such surplus as might incidentally be created by the erection of the dam. So far, however, as land was actually taken for the purpose of this improvement, either for the dam itself or the embankments, or for the overflow, or so far as water was diverted from its natural course, or from the uses to which the riparian owner would otherwise have been entitled to devote it, such owner is undoubtedly entitled to compensation." Many authorities could be cited to sustain the views thus expressed, but we need not dwell longer upon this feature of the case.

The defendant purchased the property rights and franchises of the Roanoke Navigation Company at a judicial sale under a decree entered in a suit authorized by the Acts of 1874-75, c. 198, and by Private Acts of 1885, c. 57, the Legislature ratified what had been done and vested in the purchaser as a corporation "the franchises, rights, privileges, works, and property of the Roanoke Navigation Company, as acquired by the sale, including the right to use the water of the Roanoke river to be drawn through the canal for navigation, manufacturing, and other purposes, and the right to own, use, and enjoy the water power of the Roanoke River Navigation Company." With this restriction, set forth in the sixth section of the act: "That this act shall not materially interfere with the legal or vested rights of any person owning or operating mills in Northampton county, or prevent any person owning land on Roanoke river from operating or erecting any mill or other structure to be operated by water power, and using the water of said river for operating said mill or other structure: Provided, in so doing he shall not interfere with the legal or vested rights of any other person or corporation in any unreasonable manner."

By chapter 2 of the Private Laws of 1891 the incorporation of the plaintiff was validated and certain rights, franchises, and privileges conferred upon it, and, among others, the right to erect mills and factories on the lands which are situated on the Roanoke river, below those of the defendant, and to use the water power of the river for the purpose of operating the same, with this proviso: "That in the construction and maintenance of said dams, canals and waste-ways and in the development and use of said water power, neither the rights or property of persons owning lands on the Roanoke river, nor the rights, franchises, privileges or property of any other corporation, shall be interfered with or encroached upon in any unreasonable manner to the substantial injury of any other person or corporation." We think it is evident from these provisions that this right to use the water of the river for manufacturing purposes was conferred upon both corporations, with the restriction or qualification that in the use and enjoyment of those rights they should not unreasonably interfere with each other. Why should the Legislature give to the plaintiff the right to build mills and factories on its lands and to operate the same with power drawn from the river if it had already conferred upon the defendant rights and franchises in conflict with this grant and utterly destructive of it? It was clearly intended that both companies should use and enjoy this right to use the water of the river without unreasonable interference with each other.

[2] The very words of the proviso to the defendant's charter are that it shall not, in the exercise of its rights and privileges, "prevent any person owning land on Roanoke river from operating or erecting any mill or other structure to be operated by water power and using the water of said river for operating said mill or other structure." It further provided that any such lower proprietor in the use of this river and its water power should not interfere unreasonably with any other person or corporation. We do not think that the word "person," as used in the two charters, should have the restricted meaning which defendant's counsel insist upon. The context shows that it was intended to embrace corporations, and the law requires us to give it that meaning unless the statute clearly forbids it. Revisal, § 2831 (6). The legislative policy was a wise and just one. It permitted the defendant to use the waters of the river for manufacturing purposes in a reasonable manner; that is, so as not to interfere with a like reasonable use by lower proprietors on the stream. The Legislature did not intend to confer a monopoly in the use of the river upon the defendant. The language of the two statutes forbids that any such construction should be placed upon this provision and any such exclusive and extraordinary right conceded to the defendant.

The plaintiff has exercised its rights and privileges with respect to the river in strict accordance with the terms of the statute by returning the water diverted therefrom to the original channel before it reaches the land of any lower proprietor, and no one has complained of such use. The defendant may, perhaps, pursue a similar course and get the full benefit of all the water it needs for its purposes. There is no question of condemnation before us. It is admitted that any extension of defendant's dam will materially impair the plaintiff's works by withdrawing water from the river which is necessary to the successful operation thereof.

The following admission also appears in the case: "All the water drawn into defendant's canal is to develop power for manufacturing purposes and is used solely for those purposes; that said canal, by reason of the works of the defendant, is so disconnected from the river that boats cannot pass from one to the other; and that defendant has no purpose of opening up or using said canal for navigation purposes unless there should arise some public requirement therefor." Upon the facts thus admitted there has been a clear violation of the plaintiff's rights which were acquired by the Acts of 1885 and 1891. No one can safely venture to say that such a use of the river as is contemplated by the defendant is a reasonable one within the manifest meaning of those statutes. We need not consider what the plaintiff's rights are apart from the legislative grant.

We have assumed, for the sake of discussion, that the Legislature had the power to confer upon the parties the rights, franchises, and privileges, with respect to the waters of Roanoke river, which are named in the Acts of 1885 and 1891, and, if so, each party must accept and enjoy them subject to the conditions and restrictions annexed thereto.

[3] Having passed upon their respective rights under those statutes, it is unnecessary to decide whether the plaintiff has certain riparian rights, as the owner of land bounded by the river, which are property and valuable as such, and which cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously destroyed or impaired. Such rights, when once vested, though they must be enjoyed in proper subjection to the rights of the public, as, for instance, the right of navigation, it is said that the owner can only be deprived of them in accordance with established law, and, if necessary, that they be taken for the public good upon due compensation. Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 497, 19 L. Ed. 984. Nor is it material to inquire whether the river is navigable or unnavigable, as any right the defendant has as an upper riparian proprietor, and any acquired by the statutes to which we have referred, must be exercised with due regard to the rights of the plaintiff in the stream and subject to a reasonable use by it of the waters thereof for the purpose of generating power to operate its mills or factories. The plaintiff is not interfering with any lawful right to the water of this defendant or with the rights of any lower proprietor. It concedes the right of the defendant to use so much of the water as was required by its predecessor, and as it was appropriating at the time it extended its dam, but it denies that it can divert more than that quantity into its canal and unreasonably interfere with the plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of its property, and it is argued that, if defendant can thus encroach upon the plaintiff's water rights and privileges, it can stretch its dam across the entire river and deprive the plaintiff of all use of the water.

It having been admitted that the extension of defendant's dam beyond what is known in the case as the "wing dam" has and will seriously injure the defendant's works lower down the stream by preventing the natural flow of the water thereto, we held before and now decide that an injunction should issue as indicated in our former opinion.

We see no reason, after a protracted and careful consideration of the case, for reversing or modifying the original judgment.

Petition dismissed.

SEWARD v. RECEIVERS OF SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 22, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 32*)—BLACKLISTING STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION.

Laws 1909, c. 858, which provides that a former employer may, upon request from any other person to whom a discharged employe has applied for employment, give in writing a truthful statement of the reason for such discharge, read in the light of the common law existing prior to its enactment under which the employer could in good faith report all matters which he believed to be true concerning his employe, will not be held by the words "a truthful statement of the reason for such discharge" to limit the employer's right to the exact reasons for the discharge, so that upon an application the entire record of an engineer was properly given to other railroads to whom he applied for employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 244*)—STATEMENT OF CAUSE FOR DISCHARGE—ACTION.

Where it was within the scope of a railroad officer's employment to furnish a copy of the record of former employes to persons applying therefor, a statement in such report which was not of the character permitted to be given by Laws 1909, c. 858, was proper evidence against the company in an action for damages from the making of the improper report.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 32*)—BLACKLISTING.

A statement included in a report of a record of a former employe to the effect that he was at the time suing the company reporting was outside of the information requested and improper as not bearing upon the character and competency of the employe, and would not be rendered proper by the fact that it was true.

Brown, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Webb, Judge.

Action by R. H. Seward against the Receivers of the Seaboard Air Line Railway and the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This is an action to recover damages under chapter 858, Laws 1909, for preventing or attempting to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining employment with certain railroad companies as an engineer.

The plaintiff entered the employment of the defendant as engineer on the 31st of January, 1907, and was discharged on the 9th of January, 1909. After his discharge he applied to the Florida East Coast Railroad Company for employment, and this company, with the consent of the plaintiff, requested the defendant to give it a report of the record of the plaintiff, to which request the defendant replied on January 22, 1909, as follows: "As per your request of the 18th instant, I beg to give below the record of Engineman R. H. Seward: Entered service January 31, 1907. Charged with thirty days actual suspension for refusing to go out. Thirty days on account of accident. Thirty days actual suspension for damage on account of crown sheet to engine being damaged. Thirty days actual suspension for responsibility in connection with collision; and forty-five days record suspension for minor offenses, and dismissed January 9, 1909, for leaving station on time of another train, resulting in head-on collision." The plaintiff also applied to the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company for employment, and, upon request from said company for the record of the plaintiff, the defendant replied, on July 9, 1909, as follows: "As per your request of July 7th, beg to give below report of Engineman R. H. Seward while in our service, and will state further that this man is now suing the S. A. L. for personal injury. Entered service January 31, 1907. Charged with thirty days actual suspension for refusing to go out. Thirty days on account of accident. Thirty days actual suspension for damages to crown sheet of engine. Thirty days actual suspension for responsibility in connection with collision; and forty-five days record suspension for minor offenses, and dismissed January 9, 1909, for leaving station on time of another train, resulting in head-on collision." The plaintiff also applied to the Durham & Charlotte Railroad Company for employment, and, upon request of said company for the record of the plaintiff, the defendant replied, on December 15, 1909, as follows: "Yours of December 11th. Kindly find below record of R. H. Seward. Entered service January 31, 1907. Charged with thirty days actual suspension for refusing to go out. Thirty days on account of accident. Thirty days actual suspension for damage to crown sheet of engine. Thirty days actual suspension for responsibility in connection with collision; and forty-five days record suspension for minor offenses, and dismissed January 9, 1909, for leaving station on time of another train, resulting in head-on collision."

The action for personal injury referred to in the letter of the defendant of July 9, 1909, was commenced after the discharge of the plaintiff by the defendant, and was settled in October, 1909, by the payment of $1,350 to the plaintiff. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove that he was refused employment by the several companies to which he had applied by reason of the reports made by the defendant, and that the statements contained in the reports were false. He admitted, however, on cross-examination, that he was notified of each charge contained in the report, and had a hearing thereon, and there was no evidence that the report did not contain a true statement of the action of the defendant upon the charge.

The part of chapter 858, Laws 1909, relevant to this case, is as follows: "If any person, agent, company or corporation, after having discharged any employé from his or its service, shall prevent or attempt to prevent, by word or writing of any kind, such discharged employé from obtaining employment with any other person, company, or corporation, such person, agent, or corporation shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and such person, agent, company, or corporation shall be liable in penal damages to such discharged person, to be recovered by a civil action; but this section shall not be construed as prohibiting any person or agent of any company or corporation from informing, in writing, upon request, any other person, company, or corporation to whom such discharged person or employé has applied for employment, a truthful statement of the reason of such discharge."

The plaintiff contended: (1) That the defendant had no right, under the statute, to give the record of the plaintiff, and could do no more than state the reasons for his discharge. (2) That if the defendant could give the record of the plaintiff, it did not state it truthfully, and was actuated by malice.

The defendant contended: (1) That it had the right, upon request, to give the entire record of the plaintiff, and that its communications were privileged, and not actionable, in the absence of malice. (2) That there was no evidence of malice.

At the conclusion of the evidence, his honor, upon motion of the defendant, entered judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff accepted and appealed.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The statute under which this action is brought by its express terms embraces "any person, agent, company or corporation," and is applicable alike to all who employ labor. It must be read in the light of the common law as it existed prior to its enactment for the purpose of seeing wherein it was deficient, and of discovering the remedy intended to be supplied by the statute. Black on Interpretation of Laws, p. 232, says: "When any question arises as to the meaning or the scope of a statutory enactment, it is a good rule to compare it with the common law on the same subject, and to construe the statute with reference to that law. * * * No statute enters a field which was before entirely unoccupied. It either affirms, modifies, or repeals some portion of the previously existing law. In order, therefore, to form a correct estimate of its scope and effect, it is necessary to have a thorough understanding of the laws, both common and statutory, which heretofore were applicable to the same subject. Whether the statute affirms the rule of the common law on the same point, or whether it supplements it, supersedes it, or displaces it, the legislative enactment must be construed with reference to the common law; for in this way alone is it possible to reach a just appreciation of its purpose and effect. Again, the common law must be allowed to stand unaltered as far as is consistent with a reasonable interpretation of the new law." And again on page 110: "The intention of the Legislature in enacting a particular statute is not to be ascertained by interpreting the statute by itself alone, and according to the mere literal meaning of its words. Every statute must be construed in connection with the whole system of which it forms a part and in the light of the common law and of previous statutes upon the same subject. And the Legislature is not to be lightly presumed to have intended to reverse the policy of its predecessors or to introduce a fundamental change in long-established principles of law."

When we look to the common law, we find that the employer had the right to employ whom he pleased, and to discharge with or without reason, and that the employé could select the person whom he would serve, and had the right to quit the service at pleasure; the only limitation upon the exercise of the right by either being the terms of the contract of service.

"An employer has a right to select his employes according to what standard he may choose, though such standard be arbitrary or unreasonable. An employer certainly has a right to refuse to employ any one whom he knows to have left another employer in violation of a reasonable rule which both employers are seeking to enforce. * * * There are, however, limitations upon the rights of the employers in this matter. While the employé is bound by the reasonable rules of the employer as a part of the contract of employment, and may be reported to other employers for a breach of those rules, there is a correlative duty upon the employer not to report an employé wrongfully. The rule which enters into the contract of employment is as much a part of the contract of the employer as of the employé, and both are bound by it. The employer is strictly within his rights as long as he reports no employé for a violation of the rule except such as have actually violated it. When, however, he wrongfully makes such a report and an employé is thereby damaged, such employé has a right of action." Willis v. Mfg. Co., 120 Ga. 600, 48 S. E. 178, 1 Ann. Cas. 472.

"It is a part of every man's civil rights to enter into any lawful business, and to assume business relations with any person who is capable of making a contract. It is likewise a part of such rights to refuse to enter into business relations, whether such refusal be the result of reason, or of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. If he is wrongfully deprived of these rights, he is entitled to redress. Every person sui juris is entitled to pursue any lawful trade, occupation, or calling. It is part of his civil rights to do so. He is as much entitled to pursue his trade, occupation, or calling and be protected in it as is the citizen in his life, liberty, and property. Whoever wrongfully prevents him from doing so inflicts an actionable injury. For every injury suffered by reason of a violent or malicious act done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood, an action lies. Such an act is an invasion of legal rights. A man's trade, occupation, or profession may be injured to such an extent, by reason of a violent or malicious act, as would prevent him from making a livelihood. * * * A railroad company has the right to engage in its service whomsoever it pleases, and as part of its rights to conduct its business is the right to discharge any one from its service unless to do so would be in violation of contractual relations with the employé. It is the duty of a railroad company to keep in its service persons who are capable of discharging their important duties in a careful and skillful manner. The public interest, as well as the vast property interests of the company, require that none other should be employed by it. Its duty in this regard, and its right to discharge an employé, does not imply the right to be guilty of a violent or malicious act which results in the injury of the discharged employé's calling. The company has the right to keep a record of the causes for which it discharges an employé, but, in the exercise of this right, the duty is imposed to make a truthful statement of the cause of the discharge." Hundley v. Railroad, 105 Ky. 164, 48 S. W. 430, 63 L. R. A. 289, 88 Am. St. Rep. 298.

The intelligence and skill of the employé were regarded as his capital which he had the right to sell, and which the employer had the right to buy, and an unlawful interference with the right of either was actionable.

As was said in Willner v. Silverman, 109 Md. 356, 71 Atl. 964, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 895: "In furtherance of their common welfare, and in settlement of their oftentimes conflicting interests, both employers and employés stand upon a plane of perfect equality before the law, enjoying the same freedom and amenable to the same restrictions." When the employé was discharged, he could not require a statement of the reasons for the discharge, and the employer was under no legal obligation to give to any one, with whom he sought employment, his record or character, while in his service, although he could do so upon request, and according to some of the authorities voluntarily, and there would be no liability in damages if the report was made in good faith and in the belief that it was true, although in fact false; but, if made maliciously, it was actionable.

"An ex-employer may, without rendering himself liable in an action for slander or libel, in good faith, state orally or in writing, and as well without as with a previous request, all that he may believe to be true concerning his ex-employé. It appearing that the publication was made in what is termed 'giving a character,' the presumption is that it is made bona fide, and the burden is on the plaintiff to show malice in the publisher, i. e., either that he had an intent to injure the person spoken of, or that he did not believe in the truth of the statement published. Where no intent to injure exists, a belief in the truth of the language published is a legal excuse for making the publication; but, where an intent to injure exists, a belief in the truth of the language published is not a legal excuse for making the publication. Malice or want of good faith is established when it is shown that the matter published was false within the knowledge of the publisher; or malice may be established by showing a bad motive in making the publication, as that it was made more publicly than was necessary to protect the interests of the parties concerned, or that it contained matter not relevant to the occasion, or that the publisher entertained ill-will toward the person whom the publication concerned." Townshend on Slander and Libel, § 245, p. 420.

"The instance that occurs most frequently in ordinary life of this first class of privileged communications is where the defendant is asked as to the character of his former servant by one to whom he or she has applied for a situation. A duty is thereby cast upon the former master to state fully and honestly all that he knows, either for or against the servant; and any communication made in the performance of this duty is clearly privileged for the sake of the common convenience of society, even though it should turn out that the former master was mistaken in some of his statements. But if the master, knowing that the servant deserves a good character, yet, having some grudge against him, or from some other malicious motive, deliberately states what he knows to be false and gives his late servant a bad character, then such a communication is not a performance of the duty, and therefore is not privileged. There is in fact in such a case evidence of express malice which takes the case out of the privilege.' " Odgers on Libel and Slander, p. 199.

"One of the most ordinary occasions of every day life which brings into existence the question of privilege in regard to communications is when one person, either voluntarily or in answer to an inquiry, states his own views to another concerning the character of some individual who has left his service and seeks to obtain employment elsewhere. A duty is thereby cast upon the former master to state fully and honestly all that he knows either for or against the servant; and any communication made in the performance of this duty is clearly privileged for the sake of the common convenience of society, even though it should turn out that the former master was mistaken in some of his statements. But if the master, knowing that the servant deserves a good character, yet, having some grudge against him, or from some other malicious motive, deliberately states what he knows to be false and gives his late servant a bad character, then such a communication is not a performance of the duty, and therefore is not privileged. There is in fact in such a case evidence of malice which 'takes the case out of the privilege.' " Newell on Defamation, Libel, and Slander, p. 490.

"It seems to us that any person, who upon reasonable grounds believes himself to be possessed of knowledge which, if true, does or may affect the rights and interests of another, has the right in good faith to communicate such belief to that other, and he may make the communication with or without request, and whether he has or has not personally any interest in the subject-matter of the communication." Railroad v. Richmond, 73 Tex. 575, 11 S. W. 558, 4 L. R. A. 280, 15 Am. St. Rep. 794.

The report was regarded as privileged, and, in the absence of express malice, no cause of action could be based on its publication; this doctrine resting on the moral obligation of the employer. The life and limb of the employé were largely dependent on the intelligence, skill, and prudence of his co-employés, and it was the duty of the employer to exercise care to see that no one was admitted to the common employment, who was careless or incompetent. The employer owed the same duty to the public, whose lives and property were committed to his care, and this duty could not be performed unless one employer could, without fear of liability, communicate freely his honest belief as to the standing of a discharged employé, and the law therefore said that such communications were presumed to be made in the performance of a duty, and, in the absence of express malice, they could not be made the basis of an action.

"The general doctrine of privilege, as applied to actions for libel and slander, is founded upon the reasonable view that in the intercourse between members of society, and in proceedings in legislative bodies and in courts of justice, occasions arise when it becomes necessary or proper that the character and acts of individuals should be considered and made the subject of statement or comment, and that, in the interests of society, a party making disparaging statements in respect to another on such a lawful occasion should not be subjected to civil responsibility in an action of this character, although such statements are untrue. The law of privilege has been stated by judges in different forms of words, but the comprehensive definition of Blackburn, J., in Davie v. Sneed, L. R. (5 Q. B.) 611, as applied to communications between individuals, is especially worthy of notice. 'Where,' says that learned judge, 'a person is so situated that it becomes right in the interests of society that he should tell a third person certain facts, then if he, bona fide and without malice, does tell them it is a privileged communication.' There are many examples in the books of communications held to be privileged where the same words, if used other than on a lawful occasion, would be libelous, but which, by reason of the occasion when they were published or spoken, will not sustain an action, although proved to be untrue, unless proved to have been spoken maliciously. The cases of charges made in giving the character of a servant, or in answering an authorized inquiry concerning the solvency of a tradesman, or where the communication was confidential between parties having a common interest in the subject to which it relates, are illustrations." Moore v. Bank, 123 N. Y. 424, 25 N. E. 1049, 11 L. R. A. 753.

"It [a report by an employer] was made upon a subject-matter in which the person communicating it had a deep interest, as well as a duty, to perform, and was made to a person having a corresponding interest and duty. If one of defendant's servants had demonstrated his unfitness for a position held by him, it was for its interest, as well as for the interest of the public, that steps should be taken which would render the servant qualified and capable, or that he be dismissed. It would not only be for the interest of the company to remedy the evil, and to act so as to stop all future complaints, but it would be a matter of duty to the public. * * * The communication being of a privileged character, and having been made on a privileged occasion only, the prima facie effect was to overcome and rebut the quality or element of malice, and to cast upon plaintiff the necessity of showing malice in fact; that is, that the defendant was actuated by ill will in what it caused to be done and said with a design causelessly and wantonly to injure the plaintiff. The law is that a communication, to be privileged, must be made upon a proper occasion, from a proper motive, and must be based upon reasonable or probable cause. When not made in good faith, the law does not imply malice from the communication itself, as in the ordinary case of libel. Actual malice must be proved before there can be a recovery, and, in the absence of such proof, the plaintiff cannot recover." Hebner v. Railroad, 78 Minn. 291, 80 N. W. 1129, 79 Am. St. Rep. 387.

We cannot think it was the intention of the General Assembly to withdraw these wholesome safeguards from employes and the public, and that the statute may be effective and will serve a useful purpose without abrogating the principles of the common law. In speaking of a statute having the same objects in view, as the one under consideration, the Supreme Court of Minnesota says: "The act does not attempt to interfere with the right of an employer to discharge an employe for cause or without cause. It does not seek to prohibit an employer from communicating to other employers the nature and character of his employes when the facts would be for their interest. * * * It is the purpose of this law to protect employes in the enjoyment of those natural rights and privileges guaranteed them by the Constitution, viz., the right to sell their labor and acquire property thereby." State v. Justus, 85 Minn. 282, 88 N. W. 760, 58 L. R. A. 757, 89 Am. St. Rep. 550.

Prior to the ratification of the act of 1909, statements as to the character and competency of discharged employes were frequently made voluntarily, and not upon request, and were sometimes prompted by malicious motives when the motive was difficult of proof; when malice and the loss of service, as the result of the statement, were proven, the damages were difficult of admeasurement; and when there was no loss of employment, but a mere attempt to prevent the employe from obtaining it, no compensatory damages could be awarded. The act remedies these defects, and under its provisions a statement as to the standing of a discharged employe is not privileged unless made upon request, and whether privileged or not, if made maliciously, and the employer has thereby prevented or attempted to prevent the discharged employe from obtaining employment, the jury may award penal damages.

"Malice or want of good faith is established when it is shown that the matter published was false within the knowledge of the publisher, or malice may be established by showing a bad motive in making the publication; as that it was made more publicly than was necessary to protect the interest of the parties concerned, or that it contained matter not relevant to the occasion, or that the publisher entertained ill will toward the person whom the publication concerned." Town. S. & L. § 245.

The employer has the right, under the statute upon request, to give "a truthful statement of the reason for such discharge," and we do not give to these words the restricted meaning contended for by the plaintiff, as in our opinion they include the record of the employe, and if the statement is so made, in the honest belief that it is true, and not maliciously, the employer is protected.

The Supreme Court of Texas, in discussing a similar statute, says in Railroad v. Hixon, 137 S. W. 345: "By the term, 'a true statement' of the cause of his discharge, is meant the employer shall give fairly, honestly, and in good faith the ground or cause upon which the master acted. It was meant that he should not be permitted to discharge for one reason, and, when called on to give a statement thereof, assign a different reason."

[2] Applying these principles to the evidence, and it appearing that the plaintiff admits that he was suspended for alleged misconduct 165 days during a service of a little less than two years with the defendant, that he was given a hearing as to each charge, and knew of the record that was made against him, and that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of which he was a member, refused to prosecute his appeal when he was finally discharged, we would not hesitate to affirm the judgment of nonsuit but for the fact that the plaintiff says that the charges contained in the report made by the defendant are not true, and the further fact that the defendant incorporated in its letter of July 9, 1909, written by its superintendent, Poole, the statement, "and will state further that this man is now suing the S. A. L. for personal injury," which could not be a part of the record of the plaintiff while in the employment of the defendant, nor a reason for his discharge, as the suit was instituted after he left the service of the defendant. This statement is competent evidence against the defendant because it was within the scope of Poole's employment to furnish a copy of the plaintiff's record, and it was made while performing this duty, and as said by Justice Brown in Younce v. Lumber Co., 155 N. C. 241, 71 S. E. 330: "It is well settled that the declarations of officers of a corporation are competent only when made in line of declarant's official duty, and while discharging it in reference to a transaction for the company."

[3] It is not a sufficient answer as to the effect of this evidence to say that the statement is true, as it was not information the defendant was requested to give, and did not bear on the character or competency of the plaintiff, and was calculated to prejudice him.

[4] There is also evidence that the action instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant referred to in the letter of July 9, 1909, was to recover damages for personal injuries sustained in a collision, which was one of the most serious charges against the plaintiff; that this action was settled in October, 1909, by the payment of $1,350 to the plaintiff, and that thereafter the defendant, in its letter of December 15, 1909, retained this same charge against the plaintiff.

These facts at least permit the inference, which the jury are not compelled to adopt, that the defendant would not have paid the sum of $1,350 to the plaintiff voluntarily, on account of injuries sustained in a collision, if he had been guilty of wrongdoing, and that the retention and publication of the charge after the settlement was with knowledge that it was not true. The statute is a wise one and will serve a useful purpose if judiciously administered, but juries in the assessment of damages, when they can be recovered, should mark the line and discriminate clearly between the employé who has honestly endeavored to perform his duty, who is entitled to the highest consideration, and the negligent and reckless employé who is a menace to his coemployés and the public.

Upon a review of the whole record, we are of opinion that there was some evidence for the consideration of the jury, and a new trial is therefore ordered.

New trial.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). The statute under which this action is brought, which is correctly copied in the opinion of the court, is a very useful piece of legislation, and is intended as well for the protection of the traveling public as for the benefit of all employés who discharge their duty in a faithful manner. Taking the statute as a whole, it seems to be very plain in its meaning. The gravamen of the cause of action is an attempt to prevent by word or writing of any kind which is false a discharged employé from obtaining employment. The statute expressly excepts from its operation any cause of action when the statement made by the employer contains a truthful statement of such discharge.

In this case the plaintiff is an engineer. He belonged to a class of men who daily take their lives in their hands for our benefit, and to a profession whose unpretending, self-sacrificing heroism has been immortalized in song and story. Of all professions which are interested in having the records of their members made known for the benefit of the efficient and faithful, the profession of a locomotive engineer stands first. In order that publicity may be given to such records, the statute expressly authorizes the giving of a truthful statement as to why an employé has been discharged. If the statement is truthful, it is immaterial what the motive of the master may be in furnishing. If his motive is to prevent the employment in a position of immense responsibility of an incompetent or unfaithful person, then the motive is a laudable one.

The charge which the plaintiff makes in his complaint is that the defendant company, through its superintendent of motive power, Poole, attempted to prevent his getting employment with certain railroad companies by means of furnishing them with an untruthful statement of his service and record with the defendant company. These letters are published in the opinion of the court. I am constrained to hold that the testimony of the plaintiff himself shows that every material statement set out in these letters has been substantiated by his own evidence, and that upon such testimony the learned judge of the superior court was justified in sustaining the motion to nonsuit.

The plaintiff's evidence tends to prove that he entered the employment of the defendant January 31, 1907, and was dismissed January 9, 1909. During his employment there was in force on the defendant railway the "merit system" whereby an engineer received demerits for bad conduct, and, upon receiving a given number within 12 months, he was discharged. If he did not receive any demerits, then he was given a good mark. During the time of the employment of the plaintiff, a period less than two years, he was actually suspended for 120 days on account of accidents and other charges, and also received 45 days record suspension.

The plaintiff admitted upon cross-examination that he was present and his examination taken each time he was suspended, and that he was notified of his suspension. He admits that, under the rules of the company, he had a right to appeal in each instance in which he was not satisfied with the action of the company in suspending him, and that such appeal could be prosecuted personally by him, or by a committee composed of members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. The plaintiff further admits, although he was suspended on so many occasions, he appealed only on one occasion when he was discharged, and that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers refused to take up the appeal for him, even after he had asked them to do so. The plaintiff testified also in respect to the trials by the officers of the defendant in regard to each of the items set forth in the three letters as follows: "These were all investigated. Was notified, was present at each investigation, but did not appeal except in the last case." It is further admitted by the plaintiff upon his examination that, when he applied to the Florida East Coast Railroad, and the Norfolk-Southern, and the Durham & Charlotte, the three railroads to whom these letters were addressed, he authorized the officers of these railroads to apply to the defendant company for his record, and that this record furnished by the superintendent of motive power, Poole, was sent to the said railroad companies at their request, and by the permission of the plaintiff himself. It appears to me to be almost incontrovertible that, upon a comparison of the plaintiff's own evidence with the record furnished to the said companies, every fact set out in the record is established by the plaintiff himself.

It is admitted in the opinion of the court that the judgment of nonsuit would be sustained by the majority of my Brethren upon the plaintiff's own evidence except for the fact that in his letter of July 9, 1909, Poole made this statement, "and will state further that this man is now suing the Seaboard Air Line for personal injury." The majority seem to be of opinion that this statement affords some slight foundation for this action because the suit was instituted after the plaintiff left the service of the defendant. But the record shows that this suit was pending at the time the request was made for the plaintiff's record, and that the statement was a truthful statement. It is not pretended in the letter that it was a part of his record. On the contrary, the language shows that it refers to a period after his discharge, for the writer says, "That this man is now suing the Seaboard Air Line for personal injury." It was a statement of a fact admitted to be true, and which could be easily discovered while examining the records of the court. Surely it cannot be held to be an evidence of malice because the writer of the letter stated a fact which was manifest to all who chose to examine the public records of the courts of the state. If this is the only ground upon which this action can possibly be maintained, then, with all deference to my Brethren, it appears to me too trivial to receive a moment's consideration.

There is another reason which impels me to the conclusion that the plaintiff cannot recover because of such statement inserted in the letter of July 9th, and that is because it was an unauthorized act of Poole, outside of and beyond his duty, and in no sense ratified by the defendant. While Poole in his capacity as superintendent of motive power was authorized to communicate a truthful statement as to why the plaintiff was discharged, it appears upon the face of the letter itself that the statement in regard to the suit was not a reason for the discharge of the plaintiff, because the suit was brought long after his discharge, and it was therefore the unauthorized act of Poole, and in no way connected with his duty as a servant or officer of the defendant company.

In Wood on Master & Servant, § 279, p. 535, it is said: "The question usually presented is whether, as a matter of fact or of law, the injury was received under such circumstances that, under the employment, the master can be said to have authorized the act; for, if he did not, he cannot be made chargeable for its consequences, because, not having been done under authority from him, express or implied, it can in no sense be said to be his act."

It is admitted that it was within the scope of Poole's employment to furnish a copy of the plaintiff's record and to give a truthful statement of the reason for his discharge, but it was not within the scope of his employment to inject into that statement matters entirely foreign to it and entirely disconnected with it, and which appear upon the face of the statement to have transpired long after the discharge. It seems to me that the act of inserting such foreign matter was not at all incident to the performance of the duties intrusted to Poole by the defendant company, any more than an amanuensis would be authorized to inject the emanations of his own brain into a composition dictated by his master. I think this position is fully supported by the decisions of this court in Daniel v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 816, 67 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 718; Jackson v. Telegraph Company, 139 N. C. 347, 51 S. E. 1015, 70 L. R. A. 738; and Sawyer v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 1, 54 S. E. 793, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716, 9 Ann. Cas. 440.

It is not pretended in this case that there was any express authority given to Poole to make any statement concerning the plaintiff upon behalf of the defendant company which had taken place after the plaintiff had ceased to be in its employment. The relation of master and servant had then terminated, and this extraneous matter was inserted by Poole, as appears upon the face of the letter, upon his own authority, and there is no pretense that it was ever ratified by the defendant. On the contrary, it appears upon the face of the communication to be Poole's act and not that of the company.

The principal is not liable, as stated by Mr. Justice Walker in Daniel v. Railroad, "when the agent steps aside from the duties assigned to him by the principal to gratify some personal animosity, or to give vent to some private feeling of his own."

ROAD TRUSTEES v. GEO. C. BROWN & CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 28, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 840*) — REVIEW — QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

Where, in an action for penalties for failure to make a monthly report, begun under Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 115, passed to provide a better system for improving public roads of Macon county, and which, by section 15, provides that any lumber company, corporation, or persons engaged in the lumber business shall pay a special license, that such corporations shall make a monthly report to the road trustees, and that a penalty for $10 per day for each day they fail to make a report shall be assessed, a demurrer attacking the constitutionality of the statute was overruled, the only point actually presented for review on appeal is the power of the Legislature to require reports by lumber companies as to the quantity of lumber hauled by them each month.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3301-3314; Dec. Dig. § 840.*]

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 165*)—REGULATION OF USE—STATUTES—POWER OF LEGISLATURE.

The state is sovereign as to the regulation of its dirt roads, so that the requirement of Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 115, § 15, that persons engaged in the lumber business shall make a report of the lumber hauled on the county roads in Macon county, is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

3. HIGHWAYS (§ 122*)—TAXATION—UNIFORMITY—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 115, § 15, which provides that any lumber company or person engaged in that business using the public roads in Macon county to haul mill logs, lumber, or other heavy material, shall pay a license, or privilege tax, of two cents per mile on each thousand feet of lumber, and shall make a monthly report to the road trustees of the amount of feet hauled each month, does not violate Const. art. 5, § 3, which requires taxation by uniform rate on all property, being a license or privilege tax on those engaged in the lumber business, and uniform as to all persons falling within that class.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 380, 393; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 230*)—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW.

Nor is the law in violation of U. S. Const. amend. 14, providing that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, for this inhibition neither requires equality in taxes levied by the state, nor deprives it of its police power, and the license taxes in this case are based on a uniform and reasonable classification, designed to compel those most injuring the public roads to assist in the repair thereof.

Brown and Allen, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Macon County; Lane, Judge.

Action by the Road Trustees of Macon County against Geo. C. Brown & Co. From a judgment for plaintiffs in the superior court on appeal from a justice of the peace, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Johnston, for appellant. J. F. Ray and Johnston & Horn, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. [1] Chapter 115, Pub. Local Laws 1911, entitled "An act to provide a better system for working and keeping up the public roads of Macon county," is a substitute for the former system of working the roads in that county. Section 15 of said chapter provides "any lumber company, corporation, person or persons engaged in the lumber business and desiring to use any of the public roads of any of the townships of Macon county, for the purpose of carrying on its or their business of hauling, either by itself or themselves, or by hiring or contracting with other persons, mill logs, lumber, or other heavy material with log wagons, log carts, or other heavy vehicles, shall pay a license or privilege tax of two (2) cents per mile on each 1,000 feet of mill logs, lumber, or other heavy material so hauled." Then this section provides that such corporations, firms, or persons shall make a monthly report to the road trustees of the amount of feet hauled each month, and a penalty of $10 per day for each day they fail to make report, etc. This action was begun before a justice of the peace for accumulated penalties aggregating $50 for failure to make the monthly reports required by the statute. On appeal to the superior court by the defendant from the judgment of $50 imposed by the justice, the defendant filed a written demurrer, alleging that the statute was unconstitutional because in violation of the fourteenth amendment and in violation of Const. N. C. art. 5, § 3, which requires taxation by uniform rule of all property, and also because in violation of article 1, § 7, of the state Constitution, which prohibits special privileges, and also in violation of article 1, § 17, which prohibits the deprivation of life, liberty, or property except by the law of the land. The demurrer was overruled. The only point actually presented is as to the power of the Legislature to require reports by lumber companies of the quantity of lumber hauled by them each month over the roads of Macon county.

[2] The statute expressly provides this penalty for failure to perform that duty. The failure to pay is made a misdemeanor subject to a fine of $50, and the civil action for failure to make the report is expressed to be in addition to the fine for failure to pay. There can be no question as to the right of the Legislature to require such report. The state is certainly sovereign as to the regulation of its dirt roads. State v. Sharp, 125 N. C. 632, 34 S. E. 264, 74 Am. St. Rep. 663; State v. Wheeler, 141 N. C. 776, 53 S. E. 358, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1139, 115 Am. St. Rep. 700. This would dispose of this appeal. But the question was debated before us upon the broader proposition whether the act was unconstitutional by reason of the tax being a discrimination, and therefore in violation of the constitutional provisions referred to in the demurrer.

[3, 4] It is a matter of common knowledge that lumber companies and others engaged in lumber business do great injury to the public roads. The Legislature deemed it unjust to make the owners of farm land and free labor pay road tax and work the public roads, and then to allow lumber companies and others hauling lumber to cut them to pieces without any remuneration or any legal method provided to make them bear an adequate proportion of the burdens. It does not appear upon the face of the act, which is all that is before us upon this demurrer, that there is any other business carried on in that community which would tend to cut up the roads as the hauling of lumber is calculated to do. But, even if this did appear, the Legislature can classify vocations and lay a tax of a different amount upon the different occupations. The only requirement is that the tax shall be uniform upon all in each classification. In State v. Powell, 100 N. C. 526, 6 S. E. 424, the town of Morganton was authorized to levy privilege taxes of different sums on general occupations, including livery stables, selling sewing machines, etc., and fixing a penalty for carrying on each business without paying the license. This court held that "a tax is uniform which is the same upon all persons in the same class," and that it is in the discretion of the taxing power to place different rates of taxation on the different classes; citing Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. Ed. 663, and Puitt v. Com'rs, 94 N. C. 709, 55 Am. Rep. 638. Smith, C. J., pointed out that the error in opposing the validity of the taxation consisted "in regarding such tax as imposed on property in which both uniformity and the ad valorem principle must be observed. This is not a property tax, but a tax upon an occupation or vocation, and is not less so because the appurtenances of a livery stable necessary in conducting the business may be carriages, horses and other property. Indeed, these articles, though so used, are still subject to the ad valorem assessment as property. As other trades, purely personal, without regard to the magnitude of the business carried on may be subjected to a tax of a fixed sum, we see no reason why those which require the use of property may not be." On turnpike roads, which are kept up by private enterprise, there is one rate for lighter vehicles and a heavier rate for heavier vehicles. There is no reason why the Legislature cannot authorize the county to lay a rate of two cents per thousand feet for the use of roads in hauling lumber over them, and content itself with exacting no tax upon other conveyances which do less damage, and for which the legislative judgment is that the regular road tax was a sufficient return.

In Railroad v. Reidsville, 101 N. C. 404, 8 S. E. 124, 2 L. R. A. 284, the court sustained the validity of an ordinance of the town which levied a $50 tax on every railroad running through the town, saying that it was not repugnant to our own Constitution nor to the Constitution of the United States. In Worth v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 295, 45 Am. Rep. 679, Smith, C. J., said: "The uniform rule to be observed in the exercise of the taxing power seems to be so far applicable to the taxes imposed upon trades, professions, franchises, and incomes as to require no discriminating tax to be imposed upon persons for pursuing the same vocation, while varying amounts may be assessed upon vocations or employments of different kinds." It was further added that this principle had been sustained by Mr. Justice Miller in Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 612, 23 L. Ed. 663, which held that it was sufficient "that the rule as to innkeepers be uniform as to all innkeepers, that the rule as to ferries be uniform as to all ferries, and that the rule as to railroad companies be uniform as to all railroad companies."

In Rosenbaum v. New Bern, 118 N. C. 92, 24 S. E. 2, 32 L. R. A. 123, Avery, J., says: "The law of uniformity does not prohibit the classification by the municipality of dealers in a particular kind of merchandise separately from those whose business it is to sell other articles falling within the same general terms." To same effect, Schaul v. Charlotte, 118 N. C. 733, 24 S. E. 526. In Lacy v. Packing Co., 134 N. C. 572, 47 S. E. 54, the subject is fully discussed, and it was held to be well settled that "a tax is uniform when it is equal upon all persons belonging to the prescribed class upon which it is imposed." It has been held that the tax may be different upon a dealer in whisky by retail and dealer in the same article by wholesale, if uniform as to each class (Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 122), on tobacco buyers as a specified class (State v. Irvin, 126 N. C. 989, 35 S. E. 430), on hotel keepers as a class graduated in amount by the gross receipts and exempting those whose yearly receipts are less than $1,000 (Cobb v. Com'rs, 122 N. C. 307, 30 S. E. 338), on the total amount of purchases by a merchant in or out of the city except purchases of farm products from the producer (State v. French, 109 N. C. 722, 14 S. E. 383, 26 Am. St. Rep. 590), in cities and towns according to population (State v. Green, 126 N. C. 1032, 35 S. E. 462; State v. Carter, 129 N. C. 560, 40 S. E. 11). In State v. Stevenson, 109 N. C. 734, 14 S. E. 1387, 26 Am. St. Rep. 595, it is said: "It is within the legislative power to define the different classes and to fix the license tax required of each class. All the licensee can demand is that he shall not be taxed at a different rate from others in the same occupation as classified by legislative enactment. This is stated as a universal rule. 1 Cooley, Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 260." The court further said in reference to the fourteenth amendment: "It has been repeatedly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that this section of the Constitution does not forbid the classification of property or persons for the purposes of taxation, but merely compels the equal application of the law to all members of the same class, when the classification is based upon reasonable ground, and is not an arbitrary selection"—citing numerous cases. The court also said: "The Legislature is sole judge of what subjects it shall select for taxation (other than a property tax, which must be uniform and ad valorem), and the exercise of its discretion is not subject to the approval of the judicial department of the state. A very full discussion of the whole matter, concluding as above, will be found in State v. Packing Co., 110 La. 180 [34 South. 368, 98 Am. St. Rep. 459].” Lacy v. Packing Co., 134 N. C. 567, 47 S. E. 53; is cited and the above doctrine reiterated by Hoke, J., in Land Co. v. Smith, 151 N. C. 75, 65 S. E. 644. In State v. Holloman, 139 N. C. 642, 52 S. E. 408, the court sustained a very similar statute to this except that, instead of the tax being levied in proportion to the quantity of lumber hauled, it laid a flat rate of an annual license tax for each cart or vehicle used for hauling lumber without reference to the quantity in each load or the number of loads made. The court said (139 N. C. 646, 52 S. E. 409): “This statute deprives no citizen of any right to use the highway. It does not restrain trade nor is it oppressive. Heavily loaded vehicles cut up and injure the roads, and a reasonable license tax, the proceeds of which are appropriated to repairing the damage thus produced, is exceptionally equitable. The method for making and keeping in repair the public roads is a matter solely for the legislative department.” The tax of two cents per mile per thousand feet is reasonable, and is not discriminative simply because it does not include all vehicles. As is said in State v. Holloman, supra, 139 N. C. 646, 52 S. E. 409: “This license tax is simply a mode of regulating the use of the public roads and requiring that those desirous of using them for extraordinary purposes, as hauling heavy lumber and logs over the road in unusually heavy vehicles, shall not do so without taking out license for such unusual and extraordinary and injurious use of the public highway and paying a license for the privilege.” The reports required to be filed monthly of the quantity of lumber hauled is no hardship on defendants. It is only a method by which the road trustees can ascertain accurately the quantity of lumber hauled by each person engaged in the lumber business and proportion the tax levied accordingly. The fourteenth amendment does not require equality in levying taxation by the state, nor does it interfere with the police power. “How a state shall levy its taxation is a matter solely for its Legislature, subject to such restrictions as the state Constitution throws around legislative action. If, on the other hand, working the roads by labor is a police regulation or a public duty, certainly it is not a matter of federal supervision.” State v. Wheeler, 141 N. C. 776, 53 S. E. 358, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1139, 115 Am. St. Rep. 700; Brannon's Fourteenth Amendment, 149, 298, 323, and cases there cited.

[5] The other two sections of the state Constitution prohibiting special privileges and prohibiting the deprivation of life, liberty, and property except by the law of the land which are referred to in the demurrer have no application to this case. The Legislature was within its legitimate powers in prescribing regulations for the maintenance of the public roads of Macon county, and in laying a tax upon the use of heavy vehicles for the purpose of raising a fund to repair the damages usually inflicted on the roads by such traffic.

Affirmed.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). I would be very glad to sustain the act of the General Assembly in question if I could reconcile it with the principles of taxation embodied in our Constitution. I recognize the inherent justice and value of such legislation, for it is an admitted fact that lumber companies do use the public roads to a far greater extent than private citizens. I agreed to the decision in State v. Holloman, 139 N. C. 642, 52 S. E. 408, because the statute was framed upon a very different principle from the one under consideration. There is a wide difference between this law and the Hertford county law. The latter applies to all persons, firms, or corporations using the public roads of the township; whereas the Macon county law is confined in its operation to any lumber company, corporation, or persons engaged in the lumber business, and levies a tax of two cents per thousand feet upon the lumber belonging to such users of the public road. This tax cannot be sustained as an exercise of police power. It does not in any way tend to promote health, peace, morals, and good order of the people. Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 572. It is not a license tax or regulation tax in any sense. Cooley on Taxation, 408. It is a contract pure and simple for keeping up the public roads, levied solely upon the property of those who happen to be engaged in the lumber business. It does not apply to the private individual who may haul hundreds of thousands of feet of lumber over the same road for his individual benefit. Nor does it apply to those engaged in hauling as a business brick, clay, coal, or other heavy material over the same road. The tax cannot be called uniform because it does not apply to all persons using the public roads, but to a particular class who happen to be engaged in a certain kind of business. I admit that there is certain discretion given to the lawmaking power in regard to legislation affecting the public roads, but it is not an uncontrollable discretion, and, when the tax is confined to one particular class of persons and not extended to all alike who use the same road, it cannot be called a regulation, but it is a revenue measure, pure and simple, and, inasmuch as it is not uniform and does not bear alike upon all who use the public roads, it violates the uniformity of taxation, which is one of the essential features of our Constitution. Gray's Limitations of Taxing Power, § 1450; State v. Moore, 113 N. C. 697, 18 S. E. 342, 22 L. R. A. 472.

It is said, however, that this action for the penalty may be sustained because the Legislature has a right to make the defendants report monthly to the road trustees the number of feet of lumber, logs, and other heavy material hauled during the preceding month, in order that the tax of two cents per thousand feet may be collected.

It is apparent from reading the statute that this report is simply a part of the machinery for collecting taxes, and, inasmuch as the statute must be taken as a whole, if the tax is void for lack of uniformity, then the whole statute falls to the ground.

ALLEN, J., concurs in this opinion.

1. CARRIERS (§ 127*)—INJURY TO SHIPMENT—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where goods, though injured by a carrier, retain a substantial value, the owner cannot refuse to take them, and sue the carrier for their entire value, but can recover only for the diminution in value.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by J. F. McGrath and another, partners doing business as McGrath Bros., against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Greene, of Abbeville, for appellant. Wm. N. Graydon, of Abbeville, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The plaintiffs, blacksmiths and wheelwrights at McCormick, S. C., purchased in Savannah, Ga., two lengths of steel shafting and other hardware. The goods were shipped over the defendant's railroad, and, on arrival at McCormick, the shafting was found to be so bent as to be unfit for the use intended. The plaintiffs refused to receive the shafting from the carrier, and duly presented their claim for $7.15, the entire value of the two pieces, and $.77 freight. The defendant having failed to pay the claim, this action was brought in the magistrate's court for $7.90 and $50, the statutory penalty.

The only witness in the case was J. T. McGrath, one of the plaintiffs, who testified that the bent shafting was of no use to the plaintiffs, but that it was worth 25 to 35 cents a hundred pounds as old iron.

[1] Defendant's counsel asked the magistrate to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the claim, $7.90, less 25 cents a hundred pounds, the value of the shafting as old iron. This request was refused, and defendant then requested the following charge: "That, because property is damaged in shipment, a person cannot abandon it as long as it has a value, but must receive the same, and, if he cannot use it, must sell for its market value at the nearest market, and the amount it brings or would bring must be deducted from the value or the cost of the article in estimating the damage." The magistrate refused this and other similar requests, and charged the jury "that, if the jury find that the shafting was of no value to the plaintiff, he had a right to refuse to accept it and sue for the value." The jury found a verdict for $57.92, the whole amount of the claim and the statutory penalty; and, on appeal, the judgment of the magistrate's court on the verdict was affirmed by the circuit court. We think the legal proposition relied on by defendant's counsel is sound and well established by authority in this state and elsewhere. A carrier having goods in possession for transportation acquires no title to them. As the goods remain the property of the owner, his right of action against the carrier is for the entire value of the goods if lost or made entirely worthless by the carrier's default; and, in case of destruction of value, the recovery is not affected by the owner's acceptance or his refusal to accept the goods. On the other hand, if the value is merely impaired by actual injury in the hands of the carrier, or by delay in the carrier, the consignee is bound to receive the goods; and his right of action is limited to the impairment of value due to delay in carriage or injury to the goods. In Nettles v. S. C. R. R. Co., 7 Rich. 190, 62 Am. Dec. 409, the action was for the value of a shipment of wool hats which were much injured by being boxed up for several months, when they should have been transported and delivered in a few days. The court held: "The goods, even after great delay in the carriage of them, belonged to the plaintiff. When they were tendered to him, he should have accepted them; and thereby the extreme measure of damages would have been reduced by deduction therefrom of the value of the goods, according to their condition at the time and place of tender." It will be observed that the point involved in that case was not loss resulting from mere delay in delivery, but from actual injury to the goods received in the course of transportation. Indeed, on the point under discussion, it is impossible to distinguish in principle between damage due to delay and damage due to impairment of value by physical injury to the goods. Neither the actual injury nor the delay in transportation amounts to conversion as long as the goods retain a substantial value.

The rule was applied to delayed freight in Cousar v. So. Ry., 82 S. C. 307, 64 S. E. 391, and in Bullock v. C. & W. C. Ry., 82 S. C. 375, 64 S. E. 234. In Shaw v. S. C. R. Co., 5 Rich. 462, 57 Am. Dec. 768, a considerable quantity of a shipment of molasses had leaked out because of injury to the casks in the course of transportation. The court, holding that the consignee must receive the molasses that was left and sue for the value of that which leaked out, quoted with approval the following statement of the principle made in Smith v. Griffith, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 333, 38 Am. Dec. 639: "If goods are wholly lost or destroyed, the owner is entitled to their full worth at the time of such loss or destruction. In trover the measure of damages is the value of the goods at the time and place of conversion, with interest, or, perhaps, at any time between that and the trial. And, upon the same principle, if the goods are partially injured, and the party seeks redress for the qualified damage, the measure should be in like proportion." The court recognized and applied the same principle in Miami Powder Co. v. Port Royal, etc., Ry. Co., 38 S. C. 78, 16 S. E. 339, 21 L. R. A. 123, and in Wall v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., 71 S. C. 337, 51 S. E. 95. These cases are in accord with the authorities elsewhere. 3 Hutchinson on Carriers, 1365, 1372; Mich. Co. v. Bivens, 13 Ind. 263; Gulf Co. v. Pitts, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 212, 83 S. W. 727; Gulf Co. v. Everett, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 167, 83 S. W. 257; Silverman v. Ry., 51 La. Ann. 1785, 26 South. 447; Dudley v. Railway, 58 W. Va. 604, 62 S. E. 718, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1135, 112 Am. St. Rep. 1027; Parsons v. U. S. Express Co., 144 Iowa, 745, 123 N. W. 776, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 842.

The case of Berley v. C. N. & L. R. R. Co., 82 S. C. 232, 64 S. E. 397, was relied on by respondents' counsel as holding that a consignee could refuse to receive goods injured in transportation, but still having a substantial value, and recover the full value. It is perfectly obvious from the following language of the decree that the recovery was allowed on the ground that the evidence admitted of the inference that, when the goods arrived, they had no substantial value. "The defendant first submits the point that the plaintiff could not recover $1.84, the entire amount of the claim, because the evidence for the plaintiff shows that the entire value of the piping was only $1.84, that it was not lost but only injured, and that, after the injury, it was of some value. The plaintiff, Kyzer, testified the piping was so broken as to be of no value to him, though 'it might have been worth something to somebody.' This mere conjecture of value by the plaintiff does not warrant this court in holding there was no evidence to support the judgment of the magistrate that the piping was a complete loss, especially when it is considered that Hook, defendant's agent at Irmo, testified the defendant admitted and allowed the whole claim after investigation."

[2] Still we do not think there should be a reversal in this case. While there can be no doubt that, if the shafting in its bent condition had a substantial value, the consignees were bound to receive it and give the carrier credit for the net amount realized from its due disposition, when the evidence is looked at in a practical way we think it shows that the shafting could not have had any appreciable net value in the hands of the consignees. According to the evidence, it had no value except as old iron, worth from 55 to 77 cents. The actual outlay for handling and delivery to a purchaser would not have been much less than this small sum, so that the net value of the bent shafting in the hands of consignees, if anything at all, was too insignificant to count in the practical administration of justice. As the judgment must be affirmed on the undisputed evidence in the case, it is unnecessary to consider the exception charging error in the admission of testimony that the defendant offered to pay the claim without the penalty.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

Action by Leonard B. Drennan, revived in the name of Lida E. Drennan, as administratrix of the estate of Leonard B. Drennan, deceased, against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division, and Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The exceptions were as follows:

"(1) Because his honor erred in allowing John T. Roddey, one of plaintiff's witnesses, to testify, over the objection of defendants, as to certain negotiations that took place between the town council of Rock Hill and Southern Railway Company before the injuries to plaintiff's intestate, and as to the putting in of an alarm system at certain crossings in said city of Rock Hill, and that same were taken out; the error being that said testimony was irrelevant and incompetent, and was prejudicial to the defendants.

"(2) Because his honor erred in reading to the jury in his charge sections 2132 and 2139 of the Code of Laws for 1902, and in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, gentlemen, I charge you, as a matter of law, if you should conclude or believe that these signals were not given, as required by this statute, then, under the decisions of our Supreme Court, that is negligence per se; and if there was a failure on the part of the railroad company, its agents and servants, to give the signals with reference to crossing of the highway, street, or traveled place, as required by the statutes, which I have read to you, and if Mr. Drennan was injured by any carelessness and negligence on their part, and that carelessness and negligence or failure to give signals, or anything of that sort, was the direct and proximate cause of his injury, then, under circumstances of that sort, he would be entitled to recover, unless you think that at the time he was injured, or at the time of the collision, if there was one at a crossing, that Mr. Drennan was guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was acting in violation of law, and that such gross and willful negligence or unlawful act contributed to his injury. In other words, in order to make this thing perfectly plain to you, I have already charged you that the law of contributory negligence is a good defense as to a case of ordinary negligence; but the law is a little different where a man is injured at a crossing, where a public highway, street, or traveled place crosses a railroad, if the parties in charge of the locomotive or train fail to give the statutory signals at the crossing, and that failure or negligence on their part is the direct and proximate cause of his injury.' The error being: (1) That his honor thereby charged the jury that ordinary contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff would not defeat his action if there was 'any carelessness and negligence' on the part of the defendants, 'or failure to give signals'; the law clearly being that, if there was any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the same would defeat his action in all cases not falling under section 2139 of the statute. (2) That such charge was misleading and confusing to the jury.

"(3) Because his honor erred in charging the jury, after having read said sections of the statute, as follows: 'Ordinarily, the want of ordinary care on the part of the person injured, the failure on his part to observe due care or due precaution, if that failure to observe due care and due precaution on his part in any manner contributed towards his injury as a direct and proximate cause, then he cannot recover; but where he is injured by a collision at a public crossing by a locomotive engine, and the parties in charge of that engine fail to give the statutory signals—that is, ringing the bell or blowing the whistle within 500 yards, and keeping it up until they get over the traveled place, highway, or public crossing—a mere want of ordinary care on his part, if he is injured under those circumstances, will not prevent a recovery; but the jury must be satisfied that at the time of the injury or collision, if there was one, that the party injured was guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was acting in violation of law, and such gross or willful negligence or unlawful act contributed to his injury.' The error being: (1) That ordinary contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff will defeat his cause of action in all cases, unless he was injured by a collision at a crossing through failure to give the statutory signals. (2) That section 2139 of the Code, under which such charge was given, is in violation of article 5 of the Constitution of the United States, and also section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of the United States, and also of sections 5 and 17 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, in that said statute deprives railroad companies of their property without due process of law, and denies to them the equal protection of the law, in that it deprives railroad companies of the defense of contributory negligence in cases embraced within its terms, while it allows to the individual injured a cause of action for ordinary negligence, and thereby allows him to recover damages when his own contributory negligence was a proximate cause of his injuries.

"(4) Because his honor erred in charging the jury with reference to the measure of damages to which the plaintiff would be entitled, if she was entitled to recover, by charging the jury that she could recover damages proportionate to the injuries sustained; the error being: (1) That for ordinary personal injuries, where no cause of action for punitive damages has been made out, only compensatory damages are recoverable. (2) That under such charge, the jury was permitted to give the same measure of damages as are allowed under the Lord Campbell's Act, and prescribed in section 2852 of the Code of Laws for South Carolina.

"(5) Because his honor erred in not granting a new trial upon the third and fourth grounds, which were as follows: '(3) That the undisputed evidence in the case shows that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, in that, when he had an opportunity for seeing the approach of the engine, he failed to take any precautions whatsoever for his own safety. (4) That the undisputed evidence in the case shows that plaintiff's intestate was guilty of gross or willful negligence in approaching track of defendants, when he had the opportunity of discovering the approach of the engine thereon, and in failing to observe any care or take any precautions whatsoever for his safety.' The error being that the undisputed evidence in the case shows that plaintiff's intestate was guilty not only of contributory negligence, but of gross and willful negligence, in that he attempted to cross defendants' track without making any effort to see whether the engine was approaching, and without taking any precaution whatsoever for his own safety, when his attention had been called to the matter, and in failing to observe the slightest degree of care for his own safety and protection.

"(6) Because his honor erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon the seventh ground, which was as follows: '(7) That the undisputed evidence, as well as the great preponderance thereof, clearly shows that the plaintiff's intestate could have seen the approaching engine, and could have safely stopped in time to avoid injury, if he had exercised any care to discover its approach before he heedlessly went on the track of defendants.' The error being that the undisputed evidence clearly shows that plaintiff's intestate, by exercising the slightest degree of care, could have seen the approaching engine, and could have stopped in time to have avoided injury to himself; but he failed to exercise the slightest degree of care, and, on the contrary, heedlessly went upon said track.

"(7) Because his honor erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon the eighth and ninth grounds, which were as follows: '(8) That the verdict of the jury, considered as a verdict for compensatory damages, under all the facts in the case, was grossly excessive. (9) That the verdict of the jury, considered as a verdict for compensatory damages, under all the testimony, is so grossly excessive as to clearly show that it was the result of sympathy, passion, and prejudice on the part of the jury.' The error being: (1) That the verdict is grossly excessive, considered as a verdict for compensatory damages. (2) That such verdict, considered as a verdict for compensatory damages, is so excessive as to clearly show that it was the result of sympathy, passion, or prejudice on the part of the jury.

"(8) That his honor erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon the tenth and eleventh grounds, which were as follows:

'(10) That section 2139 of the Code of Laws, which provides that a person who is injured in his person or property by collision with engines or cars of a railroad corporation at a crossing is entitled to recover all damages caused by said collision, when it appears that the corporation neglected to give the signals required, gives a cause for action for simple negligence in failing to give said signals. At the same time, said section deprives the railroad corporation of the defense of ordinary contributory negligence, thus fixing one standard of care for the corporation and a different standard of care for the injured person, thereby depriving the defendant corporation of the equal protection of the law, in plain violation of the provisions of both the state and federal Constitutions. (11) That it was error to charge the jury that an injured person could recover damages under said section 2139 for simple negligence in failing to give the statutory signals, if such failure contributed to the injury of said injured person, and that in such a case the injured person would be entitled to recover, unless it was shown that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, such injured person was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross and willful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law, and that such gross or willful negligence or unlawful act contributed to the injury, because said section 2139 is in plain violation of the provisions of both the state and the federal Constitutions, in that it makes the railroad corporation liable for damages for ordinary or simple negligence, and deprives said corporation of the defense of contributory negligence arising from a lack of ordinary care on the part of said injured person, thereby imposing one standard of care for the defendant corporation and a different standard of care for the plaintiff, thus imposing unequal burdens upon the plaintiff and defendant in such cases, when both may be guilty in an equal degree of the same kind of negligence.' The error being that section 2139 is in violation of article 5, and also of section 1, art. 14, of the Constitution of the United States, and is also in violation of sections 5 and 17 of article 1 of the Constitution of South Carolina, in that it deprives railroad corporations of their property without due process of law, and denies to them the equal protection of the law. (2) Because said section deprives railroad companies of the equal protection of the laws, in that it deprives railroad companies of the defense of contributory negligence, while it allows to the injured person a cause of action for simple negligence, thereby fixing one standard of care for the railroad company and a different standard of care for the traveler, and thus deprives the railroad company of the equal protection of the laws. (3) Because said section deprives railroad corporations of the equal protection of the laws, in that it makes railroad corporations liable for damages for ordinary or simple negligence, and gives to the injured party a cause of action for such ordinary or simple negligence, but deprives the railroad company of the defense of contributory negligence arising from the lack of ordinary care on the part of the injured person, and thus imposes one standard of care for the defendant corporation and a different standard of care for the traveler, who may be injured, thereby imposing unequal burdens upon the plaintiff and defendant in such case, when both may be guilty in an equal degree of the same kind of negligence, thus allowing an injured party to recover damages in a case where his own negligence was a proximate cause of his injury."

B. L. Abney, of Columbia, and McDonald & McDonald, of Winnsboro, for appellants. Thos. F. McDow, of Yorkville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record: "The above action was commenced in the court of common pleas for York county, S. C., by Leonard B. Drennan, plaintiff's intestate, by the service of a summons and complaint on the defendants on the 6th day of October, 1910. The action was brought by said plaintiff to recover the sum of $25,000 damages, actual and punitive, for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by said plaintiff at Wilson street crossing, in the city of Rock Hill, on July 12, 1910, through the alleged concurrent negligence, recklessness, willfulness, and wantonness of the defendants, as set out in the complaint. Thereafter, on the 20th day of October, 1911, the said plaintiff, Leonard B. Drennan, died from typhoid fever, and the action was subsequently continued in the name of Lida E. Drennan, his widow and duly appointed administratrix, by an order of the court of common pleas made in the action. The case was tried at the November, 1911, term of the court for York county, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $15,000. During the progress of the trial, the jury was sent to view the premises. A motion for a new trial was thereupon made upon the minutes of the court, but the same was refused, and judgment was entered against the defendants."

The defendants appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

[1-3] The first question that will be considered is presented by the exception numbered 1. When the testimony was offered, the defendants' attorneys did not object to its introduction, on the ground that it was irrelevant, but on the grounds (1) that it was not in writing, and (2) that there was no allegation of the complaint to which it was responsive. It will thus be seen that the grounds mentioned in the exception are not the same as were urged on circuit. But, waiving such objection, the testimony was competent for the purpose of proving that the defendants had notice of the dangerous condition at the crossing. Furthermore, it has not been made to appear, even if there was error, that it was prejudicial.

[4] The second exception raises the next question for determination. The rules of evidence are different in cases where the injury at a crossing results directly from the failure of the railroad company to give the statutory signals, and in cases where the injury was proximately caused by other acts of negligence. In cases where the injury is the direct result of a failure on the part of the railroad company to comply with the requirements of the statute as to signals, it cannot escape liability, unless it shows that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, the person injured was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law. In all other cases, it is only incumbent on the railroad company to show a want of ordinary care on the part of the person injured, which contributed to the injury as a proximate cause, and without which the injury would not have occurred. By reference to the charge, it will be seen that his honor, the presiding judge, clearly instructed the jury as to this difference.

[5] We proceed to consider the exceptions attacking the constitutionality of section 2139 of the Code of Laws, which is as follows: "If a person is injured in his person or property by collision with the engine or cars of a railroad corporation at a crossing, and it appears that the corporation neglected to give the signals required by this chapter, * * * and that such neglect contributed to the injury, the corporation shall be liable for all damages caused by the collision, * * * unless it is shown that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, the person injured, or the person having charge of his person or property, was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law; and that such gross or willful negligence, or unlawful act, contributed to the injury."

The constitutionality of said statute was determined in the case of Kaminitsky v. Railway, 25 S. O. 53. In that case the court uses this language: "It is said that the provision in regard to the proof of negligence was not really an amendment of the charter, but a change in the law of evidence. If this were so, it would not make it unconstitutional. 'The right to have one's controversies determined by existing rules of evidence is not a vested right. Like other rules affecting the remedy, they must therefore at all times be subject to modification and control by the Legislature.' Cool. Con. Lim. 452, 453. We do not, however, consider that by the aforesaid provision the main object of the Legislature was to make a change in the law of evidence, but to induce compliance with the previous requirement as to signals. The rule of evidence as to negligence was made to apply only in case of failure to give the required signals; and it is manifest that the purpose was to give an additional sanction to the provision requiring the signals to be given."

The court then quotes with approval the following language from Pierce on Railroads (page 460): "A railroad company, although no power is reserved to amend or repeal its charter, is nevertheless subject, like individuals, to such police laws as the Legislature may, from time to time, enact for the safety and health of citizens and the general convenience and good order. Its property and essential franchises are, indeed, protected by the Constitution; but the company itself is not thereby placed above the laws. It was not the design of that instrument to disarm the states of the power to pass laws to protect the lives, limbs, health, and morals of citizens, and to regulate their conduct towards each other, and the mode of using property, so that different owners may not injure each other. Such laws may incidentally impair the value of franchises, or of rights held under contracts; but they are enacted diversio intuitu, and are not within the constitutional inhibition."

The rule as to classification, under the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, is thus clearly stated by the court, through Mr. Justice Van Devanter, in the case of Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 Sup. Ct. 237, 55 L. Ed. 369: "(1) The equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment does not take from the state the power to classify in the adoption of police laws, but admits of the exercise of a wide scope of discretion in that regard, and avoids what is done only when it is without any reasonable basis, and therefore is purely arbitrary. (2) A classification having some reasonable basis does not offend against that clause, merely because it is not made with mathematical nicety, or because in practice it results in some inequality. (3) When the classification in such a law is called in question, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, the existence of that state of facts at the time the law was enacted must be assumed. (4) One who assails the classification in such a law must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis, but is essentially arbitrary."

Section 2139 of the Code of Laws was the outgrowth of the necessity for legislation to protect the traveling public at highway crossings, and it is peculiarly applicable to railways; in fact it is difficult to conceive how any but railways could be included in the classification. This case, therefore, is embraced within the principles announced in the case last mentioned.

[8] We proceed to consider whether the said section is in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. In construing section 2139 of the Code of Laws, the court stated, in Kaminitzky v. Railway, 25 S. C. 53, that the main object of that section was not to make a change in the law of evidence, but to induce compliance with the statutory requirements as to signals. But, even if the intention of said section was to change the rules of evidence in the manner therein stated, it would not be repugnant to the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution as to due process of law. Rules of evidence may be changed whenever the grounds for such change are reasonable. A conspicuous instance of such change appears in section 15, art. 9, of the Constitution, which provides that "knowledge by any employé injured, of the defective or unsafe character of any machinery, ways, or appliances, shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars, or engines voluntarily operated by them." Another instance of such change appears in the act of Congress, approved the 11th of June 1906 (Act June 11, 1906, c. 3073, § 2, 34 Stat. 232 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1317]), which provides that in all actions brought against common carriers to recover damages for personal injuries to an employé, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, where his contributory negligence is slight, and that of the employer was gross in comparison; but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé. One reason for the change in the rules of evidence by section 2139 of the Code of Laws is that in many instances the party colliding with the train of cars is instantly killed; and the railroad company would have a decided advantage if it was only required to prove that the person injured was guilty of ordinary contributory negligence. The necessity of the case requires proof of more than ordinary negligence on the part of the person injured. A like necessity caused a change in the rules of evidence, where cattle were killed by a railroad train, as will be seen by the case of Danner v. Railway, 4 Rich. 329, 55 Am. Dec. 678, in which it was held that there was a presumption of negligence arising from the mere act of killing the stock.

[7] The next question that will be considered is presented by the fourth exception. When the charge is considered in its entirety, it will be seen that his honor, the presiding judge, instructed the jury that the basis of recovery by the plaintiff was the amount of actual damages sustained by her intestate. But, even if he had charged as contended by the appellant's attorneys, it would not have constituted error. Sullivan v. Railway, 85 S. C. 532, 87 S. E. 905.

The last question is whether there was error in refusing the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was arbitrary, and was the result of sympathy, passion, and prejudice. There is nothing in the record tending to show such fact.

Judgment affirmed.

MARTIN v. HUGHES CREEK COAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1912. Rehearing Denied
June 15, 1912.)

RAILROADS (§ 369*)—OPERATION—PERSONS ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

A coal mining corporation, operating on its own private premises a private railway for conveying cars to its tipples for loading, owes no duty to keep a lookout for children on its track, and is not liable for injury to a child from a moving car; its operator not seeing the child.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1259-1262; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

Miller and Williams, JJ., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by Albert-A. Martin, an infant, against the Hughes Creek Coal Company. From a judgment granting a new trial after verdict for plaintiff, he brings error. Affirmed.

Cato & Bledsoe, for plaintiff in error.
Brown, Jackson & Knight, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. The Hughes Creek Coal Company is a private corporation engaged in mining coal, its works being on land owned by it on the line of the Kanawha & Michigan Railroad. As a part of its operating equipment it has tracks for receiving empty railroad cars and loading coal, connecting with the said railroad as switch tracks, but on its own land. It had some empty cars standing on one of its tracks. The track had a slight down grade from a point at the top of the grade called a knuckle, the point where empty cars stood. One of the company's employes, in order to take one of these cars from the knuckle to the coal tippie to be loaded from the mine, started it down the light one degree grade, it moving by gravity, and, having started by prying it with a crow bar, he got on the rear end of the gondola car, and moved slowly, he says occupying him five minutes, to the front end, where the brake was; the car moving slowly, at the rate of three or four miles an hour. The plaintiff, a child of 23 months, named Albert A. Martin, got out of the gate of the yard of its home, went to this track, and in seeking to cross one of his arms was caught by the moving car and so badly mashed at the elbow that amputation of its arm was necessary. In an action brought by the child a verdict was found for him, which was set aside by the court, and Martin brings a writ of error.

The coal company upon its own premises was using the car in a lawful manner in the transaction of its business. The child had no right upon the railroad track, and was thus, in the eye of the law, a trespasser. It is not, legally speaking, harsh or unwarranted to denominate a child a trespasser under such circumstances; for he is on the property of others uninvited, where he has no right to be. He is in law a trespasser, and the owner of the premises owes him no duty except not to wantonly or willfully injure him. The same rule here applies to a child as to an adult. Palmer v. Oregon Short Line, 34 Utah, 466, 98 Pac. 689, 16 Ann. Cas. 229, note page 680. In note in 16 Ann. Cas. 247, are cited many cases for the proposition that "the recent cases adhere to the rule that railroad companies ordinarily owe no duty to children trespassing on their tracks, except the negative one not to injure them after discovering their presence." It owes no affirmative, positive duty. That great writer, Thompson, in his work on Negligence (volume 1, §§ 1024, 1025), says, "As a general rule, he [the owner of premises] is not bound to keep his premises safe or in any particular condition for the benefit of trespassing children of his neighbor, or for the benefit of children who occupy no more favorable condition than that of the bare licensees." "The general rule undoubtedly is that the owner or occupier of land is not bound to take pains to prepare his premises in any particular way, to the end of promoting the safety of children who may come thereon as trespassers or as bare licensees, but that, as in the case of adults, they take the premises as they find them, and if they are killed or injured by reason of condition in which they find them, this does not give a right to an action for damages. Liability extends only to wanton injuries. One doctrine under this head is that if a child trespasses upon the premises of the defendant, and is injured in consequence of something that befalls him while so trespassing, he cannot recover damages, unless the injury was wantonly inflicted, or was due to the recklessly careless conduct of the defendant." Thompson personally criticises the rule, but says it is beyond question the established law. We held this same principle in Uthermohlen v. Boggs Run Co., 50 W. Va. 457, 40 S. E. 410, 55 L. R. A. 911, 88 Am. St. Rep. 884, Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 262, 31 S. E. 993, 43 L. R. A. 148, Conrad v. Railroad Co., 64 W. Va. 176, 61 S. E. 44, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1129, and Dicken v. Liverpool Co., 41 W. Va. 511, 23 S. E. 582, cases of injury to children. In them is full discussion of this subject, and we shall not repeat their contents, or tediously elaborate. We assert that those cases do lay down principles which control the present case. As the law says that the coal company owed no duty to this unfortunate child, there could be no legal negligence; and where there is no negligence there is no liability. If the employe had seen the child and taken no care to save it, then we could say there was negligence in law, constituting wanton or willful injury, and therefore legal liability under principles above stated; but the boy who was moving the car did not see the child. It is not proven or claimed that he did. He did not know that the child had been injured until the car reached the tippie, when he was told of the misfortune. The car started before the child reached the track. Just the distance from where the car started to where the child received its hurt is not certain, but from 75 to 90 feet. Bowers, the boy taking the car down, was not on the end of the car next to the child, where was the only brake, but at the rear end, seeming not to be intent on the brake, as the car was moving so slowly, and the tippie not reached. Why Bowers did not see the child may be that, being on the back end of the car, and the box of the car being four boards high, 4½ feet from floor to top, he did not see it.

But, though Bowers did not see the child, yet it is argued that he could and should have done so. This is a claim that the defendant was bound to keep a lookout for the child. This claim is repelled by authorities above, as they hold that as to either children or adults trespassing on private premises the owner owes no duty, except not to wantonly injure after discovery of the presence of the child. Here I may cite a case very much kindred to this one as to the general principle above stated, and particularly as to the matter of lookout. It is Emerson v. Peteler, 35 Minn. 481, 29 N. W. 311, 59 Am. Rep. 337. A contractor was grading a street for a city, and used dump cars in a street moved by gravity to carry away earth. Two children got on one of these cars, and when the cars were in motion a child of five years jumped off the car and was killed. The children were not seen. The court said: "The only ground upon which negligence is predicated is the failure to provide better police supervision of the movement of the cars in order to prevent children from boarding them. * * * But we do not think the law required the defendant, under the circumstances, to provide police supervision to keep off intruders or trespassers from these cars, whether children or adults. He was engaged in improving the street, and his cars and track were lawfully in it for such purpose. * * * Where there is no negligence, the incapacity of the child who happens to be injured cannot create liability. Kay v. Penn. R. Co., 65 Pa. 269, 271, 3 Am. Rep. 628. The burden rested on the plaintiff to establish negligence, and it is not claimed that there was any, unless the failure to employ help to watch and keep children away was such. But the duty which the defendant owed these children was not to keep constant watch, or to use extraordinary care, to prevent their approach, but, when discovered in the exercise of ordinary care, to use proper diligence to prevent injury to them." The court said, as I say in this case, that it was an instance of unfortunate accident, imposing no liability on the contractor.

If these principles do not rule this case, what the use of private property? Its use is all there is of benefit in it; and if its use is to be so restricted, where its benefit? It would be so narrowed. If this coal company could not freely use, on its own ground, this car in the necessary transaction of its work, if that use must be hampered by the duty of keeping a constant Argus-eyed watch, it would largely detract from and damage right of private property. If these principles do not apply, where is the limit?

It is contended that, as the law of West Virginia requires public railways to keep a watch on the track to see children, the same reason called for a watch of the defendant's switch track. The preponderance of authority, perhaps, is that a railroad company is not bound to keep a watch for children on its track. Palmer v. Short Line, 84 Utah 466, 98 Pac. 689, 16 Ann. Cas. 228, and note page 247; Southern R. Co. v. Chatman, 124 Ga. 1026, 53 S. E. 692, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283, 4 Ann. Cas. 675, and note page 680. But our law is different. Gunn v. Railroad, 42 W. Va. 676, 26 S. E. 546, 36 L. R. A. 575. However there is a difference in this respect between a public railroad and one of a coal operator used on his own premises for transacting his private business. The one is a public road; the other, private. The public railroad train traverses great stretches of country, at great speed, the coal operator's cars go slowly a short distance. We know, by judicial cognizance as a matter known of all men, that great numbers of people do walk on the public railroad track, and their presence on it in many instances may be expected; not so in the case of the private track operated in carrying on a coal mine.

We think, on principles above stated, that there was no error in giving the following instructions: No. 2: "The court instructs the jury that the burden of proving negligence is upon the plaintiff, and that the bare fact that the plaintiff was injured does not raise a prima facie presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant." No. 3: "The court instructs the jury that the defendant owed no duty to mere trespassers to keep its premises safe, and the fact that the trespasser is a child does not alter the duty owed to him." No. 4: "The court instructs the jury that the only duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff was not to wantonly or willfully injure him." No. 5: "The court instructs the jury that the defendant was not bound to take pains to prepare his premises in any particular way, or the cars used thereon, to the end of promoting safety of children who might come thereon as trespassers or as bare licensees, but that the plaintiff must take the premises as they were, and as they were being used, at the time he came on them, and if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, through its servants, did not willfully or wantonly injure the plaintiff, then they must find for the defendant." No. 6: "The court instructs the jury that the law is that the defendant owed to the plaintiff no higher duty or obligation than it owed to an adult who may have been a trespasser upon its premises, and that in order for the plaintiff to recover he must show by a preponderance of the evidence that Ed Bower, the agent of the defendant company, willfully or wantonly caused the injury complained of in the plaintiff's declaration."

We think the court should have given instruction No. 1, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the evidence in this case is not sufficient to support the verdict for the plaintiff, and they must therefore find for the defendant."

Under these principles, we affirm the judgment of the circuit court, granting a new trial.

MILLER, J. (dissenting). I can not concur in the opinion of the court. In my view it is not supported either by our own cases or some of those cited in the opinion from other states.

The opinion overlooks very important facts, strongly bearing on the rights of the parties, and which can not be properly ignored in any just disposition of the case. The record shows that while the side track is located on the private grounds of defendant, it likewise appears that on each side of this side track, and the public road paralleling it on one side, and the railroad of the Kanawha & Michigan Railway Company paralleling it on the other, defendant had built for the use of its employees some fourteen or fifteen dwelling houses; with some intervening buildings; and that west of these was its power house, and its tippie, and the railway station. The infant plaintiff lived with its mother and its grandfather, the latter an employee of defendant, in house No. 1, the westernmost of the mine houses, located on the north side of these tracks and the public road, and only about one hundred and fifty feet from the point on the side track where plaintiff was injured. All the other houses were occupied by families of employees of defendant company, some, if not all of them, having small children, and of which defendant, as the evidence shows, had notice. The locations of these houses, opposite each other, on either side of the public road and the railway tracks, was such as to put defendant on notice that the occupants of these houses would naturally, if not necessarily, cross the side track in visiting and communicating with each other. Besides there was some evidence of beaten paths across and upon the side track. Defendant had created these conditions at the place where plaintiff was injured, and thereby voluntarily assumed upon itself such duties and responsibilities as the law imposes, in operating its side track railroad.

The evidence moreover shows reckless disregard by the servant of the defendant in operating the car that injured plaintiff. He admits that before starting the car down the incline he took no pains to look ahead for objects on the track; that he got on the car at the rear end, and did not go in front where the brake was, or keep any kind of lookout ahead, and did not know that he had run over and injured plaintiff until after he had reached the coal tippie, although he was called to by the mother of the child, running towards it, in the direction of the moving car, from where she had been at work, at a neighbor's, on the south side of the track; and also by a Mrs. Canterbury, who had charge of the child, standing with another child in arms on the porch of house number 1, on the north side of the track, and urging on the pursuit by a small boy six years old sent by her to rescue the plaintiff from the impending danger. It is admitted that at the rate the car was moving it could have been stopped within from five to six feet, and the evidence of some of the witnesses is that plaintiff could have been seen on the track some ninety feet ahead of the car when it was started down the grade.

Under these facts and circumstances did defendant owe plaintiff no duty to keep a lookout? The opinion of the court answers, No; that the only duty owed him was the negative one not to wantonly and recklessly injure him, when discovered on the track. I can not so hold. The opinion concedes that this negative duty is not the full measure of responsibility of a railway company operating trains for long distances; that there is then a positive duty to maintain a reasonable lookout on its private right of way for helpless persons and dumb animals. So says Gunn v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 165, 14 S. E. 465, 32 Am. St. Rep. 842; Id., 42 W. Va. 676, 26 S. E. 546, 36 L. R. A. 575, and Bias v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 46 W. Va. 349, 33 S. E. 240, and other decisions of this court. What reason or authority would excuse a coal company operating a side track through a village, as in this case, from keeping a reasonable lookout for helpless persons, though technically trespassers? If as our cases hold such a duty is imposed on a railway company running fast trains, the same duty may with greater reason it seems to me be required of a corporation operating a side track in a village, where it has reason to anticipate the presence of helpless persons. Its servants have no paramount duties to distract them, as in the case of trainmen operating fast running trains, at long distance.

The general rule, erroneously applied in the opinion, that the owner of private property owes no duty to a trespasser, though not controverted, I think inapplicable to the facts in this case. Nor in my opinion is its application here supported by our cases of Ritz v. Wheeling, Dicken v. Liverpool Co., Uthermohlen v. Boggs Run Co., and Conrad v. Railroad Co., referred to. In neither of those cases, unless it be Dicken v. Liverpool Company, did the negligence of defendant relied on constitute active negligence on the part of defendant, as distinguished from passive negligence, particularly illustrated in the case of Ritz v. Wheeling, where the injuries were sustained by plaintiff through the condition of the premises, "without the immediate intervention of any human agency save his own." This distinction, though inapplicable to that case is clearly drawn in Savannah, F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Beavers, 113 Ga. 398, 39 S. E. 82, 54 L. R. A. 314, opinion by Judge Fish, a case quoted from and much relied on by Judge Brannon in Uthermohlen v. Boggs Run Co., supra. The fact that in the case at bar, as in Gunn v. Railway Co., and other cases, defendant was charged with negligently bringing force to bear on plaintiff by a positive act done after his entry on defendant's premises—a negligent act of commission, is what distinguished this class of cases from those of passive negligence, where the injury is not the result of the immediate act of negligence of defendant. In Dicken v. Liverpool Co., the proof showed that the child was injured on the private grounds of defendant, by being run over by a salt car drawn by a mule in charge of a driver, no lines being used. The driver was on a return trip from the salt shed to the salt house of defendant. The driver was on the car looking ahead, and as soon as he discovered the child he called to the mule, and did all he could to stop the car and save the child, and actually did get to it in time to save its life, but not in time to save the wheel of the truck from passing over its foot. How different that case is from this! I do not deny that there are many decisions supporting the opinion, some of them are cited. But this court in the cases referred to is committed to a different rule.

The distinction I contend for is perhaps best illustrated by the case of Smith v. A., T. & S. F. Rld. Co., 25 Kan. 738, a case practically on all fours with the case at bar, opinion by Valentine, Judge, concurred in by so distinguished a judge as Mr. Justice Brewer, late a distinguished member of the Supreme Court of the United States. That case distinctly holds that the question whether defendant was guilty of negligence in injuring the child on the track was a question of fact for the jury and not one of law for the court. The class of cases to which the opinion of the court would now commit us, as well as those of the contra class including our case of Gunn v. Railway Co. and Bias v. C. & O. Ry. Co., supra, are collated in a note to Southern R. Co. v. Chatman, 4 Ann. Cas. 675, 680, and supplemented by a similar note to Palmer v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 16 Ann. Cas. 229, 247, both cited in the opinion of the court. I refer to those notes. The rule of the contra class of cases is the reasonable and humane one. The other, when applied to cases like the one we have here, is cruel and inhuman, and a reproach to the law. I would reverse the judgment below, and enter judgment here for plaintiff on the verdict of the jury.

HINKLE et al. v. NORTH RIVER INS. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 16, 1912. Rehearing Denied
June 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 640*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—PLEADING.

The defense allowed an insurance company by Code of 1906, c. 125, § 64, by filing a statement that the company will rely on breach of condition, warranty, or clause of the policy, is not to be made by plea in abatement, and need not be filed at rules, but may be filed at any time before trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1609-1625; Dec. Dig. § 640.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 640*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—PLEADING.

Such statement may be filed without the general issue or plea provided for in that section of the Code that the company is not liable on the policy.

3. INSURANCE (§§ 493, 567*)—ADJUSTMENT OF LOSS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The act (chapter 33, Acts of 1899) published in Code of 1906, serial section 1108, has not been repealed; and under it, where the loss of a house by fire is total, the insurance company has no right to demand arbitration of the amount of loss, though the policy provides for it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1266-1268, 1420; Dec. Dig. §§ 493, 567.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 493*) — EXTENT OF LOSS—VALUED POLICY.

Under a fire insurance policy, to make a loss by fire total under the valued policy act, the building need not be utterly destroyed and extinguished. If its identity is gone, if its remnant cannot be used as a basis of repair or restoration, the loss is total, calling for full payment of the amount of insurance fixed by the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1266-1268; Dec. Dig. § 493.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by Rebecca Hinkle and others against the North River Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; Miller, J., dissenting.

Talbott & Hoover, of Elkins (Hartwell Cabell, of New York City, N. Y., and Arthur S. Dayton, of Philippi, amici curiæ), for plaintiff in error. James Coberly, of Elkins, and Cunningham & Stallings, of Elkins and Parsons, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, P. Rebecca Hinkle and C. E. Madison sued the North River Insurance Company to recover for loss from the burning of a frame building, under an insurance policy issued by that company, and, upon a motion to strike out the plaintiff's evidence and a demurrer to that evidence, judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and the insurance company sued out a writ of error.

[1] The company filed a notice or statement that the defense would be noncompliance with and violation of certain conditions, clauses, and warranties of the policy, among them the clause that, in event of disagreement as to the amount of loss, it should be ascertained by arbitration. It is suggested by counsel that this defense could only be made by plea in abatement at rules; whereas the statement or notice was filed in term, and came too late. Riley v. Jarvis, 43 W. Va. 44, 26 S. E. 366, is vouched for this. In that case there was an action before a justice and an arbitration pending in it, and in another action a plea of the pending of the action before the justice and arbitration in it was held a plea in bar and too late after other pleas in bar had been filed, and that it was a plea of another action pending; that is, in abatement. So that case does not sustain the point. And, besides, the Code of 1906, c. 125, § 64, serial section 3884, gives right to file such notice or statement of defense, not prescribing that it shall be by plea in abatement, or fixing time of filing, but intending that it may be filed at any time before trial.

lowed in section 64, Code of 1906, c. 125, that it was not liable to the plaintiffs, which plea, in Rosenthal v. Insurance Co., 55 W. Va. 238, 46 S. E. 1021, we called, and we now call, the statutory general issue in insurance cases; and counsel argue that this precludes the company from the benefit of the statement which it did file. As we said in that case, the Code, for simplicity, directs what pleading may be used in actions on insurance policies. It allows such notice merely. We admit that in actions generally there must be an issue; but there is an issue from that statement. The statute, after providing for such general issue, says, "but if in any action on a policy of insurance the defense be that it cannot be maintained because of failure to perform or comply with, or violation of, any clause, condition, or warranty" of the policy, then the defendant must file a statement specifying the particular clause, condition, or warranty not complied with or broken. This would seem to say that when this is the case the general issue will not do, but there must be this specification; in fact, it seems to dispense with the general plea when breach of a condition is relied on. We do not think that the technical rule that there must be a plea to form an issue, even though the trial be on the merits as if such plea had been filed, ought to be applied in such a case. We said, in State ex rel. v. County, 47 W. Va. 673, 35 S. E. 961, that is a harsh rule where there has been a full trial as if a plea were in, though we could not avoid adhering to it in Good v. Town, 65 W. Va. 13, 63 S. E. 615; but we are not disposed to enlarge it and apply it in this case against the true intent of the statute. The general plea would not suit in this case.

[4] The pivotal question in this case rests upon the clause of the policy providing for arbitration in case of disagreement as to the amount of the loss from fire. The policy provides that no suit should be brought on it until after compliance by the insured party with all requirements of the policy. The insurance company and the insured party disagreed as to the amount of loss, and the company demanded an arbitration, and the insured refused it, saying that the loss was total, and there was nothing to arbitrate. Should the court have dismissed the suit for the refusal of the insured to agree to arbitration? Was the loss total? If it was, does that deny right to the company to demand arbitration? Was the loss total? The frame building was 48 feet long, 22 feet wide, two stories. The front lower room, 29 feet long, was intended for a feedroom, but empty at the time; the back part as a dining room and kitchen; the upper story as a residence. The fire started in the dining room or kitchen. It destroyed the rear of the house, so that the roof over that part fell in, and the balance charred and damaged. It burned the counters and shelves in the storeroom and otherwise damaged that room. It burned through the sides in places, so that a neighboring building caught fire from it. Part of the roof, though damaged, stood up. Witnesses, two experienced carpenters and contractors for building houses, declared the building was left a mere shell, worthless for repair, not usable as a basis for repair. The remnant was torn down, not used in repair or rebuilding, condemned by the town authorities, and torn down. In law, the loss is total if the house must be rebuilt; but, if it can be repaired, the loss is partial. In Providence Ins. Co. v. Board, 49 W. Va. 360, 38 S. E. 679, it held that, if the remnant is reasonably adapted for use as a basis on which to restore the building, the loss is not total; and whether it is so adapted for repair depends on the question whether a prudent owner, not insured, desiring such a structure as the house was before the injury, would, in restoring it, utilize such remnant as a basis. The evidence from experienced carpenters and contractors and others is very clear that the remnant of this house could not be used; was worthless for that purpose. There is no evidence to dispute this. To make the loss total, it is not necessary that the fire entirely destroys and works an extinction of the house. There is a total loss where the building is substantially destroyed, though some of the walls still stand. There is a total loss where the property has lost the character in which it was insured, and rendered useless for that purpose, and its remains are practically useless for repair or reconstruction. 19 Cyc. 833. There was evidence that it would cost more to use the materials left than to use new material, which fact shows the loss total. It is the building that is insured, not its materials. Has it lost its identity for use? 13 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 323. A dwelling house is totally destroyed, though the stone foundation and sills and first floor are practically intact, and there is no question for the jury, as the building has lost its identity as such; and the fact that some material remains in a more or less injured condition will not prevent the loss from being total. Lindner v. St. Paul Ins. Co., 93 Wis. 528, 87 N. W. 1125, cited in 56 L. R. A. 787, note. See Hamburg v. Garlington, 66 Tex. 1031, 8 S. W. 337, 58 Am. Rep. 613, cited in 56 L. R. A. 787, note.

[5] Next comes the question: Though the loss was total, could there be, as there was, recovery of the full sum of insurance fixed by the policy? Where no statute otherwise directs, the recovery is for actual damage; but in 1899 was passed an act (chapter 33) providing that "all fire insurance companies doing business in this state shall be liable, in case of total loss by fire or otherwise, as stated in the policy on any real estate insured, for the whole amount of insurance stated in the policy of insurance upon said real estate." Code of 1906, c. 34, serial section 1108. If not repealed, it governs this case, as the policy was made after its going into force. But it is urged that it has been repealed by chapter 77, Acts of 1907,¹ revising, amending, and re-enacting chapter 34 of the Code, and omitting this total loss act. It is said that this act of 1907 is a chapter of the Code covering the whole subject of insurance, making it the sole test and repository of insurance law, and thus repealing the act of 1899. We are cited to Grant v. B. & O. R. Co., 66 W. Va. 175, 68 S. E. 709, holding that "a later statute covering the whole matter of an earlier one, not purporting to amend it, and plainly showing it was intended to be a substitute for the earlier act, works a repeal of the earlier act, even though the two are not repugnant in the usual sense." But by that case and State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 126, 18 S. E. 470, and Herron v. Garson, 26 W. Va. 62, it must plainly and evidently appear that the later act was intended as a substitute for the former one. It does not so appear in this instance. It was not intended to be the exclusive rule on the subject to use language in State v. Harden, 62 W. Va. 313, 58 S. E. 715, 1025. The act of 1907 does not touch that subject of valued insurance policies; it makes no provision touching them. Can we think that it was intended to repeal so important an act as that of 1899? It is not expressly repealed, and repeals by implication are never favored; and the presumption is always against the intention to repeal, where express terms are not used. It must appear "certainly and clearly hostile to the former act. If by any reasonable construction the two statutes can stand together, they must so stand." State v. Enoch, 26 W. Va. 253. The court said: "The rule of law is well settled that to repeal a statute by implication there must be such positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new law and the old that they cannot stand together or be reconciled." Evidently these two statutes can stand together. There is no repugnancy of one with the other; they do not treat of the same subject. The act of 1899 is an independent act, not a part of chapter 34 of the Code. It is a special act dealing only with a valued policy, not dealt with by the act of 1907. "The repeal of a special statute must be either express, or the intention of the Legislature must be so clear as to amount to an express direction." Commonwealth v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 355. "When the legislator frames a statute in general terms, or treats the subject in a general manner, it is not reasonably supposed that he intends to abrogate particular legislation, to the details of which he had previously given his attention, applicable to a part of the same subject, unless the general act shows a plain intention to do so." So stated in opinion in Stewart v. Tennant, 52 W. Va. 573, 44 S. E.

223. See Chesapeake & Ohio v. Hoard, 16 W. Va. 270. This rule is strongly affirmed again in Clemens v. Board of Education, 68 W. Va. 298, 69 S. E. 808. The opinion by Judge Robinson says: "The later general law has a final clause expressly repealing all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the chapter in which it is contained. Even such general repealing clause cannot abrogate the special provision, unless there is real inconsistency. 1 Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 256. The inconsistency must be actual and destructive. It must not be simply a difference. For it, to prevail, must be of the character to cause the former special provision to lose all force. In relation to the provision in question, there is no such inconsistency between it and the later general law. That law exhibits no glaring implication showing an intention to make it inconsistent with the provision; and certainly there are no direct words to the effect." Thus far there is no repeal of the act of 1899.

Another argument made for the proposition that the valued policy act of 1899 is not law is that it was repealed by implication by section 68, c. 77, Acts of 1907, reading as follows: "No fire insurance company shall issue policies on property in this state other than those of the form used by fire insurance companies incorporated under the laws of the state of New York, with such changes and additions as the insurance commissions may deem proper." The New York form contains the provision found in the policy in this case; that is: "This company shall not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs, and the loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to such actual cash value." This is said to be in conflict with the act of 1899. Apparently so. And yet we cannot think that the Legislature, in the general act of 1907, meant to repeal the act of 1899. There is nothing in the 1907 act express on the point. It is only because the New York policy contains the clause calling for only actual damage that this argument of repeal can be made. Probably that clause of the New York policy was not thought of. There is nothing express in the act itself on the subject, and we cannot think that such repeal was meant. And note the last words of section 68, c. 77, Acts 1907, "with such changes and additions as the insurance commissioner may deem proper," indicating that no repeal of the act of 1899 was intended, as some of the court suggest. As said above, repeal by implication by a later act is only sustained when it is clear that the later act was intended as a substitute. What is said above as to repeal by implication will answer this ground alleged for repeal. The argument is too remote. The conclusion of repeal is reached only by circuitous argument or inference.

So the valued policy act of 1899 being in force, there was no right of arbitration, and the language in the opinion by Judge Miller, in Bank v. Insurance Company, 55 W. Va. 278, 47 S. E. 101, is proper in this case: "The language of the act is broad and unambiguous. Under it, the insurance company shall be liable, in case of total loss by fire or otherwise, as stated in the policy, of real estate insured, for the whole amount of insurance upon said real estate, any provisions in the policy to the contrary notwithstanding. All provisions in a policy in conflict with a valued policy statute are void; and hence a provision for the appointment of arbitrators in case of loss is ineffective, where the property is wholly destroyed. Elliott on Ins. § 318."

A witness was asked by the defense whether there was not enough of the building standing "to base an estimate as to what it would cost to either repair or replace the building with a new one like it was before the fire;" but the court would not allow an answer. This relates only to cost, which is immaterial in the case of a valued policy. The cost of restoration is not the question, but the conditions of the remnant. What would such cost show as to the condition of the remnant? Nothing.

For these reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

ROWLAND LAND CO. v. BARRETT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1912. Rehearing Denied
June 15, 1912.)

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 23*) — SCOPE AND CONTENTS.

A paper read as evidence to the jury, and described in a skeleton bill of exceptions in such manner as to make its identity reasonably certain, is properly a part of such bill of exceptions, if it appears to be copied by the clerk into any part of the certified record. Its identity, and not its position in the record, is essential.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 648*) — FORFEITURES—SALE OF LANDS FORFEITED.

A recital in a decree, made in a proceeding to sell forfeited and delinquent lands, that the land was forfeited in the name of a certain designated former owner, is prima facie evidence of the fact of such forfeiture, and of the court's jurisdiction to decree a sale of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 648.*]

3. FORMER CASE APPLIED AND DISTINGUISHED.

The rule in Stockton v. Morris, 30 W. Va. 432, 19 S. E. 531, discussed and applied, and also distinguished.

4. DEEDS (§ 96*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—EVIDENCE OF TITLE.

The recital in a deed that the grantor obtained title by a certain other deed is not evidence against an adverse claimant of such grantor's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 256-260; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

5. FORMER DECISION APPROVED AND APPLIED.

Point 3 of syllabus in Wilson v. Braden, 48 W. Va. 196, 86 S. E. 367, approved and applied.

6. TAXATION (§ 764*)—FORFEITURES—SALE OF FORFEITED LAND—VALIDITY OF DEED.

The rule that an inclusive grant from the commonwealth excepting parcels included within the exterior boundaries without proof of the location of the parts excepted is void for uncertainty does not apply to a deed given subject "to the rights of the occupant claimants according to the provisions of the several acts of the assembly relating thereto."

7. TAXATION (§ 764*)—FORFEITURES—SALE OF FORFEITED LANDS—VALIDITY OF DEED.

A commissioner's deed of forfeited lands excepting such claims as were plotted out by the commissioner upon the original map filed by him with the report of his proceedings as to a former sale is void where the map referred to is proved to have been lost, and there is no proof as to the location of the excepted parcels.

8. JUDICIAL SALES (§ 61*)—SALE—TITLE ACQUIRED.

When a conveyance of land made by a special commissioner under a sale under a decree of court is offered in evidence to pass title, it must be accompanied by either the whole record of the cause or enough to show that the parties holding title affected by the deed and also the land itself were before the court, and that it was decreed to be sold and was sold and the sale was confirmed by the court, and that authority was given by the decree to the commissioner to make the conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 119-122; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

Action by the Rowland Land Company against R. E. Barrett. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

O. P. Fitzgerald, Jr., and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for plaintiff in error. McGinnis & Hatcher and A. A. Lilly, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. Plaintiff brought ejectment to recover two tracts of land, one containing 1,176 acres and the other 4,217 acres, both described by metes and bounds. Defendant disclaimed title to all, except two contiguous tracts containing 188 acres, situated at the forks of Big Coal river, in Raleigh county, which he describes by giving the exterior boundaries, as if one tract, and pleaded not guilty, as to said 188 acres.

[1] Counsel for defendant in error insist that the bill of exceptions does not incorporate the documentary evidence. It is what is commonly called a skeleton bill of exceptions, and it identifies grants and deeds, which were read as evidence, by reference to their dates, the names of the grantors and the grantees, and sometimes, also, by stating the number of acres granted. Such data are then followed by a parenthetical clause directing the clerk to copy the paper into the record at that place. That is sufficient description of the paper read to enable any one to identify it with reasonable certainty. That is all the law requires. It clearly falls within the rule laid down in Tracy's Adm'r v. Carver Coal Co., 57 W. Va. 587, 50 S. E. 825, and Dudley v. Barrett, 58 W. Va. 235, 52 S. E. 100. It is no objection that the documents referred to happen not to be copied into the bill of exceptions at the points designated. It is enough if they appear anywhere in the record, and are sufficiently described to be identified with reasonable certainty. Orderly arrangement, of course, is desirable, and should be followed by the clerk in making up the record, but the want of it does not necessarily vitiate the bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff claims to derive title from the commonwealth of Virginia, by deeds from Alfred Beckley, commissioner of delinquent and forfeited lands, one to Jacob Pettry, for what is known as the Marsh fork parcel of land, and the other to John F. Clay and Richard Scott, for the Clear fork tract, dated, respectively, 28th of January, 1842, and 2d of July, 1841, and by subsequent, intermediate conveyances.

[2] The court permitted plaintiff to read a number of deeds as evidence, in its chain of title, over defendant's objection, and later, after all its evidence had been introduced, on motion of defendant, excluded a number of them, including the deeds from the commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands. Why these deeds were excluded does not appear. It may have been because there was no evidence that the commissioner was authorized by decree of the court to make conveyance. But that is no reason for their rejection, because the commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands was directly empowered by statute then in force to make deed to the purchaser upon full payment of the purchase money. Section 9, c. 8, of an act of the General Assembly, passed March 15, 1838. Or they may have been excluded because the court regarded the report of the commissioner relating to the forfeiture as indispensable to prove title in the state and jurisdiction in the court. Those reports were shown to be lost, and there was no proof of their contents. But that would not justify the exclusion of the deeds in view of the recitals in the decrees made in the cause. The decrees recite that the land was forfeited in the name of Rutter and Etting, and they also authorize the commissioner to sell. Such recitals are prima facie evidence of title in the state by forfeiture, and, title being proven thus to be in the state, there could be no question of jurisdiction in the court. Feder v. Hager, 71 S. E. 107. There was no evidence to rebut this prima facie proof that the state had title.

[3, 6] Again, the deeds may have been rejected because of the following clause in the habendum to the deeds, to wit: "Subject, however, to the rights of occupant claimants according to the provisions of the several acts of the assembly relating thereto." The court may have taken the view that that clause operated to make the grant an inclusive one, excepting parcels of lands included within the exterior boundaries, and, there being no proof of location of the parts excepted, that it fell within the rule declared in Stockton v. Morris, 39 W. Va. 432, 19 S. E. 531, and rendered uncertain the description of plaintiff's land. But we do not interpret that clause to be an exception from the operation of the grant of any part of the land described. The deed does not mention any particular claimants, nor otherwise describe any part of the land to which the language might apply. There is a wide difference in the meaning of the language above quoted and the language used in the grant involved in Stockton v. Morris, and there construed to be an exception of certain lands from the operation of the grant. In that case the grant declared that the survey upon which it was founded included "nine thousand and sixty-five acres, the property of sundry persons," and then it proceeded to name the various claimants, and to give the location of the several parcels of land claimed by them, and concluded as follows: "And this grant shall be no bar in either law or equity, to the confirmation of titles to the same, as before mentioned and reserved, with its appurtenances." That is an express reservation of title in the commonwealth, with the right given to the various claimants, to perfect their respective claims by obtaining grants from the commonwealth. In the present case it does not even appear by the commissioner's deed that there were, in fact, any occupant claimants, nor that the state meant to reserve title to any part of the land included within the bounds of the grant. It was a grant of all the title then in the state, to be held by the grantee, subject to the rights of occupant claimants, if any such there were, a fact apparently unknown to the commissioner so far as it appears from anything contained in the deed. The provision in the habendum clause is not an exception from the operation of the granting clause of any portion of the land described by metes and bounds. It is simply placed there to show a compliance, by the commissioner, with the statute then in force which protected certain occupant claimants, who then had the state's title, by operation of law, under junior grants from the commonwealth, to any portion of the land within the limits of the forfeited grant. Sections

14 and 17 of the act above cited. So far as it appears from the deeds from Alfred Beckley, commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands, they constituted grants, without exception, of all the state's title to all the land described by the metes and bounds of the grant. As apropos to the point here discussed, see State v. Jackson, 56 W. Va. 573, 49 S. E. 465.

[7] But this question arises: Was the exclusion of the commissioner's deed prejudicial error? If there is a material fault in plaintiff's chain of title at any point which breaks its continuity, it destroys the value of the whole chain as evidence of paper title. A deed from Pyrrhus McGinnis and wife to Augustus Pack, dated August 28, 1854, constitutes the third link in plaintiff's chain of title to the Marsh fork tract. That deed contains the following clause: "To have and to hold the said described & bounded tract or lot of 6776 acres, save & excepting always such occupant claims as were plotted out by the Commissioner of Forfeited & Delinquent lands upon the Original Map filed by him with the report of his proceedings as to sale of the Rutter & Etting of 174,673 13765 & 4160 acres in the Clerk's Office of Fayette Superior or Circuit Court & to which map reference is here especially made and also excepting & reserving 50 acres in Forks of the Marsh & Clear Forks, unto him, the said Augustus Pack, his heirs & assigns forever." This is an exception, in express terms, of the claims of occupants whose claims were plotted out on the original map filed by the commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands. It makes special reference to the map, presumably for the purpose of identifying and locating the exceptions. This map is proven to have been lost, and no evidence was offered to prove that the land in controversy is not within some one or more of the excepted parcels. The lack of such evidence rendered the description of plaintiff's land uncertain. It amounts to a failure of proof of its location. The plaintiff in ejectment carries the burden of proving, not only title to the land, but also its identity. The court did not err by excluding this deed, after ascertaining that plaintiff had failed to locate any of the excepted parcels plotted out on the map. This deed clearly comes within the rule of Stockton v. Morris, supra.

[4] When this conveyance was made, Pyrrhus McGinnis appears to have had title to only one undivided half of the land. The deed from Pettry and wife to him April 24, 1850, grants "one moiety" only of the tract. True, the deed contains the following recital: "The other moiety or half of said tract having heretofore been conveyed by the said Jacob Pettry to the said McGinnis." But there is no other proof than this recital of McGinnis' title to one undivided half of the land. But this defect relates only to quantity of interest, and not to quality of title.

Sally J. Dickinson, executrix of H. C. Dickinson, deceased, and the Kanawha Valley Bank, by deed dated 3d of June, 1886, assumed to convey the whole of a tract of 4,217 acres on Marsh fork to J. Harvey Rowland, the said executrix conveying the undivided seven-eighths, and the bank, the undivided one-eighth. The land had been devised to Mrs. Dickinson by her husband, H. C. Dickinson, but how he came to be the owner of more than one undivided sixth does not appear by the record. There was a deed from Augustus Pack to him and five other grantees in equal proportions, and the record is silent as to how Mrs. Dickinson acquired any greater interest in the land than is shown by that deed to her husband. The bank appears to have claimed title to the one-eighth by deed from Wesley Mollohan, trustee. The deed to the bank recites that the said one-eighth was conveyed to him as trustee by J. D. Moore and wife by deed dated May 8, 1875. Joseph D. Moore is one of the joint grantees with Henry C. Dickinson in the deed from Pack. The deed from Moore to Mollohan, trustee, if any such there be, is not in the record. The recitals in the Mollohan deed are not evidence against a stranger to prove either title in the trustee, or his authority to sell and convey. Pyrrhus McGinnis, the remote grantor, having had legal title to only one undivided half, as we have before pointed out, it follows that H. C. Dickinson and his cointerests acquired legal title to only one undivided half. Dickinson, therefore, had legal title to only the one-sixth of one-half, or one undivided twelfth. J. Harvey Rowland, plaintiff's immediate grantor, acquired no greater interest than Dickinson had, so far as the record shows. So that, even if plaintiff had located the reservations and exceptions in favor of occupant claimants, in the deed from Pyrrhus McGinnis to Augustus Pack, and thereby have identified its land, it still has not proven title to more than one undivided twelfth of the Marsh fork tract.

[5, 8] In plaintiff's chain of title to the clear fork tract there is a deed from James H. McGinnis, special commissioner, to C. L. Thompson. The land appears to have been sold in a suit instituted in the circuit court of Raleigh county, styled H. T. McVey, Adm'r of S. H. Higginbotham v. Joseph B. Underwood, Adm'r of Richard Scott, et al. The papers in the cause are lost, and could not be found after diligent search, and the court permitted plaintiff to prove their contents. But the proof does not meet the legal requirement in such a case. There is testimony of a general and indefinite character respecting the purpose of the suit. But a fact, most material to be proven, was entirely omitted. No attempt appears to have been made to prove that the then holders of the legal title were before the court. It does not even appear who they were. A contract of sale of the land by Richard Scott to Samuel H. Higginbotham was the basis of that suit, which was either a suit to enforce the contract, or to rescind it. It does not clearly appear which was the purpose. The contract is dated August 26, 1854, and it recites that the land sold is "Scott's proportion of a certain tract or parcel of land bought jointly by the said Scott and Clay" at a sale by Alfred Beckley, commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands. Higginbotham paid $1,000 down, and was to pay $600 on the 1st day of March, 1857. But, whatever may have been the purpose of the bill, the court decreed a rescission of the contract, and held that the $1,000 which had been paid by Higginbotham was a lien on the land in favor of Higginbotham's estate, and decreed a sale of the land to pay it. The land was sold, and the sale confirmed, and James H. McGinnis was appointed a commissioner to make conveyance to C. L. Thompson, who was reported to be the purchaser. Said commissioner did make a deed, and that deed was permitted to be read as evidence, over the objection of defendant. The deed should have been rejected, because there was no proof whatever that the heirs of Richard Scott, in whom the title then was, were before the court. Wilson v. Braden, 48 W. Va. 196, 36 S. E. 367 (Point 3 of Syllabus), reaffirmed in Ronk v. Higginbotham, 54 W. Va. 137, 46 S. E. 128. The exclusion of this deed would cause a break in the chain of title to the Clear fork tract.

In view of plaintiff's failure to identify its Marsh fork tract of land, in that it did not locate the exceptions in the deed from Pyrrhus McGinnis to Augustus Pack, and in view of the fact that the deed from J. H. McGinnis, special commissioner, to C. L. Thompson for the Clear fork tract, should have been excluded as evidence of paper title, and in view of the further fact that there is no evidence tending to prove possessory title in plaintiff to any part of the land in controversy, it cannot complain of the verdict, which the jury found for the defendant.

It is not necessary to discuss the other assignments of error, relating to instructions and to admission of evidence for defendant, and rejection of certain other evidence offered by plaintiff, because, even if such other assignments should be well taken, they would not constitute prejudicial error.

In disposing of plaintiff's motion to set aside the verdict, the court permitted defendant to modify his disclaimer by enlarging it, so as to include a small strip of land along the Clear fork, outside of the lines of the 38-acre patent, and outside of the fence "as laid down on surveyor Wilson's map extending from 'K' to where said fence crosses said outside line of said 38 acre tract, which said small strip of land outside of the lines and the fence aforesaid is not claimed by defendant." This had the effect to enlarge defendant's original disclaimer, and consequently to reduce the amount of land claimed by him. In view of what we have hereinbefore said, we do not see how this subsequent disclaimer could have prejudiced plaintiff. It might have had a different effect if plaintiff itself had proven title to the strip of land disclaimed. It might then have appeared that it should have had a verdict for such portion of the land as was in issue. But it is unnecessary to decide what would have been the effect in that event, and we do not say. All that we do decide is that, because of plaintiff's failure to prove title, it is not prejudiced by this action of the court in permitting the defendant to reduce his claim after verdict.

The judgment of the lower court will be affirmed.

Error to Circuit Court, Jefferson County.

Action by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company against John W. Stipp and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and John W. Stipp and I. W. Stipp bring error. Affirmed.

Geo. M. Beltzhoover, Jr., of Charlestown, for plaintiffs in error. Brown & Brown, of Charlestown, for defendant in error Martin.

ROBINSON, J. In condemnation of land for railway purposes, a sum of money was paid into court, so that conflicting claims to it might be determined between U. S. Martin on the one hand and John W. and Isaac W. Stipp on the other. The matter was referred to a commissioner to ascertain to whom the money belonged, and in what proportion it should be paid over, if to both parties. The commissioner found that a part belonged to Martin and a part to the Stipps. This finding and report was based on documents filed before the commissioner and on testimony taken before him in relation to title and ownership of the land from which the money was derived. John W. and Isaac W. Stipp, claiming that they were the rightful owners of all the land from which the money arose, excepted to the report. The circuit court, upon a consideration of all the evidence on which the report was based, confirmed the report, and thus denied John W. and Isaac W. Stipp a part of the money, that is, the sum of $799. They seek a reversal of the order which gives Martin this sum. They insist that he owned no part of the land taken, but that they were the true owners of it all.

A certiorari on behalf of Martin has brought up some title papers that do not appear to have been in the record considered below. These documents can not for the first time be considered on appeal. Martin can not complete the proof of his title here. We are confined to the record that was made up and considered in the circuit court. The matter, however, is immaterial. Though Martin does not show perfect title to the parcel of land as to which the court has ordered the money to be paid to him, still we can not find that the money for that parcel belongs to the Stipps, unless they show that they were the true owners of that part of the land. John W. and Isaac W. Stipp can not complain that Martin got the money on an imperfect title, unless they show that they have the true title to the land from which the money arose. The order of the circuit court giving the money to Martin can not injure the Stipps, unless they themselves are entitled to the money. To be entitled to the money, they must show that they were the true owners of the land. If neither of the parties have shown true title to the land, we can not reverse at the instance of the Stipps; for in that event, they have no right to complain.

The Stipps do not show a perfect chain of title to the Potomac River cliffs, from which the money was derived, but they rely on possession for a long period of time under a deed made in 1868. They say that deed is color of title and that possession under it on the level portion of the land carries their possession to the bounds of the deed. That deed includes the cliffs, they claim, since it calls for the Potomac River. Ordinarily, possession of the level land to which the cliffs are attached, under the color of this deed, would be possession of the cliffs and would ripen into good title to the whole after the running of the statutory bar. Of course, this would not be true as to the cliffs if Martin showed an older perfect title thereto. There would then have to be actual possession on the interlock by the Stipps to take it away from him. No such actual possession by them on that particular part of the land is established by the record. But Martin does not show an older perfect title to this portion of the land. The record does not bear out his claim of perfect title. His paper chain is defective, and on it alone he relies. He does, however, show a long claim of ownership by himself and those under whom he holds. We must say whether the Stipps had such adverse possession of the cliffs under the color of their deed as to give them good title. Have they held the cliffs adversely? Both by the finding of the commissioner and of the circuit court, the question has been determined against the Stipps. Those findings rest on conflicting evidence. We can not overthrow them unless they are manifestly contrary to the evidence.

[1] We can not say from the evidence, to the extent of overthrowing the report of the commissioner and the finding of the circuit court thereon, that the Stipps have had adverse possession of the land beyond the line of the cliffs, or that their possession under the deed has constructively included the cliffs. It suffices to say that the evidence, though conflicting, will support a finding that the Stipps have not held the cliffs adversely so as to acquire title thereto—that the running of the statute necessary to give them good title has been broken by acts and declarations on their part in recognition of the Martin claim of title and in disavowal of any claim by themselves. A holding or possession to be adverse must be hostile. It must exclude others, not admit them. The evidence will support a finding that these and the other elements necessary to make possession adverse were lacking as to the possession of the cliffs on which the Stipps rely. Besides, it may be found from the evidence that the Stipps all along have construed their deed to take them to the river at the line of the cliffs and not down over the cliffs at the water's edge, so that they have not even had constructive possession of the cliffs by the force of their possession of the level part of the land under the deed.

[2] It is useless to detail the evidence on which the order appealed from is based. The case involves the application of no new principles. Why should we extend discussion? Though different judges might reach different conclusions on the evidence, yet we can not say that the finding of the circuit court on the controlling question of possession is plainly against a preponderance. A finding of a commissioner, based on evidence, and confirmed by the circuit court, is entitled to great respect on appeal. It will be sustained unless plainly wrong. Baker v. Jackson, 65 W. Va. 282, 64 S. E. 32.

Let the order be affirmed.

LONG v. POTTS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 20, 1912. Rehearing Denied

*(Syllabus by the Court.)PAROL EVIDENCE—AFFIRMANCE BY DIVIDED COURT.

Parol evidence to affect a promissory note. Owing to a division of opinion among the members of the court no syllabus of law is made.

Poffenbarger and Miller, JJ., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Action by Charles Amos Long against W. F. Potts and others. From the judgment, defendants Justus Eakin and another bring error. Affirmed.

Thos P. Jacobs and E. L. Robinson, for plaintiffs in error. P. D. Morris and T. H. Cornett, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, P. Charles Amos Long brought assumpsit against W. F. Potts, Alex Hart, and Justus Eakin on a promissory note made by Potts and Eakin. Much oral evidence was produced. Upon a demurrer by the plaintiff to the defendants' evidence, judgment was for the plaintiff.

Hart and Eakin pleaded non assumpsit and a special plea. This special plea avers that on the day when the note was executed, and before and at the time it was executed, it was agreed between Long and Eakin and Hart that if Eakin and Hart would execute the note as sureties for Potts at 20 days that within that time Long would procure from Potts, and Potts would execute, a deed of trust for the benefit of Long, and in exoneration and in indemnification of Eakin and Hart, on sufficient estate to secure payment of the note, not only to secure the debt, but to indemnify Eakin and Hart by reason of their suretyship. The plea avers that Eakin and Hart by the procurement of the plaintiff, and upon the said agreement, became sureties upon said note for 20 days, with the agreement and assurance that within that time Long would procure Potts to execute, and Potts would execute, such deed of trust, which said Potts agreed to and was able to do. The plea further averred that Long, contriving to injure Eakin and Hart, after he had procured said note and their signatures thereon, failed and refused to secure the execution of said trust deed, though Potts was at all times ready and willing to execute it. The plea was objected to by the plaintiff, and that objection was overruled, and the plaintiff cross-assigns error.

He says that the plea constitutes no defense. Is that plea good in law? I lay down the proposition, spoken by infinite cases, that a writing is deemed in law the full repository of the agreement or contract, and that the whole contract is expressed by it, and evidence of other oral stipulations is not admissible to incorporate other elements in it, so as to add to, alter, or contradict the agreement spoken by the writing, or to alter it by enlargement of its terms and make the contract have different legal effect and obligation. Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. 811; Orrick Co. v. Dawson, 67 W. Va. 403, 68 S. E. 39; Martin v. Railroad, 48 W. Va. 542, 37 S. E. 563. In Town-er v. Lucas, 13 Grat. 705, we find the law thus stated: "It was said by the court in the Countess of Rutland's Case, 5 Coke's R. 25, 'that it would be inconvenient that matters in writing, made by advice and on consideration, and which finally import the certain truth and agreement of the parties, should be controlled by averment of parties, to be proved by the uncertain testimony of slippery memory.' In Stevens v. Cooper, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 425, 7 Am. Dec. 499, Chancellor Kent remarks 'that there is no rule of evidence better settled than that which declares that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or substantially vary the legal import of a written agreement. Such testimony is not only contrary to the statute of frauds, but to the maxims of the common law; and the rules of evidence on this, as on most other points, are the same in courts of law and equity.' See Fell v. Chamberlain, 2 Dick. R. 484; Wooliam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. R. 211; Jordan v. Sawkins, 8 Bro. C. C. 388. In Crawford v. Jarrett, 2 Leigh, 630, Green, J., states the rule in these words: 'Parol evidence cannot be admitted (unless in case of fraud or mistake) to vary, contradict, add to, or explain the terms of a written agreement, by proving that the agreement of the parties was different from what it appears by the writing to have been.' In Watson v. Hurt, 6 Grat. 633, 644, Judge Baldwin announces the rule in the following terms: 'It is perfectly well settled that the terms of a written contract cannot be varied by parol evidence of what occurred between the parties previously thereto or contemporaneously therewith.' In 1 Greenl. Evi. § 275, the author observes that the rule as now briefly expressed is 'that parol cotemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument.' The rule thus announced as a rule of the common law at so early a day has been uniformly adhered to by the courts both of England and this country ever since; but in the application of it to different instruments difficulties have arisen. Courts, while laying down the rule as unquestioned and unquestionable, and professing to recognize its wisdom and binding authority, have drawn distinctions to take particular cases of apparent hardship from without its operation, which at first view would seem to violate the rule itself." In that case a surety was induced to sign a bond by a promise that he would not be asked to pay; but that oral agreement was held unavailable. In Woodward, Baldwin & Co. v. Foster, 18 Grat. 200, a party indorsed a bill of exchange, and it was agreed that the indorsee should retain in his hand the amount paid by him for the bills, and not pay the money over to the drawer of the bill until it was ascertained that the bill had been accepted and paid, and, if not accepted and paid by the drawee, then Foster would refund the money paid him for them. It was held that evidence of this collateral agreement could not be received. The principle above stated was laid down by the court. In 9 Ency. of Evidence, 352, it is stated that, if it appears that a writing in itself appears to be incomplete, oral evidence of contemporaneous agreement may be received; but "if, when so viewed, the writing appears to be complete, such evidence is then inadmissible." Page on Contracts says that in order to let in such evidence the contract must be incomplete on its face. See 1198.

Now, here is a promissory note complete on its face, speaking an absolute promise to pay, imposing an absolute liability; but that character and legal effect are to be destroyed by oral evidence of a collateral agreement. Another contract is made by this evidence far different from the contract legally imported by the note. The note in law imports absolute, unconditional liability; whereas, this oral evidence contradicts it by speaking an inconsistent contract. It qualifies the absolute liability created by the note. Why is it not inconsistent with that note? Much could be written on this subject. If such parol evidence is let in, what becomes of your written contract? What worth is your promissory note? In 17 Cyc. 567, referring to the rule excluding such oral evidence, it is said: "The rule is a necessary one, because of the obvious fact that written instruments would soon come to be of little value, if their explicit provisions could be varied, controlled, or superseded by such evidence, and it is also plain that a different rule would greatly increase the temptation to commit perjury." An absolute note cannot be defeated by oral proof of a condition. Erwin v. Saunders, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 249, 13 Am. Dec. 520. In 17 Cyc. 589, I find the following: "Although the authorities as to the admissibility of parol evidence to affect commercial paper are by no means uniform, the general rule is that bills and other instruments of a similar nature are not subject to be varied or contradicted by parol or extrinsic evidence. Accordingly it has been held inadmissible to show a parol agreement of the payee or holder of commercial paper not to enforce payment against the person or persons liable thereon, or a parol agreement that the payee or holder shall look to some other person or persons for payment, that he shall require payment only in a certain event or out of some particular fund, that he shall not require payment until a certain security has been exhausted, or shall not call on one of the persons liable for payment until all remedies against the others have been exhausted. It has also been held not admissible to show that the time for the payment of the obligation as agreed upon by the parties is different from the date of maturity as appearing in the instrument, to contradict a note as to the place of payment, or, where by the express terms or legal effect of an instrument it is payable in money, to show that it was agreed that it should be paid in any other way. It has also been asserted that any evidence varying or nullifying the effect of a written acceptance of a bill is inadmissible."

There are cases leading the other way. They say that collateral or independent facts not contradicting the writing may be proven. Campbell v. Fetterman, 20 W. Va. 398; 10 Encyclopedia Dig. Va. & W. Va. 698, 699. This rule says the matter to be proven by the oral evidence must not be inconsistent with the writing; but in our case it is. So those cases do not strictly apply. And how many Virginia and West Virginia cases apply the rule just above stated? Page on Contracts (the latest great work on Contracts) § 1189, after saying that, when parties have made a written contract, it is taken to embody all of it, "and merges all prior and contemporaneous negotiations," adds: "To violate this rule, and to admit extrinsic evidence of the intention of the parties direct, for the purpose of displacing their intention as shown in the written contract, is to substitute the inferior for the superior degree evidence, conjecture for fact, presumption for the highest degree of legal authority, loose recollection and uncertainty of memory for the most sure and faithful memorials which human ingenuity can devise or the law adopt." See, also, section 1192.

Another view, not without force, is that this collateral agreement to procure a deed of trust cannot be pleaded against the note, but must be enforced by a separate action for its breach. The New York Court of Appeals so held in Adams v. Gillig, 199 N. Y. 314, 92 N. E. 670, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 127, 20 Ann. Cas. 911. "It may be assumed that promises of future action, that are a part of the contract between the parties, to be binding upon them, must be stated in the contract. An oral restrictive covenant, or any oral promise to do or refrain from doing something effecting the property about which a written contract is made and executed between the parties, will not be enforced, not because the parties should not fulfill their promises and their legal and moral obligations, but because, the covenants and agreements being promissory and contractual in their nature, and a part of, or collateral to, a principal contract, the entire agreement between the parties must be deemed to have been merged in the writing. The value of a writing would be very seriously impaired if the rule mentioned in regard to including the entire agreement in such writing is not enforced. A strict enforcement of such rule tends to greater security and safety in business transactions and leaves less opportunity for dishonesty and false swearing, induced, perhaps, by a change of purpose or a failure to obtain the result that was anticipated when the transaction was originally consummated and reduced to writing. Such rule makes it necessary for the parties to a written contract to include everything therein pertaining to the subject-matter of the principal contract, and if by mistake or otherwise an oral agreement, a part of the transaction, is omitted from the writing, it can only be made effective and enforceable by a reformation of the writing, so that the same shall include therein the entire agreement between the parties. The rule is quite universal that statements promissory in their nature and relating to future actions must be enforced, if at all, by an action upon the contract. It is unnecessary to decide or discuss the question whether under some possible circumstances the courts will not in equity lay hold of false statements that are contractual in their nature to prevent the consummation of a fraud."

I have shown that such is the great volume of law in England and America. What is the plain, sound, safe rule? What are the boundaries or limit of its exceptions, when once we ignore the rule? I confess that I am strenuous to maintain this rule of safety and reason. That plea alleges that Long took upon himself the duty to get Potts to make said deed of trust. It is not necessary or proper to repeat the evidence. I assert that it does not sustain the plea by proving that Long took upon himself that obligation. The proposition to give a deed of trust originated with Potts as inducement for a loan. When Potts said that he would give it, Long only assented to it as Potts' proposal. It was Potts who assured the sureties that he would make the deed of trust. It is likely that Potts would so promise, unlikely that Long would assume the duty, and agree that, if he did not get the deed, his loan of $1,000 would be lost. Highly unreasonable. It is not proven.

Judge WILLIAMS and I hold that the plea is no bar in law. Judge ROBINSON and I hold that the evidence does not sustain the plea. Judge WILLIAMS and I say the evidence cannot be heard.

The result is that the judgment be affirmed.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). The rule inhibiting parol evidence to contradict, vary, or add to the terms of a written contract is not questioned, nor its wisdom doubted; but it has well-known and wholesome exceptions, one of which is that an oral contract, constituting an inducement to the execution of the written contract, may be shown, breach of which discharges the written contract or estops the party claiming under it. Page on Contracts, § 1204. Eakin and Hart were sureties, benefited in no way by the transaction, and induced to sign the note by Long's expression of assent to the condition. It was a collateral arrangement for discharge of the note; the sureties being liable in the event of failure of the principal to give the deed of trust within the specified time. It allows the note effect according to its letter, but sets up an agreement to which the payee was a party, nonperformance of which amounts to a constructive fraud upon the sureties. Having gotten them on the note, the payee refused to accept the deed of trust tendered in accordance with his collateral agreement with them and the prior agreement between him and the principal, evidently because he prefers the personal security for some reason. The parol evidence rule was never intended for use as a means of accomplishing inequitable and unjust purposes. Nor is there any public policy or reason which forbids such an agreement as the one set up here as attendant upon the written contract, which is obviously only a memorandum, and in a sense incomplete, not reciting any consideration or containing any covenant or agreement on the part of the payee. It is not a formal and elaborate contract, purporting to cover all that transpired between the parties, nor in any way indicating their situation or the purposes of the agreement.

For these reasons, Judge MILLER and I dissent.

A. B. FARQUHAR CO., Limited, v. DEHAVEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 2, 1912. Rehearing Denied
June 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION (§ 161*)—JUDGMENT (§ 46*)— CONFESSION—VALIDITY.

A judgment, purporting to be by confession of attorneys in fact, on a note, commonly called a judgment note, on warrant of attorney therein, purporting to empower and authorize the payees, or agent, or any prothonotary, or attorney of record, to appear for the makers and in their names, and confess judgment against them in favor of the payees, for the amount, with costs, and release of errors, entered by the clerk, in the clerk's office, in vacation, without process executed on defendant and declaration filed, is illegal and void on its face; and any execution issued thereon is also without warrant of law, illegal and void, and on motion of defendants should be quashed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 467-471; Dec. Dig. § 161.* Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 65-67, 70, 72, 85-88; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

Brannon, P., and Robinson, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County.

Action by Arthur B. Farquhar and others, partners as A. B. Farquhar Co., Limited, against Charles E. Dehaven and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. O. Henson and Allen B. Noll, for plaintiffs in error. Martin & Selbert, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. The judgment below to which this writ of error applies, denied the motion of defendants to quash the execution on a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, entered against them, in vacation, by the clerk of the circuit court on September 12, 1910.

The entire record of the judgment as presented here is as follows:

"This day came the defendants, by Martin & Selbert, their attorneys in fact, and say that they cannot gainsay the plaintiffs' action against them, but that they are justly indebted to the said plaintiffs in the sum of $527.07 with interest thereon from this date and the costs of this action, on account of two certain notes, one dated August 30th, 1909, due six months after date, and the other dated August 30th, 1909, due twelve months after date.

"It is therefore considered that the plaintiffs, Arthur B. Farquhar, Wm. E. Farquhar, and Frances Farquhar, general partners, trading and doing business as A. B. Farquhar Co., Ltd., do recover of and from the said defendants, Charles E. Dehaven and H. L. Dehaven, the sum of Five Hundred and Twenty-Seven Dollars and Seven Cents ($527.07), with interest from this date until paid, and their costs in this behalf expended. Teste: L. De W. Gerhardt, Clerk Circuit Court of Berkeley County, West Virginia.

"Memo: Said notes were filed with the said clerk upon the day of the entry of said order, and are in the words and figures following:"

The notes referred to, of which one is copied in the record, are judgment notes, in form like those in use in Pennsylvania, bearing six per cent. interest, and providing for a ten per cent. attorneys fee in addition to all other necessary expenses of collection after maturity. They also contain waiver of presentment and protest, homestead and exemption rights real and personal, and other rights, and also the following material provision: "And we do hereby empower and authorize the said A. B. Farquhar Co., Limited, or agent, or any prothonotary or attorney of any Court of Record to appear for us and in our name to confess judgment against us and in favor of said A. B. Farquhar Co., Limited, for the above named sum with costs of suit and release of all errors and without stay of execution after the maturity of this note."

The motion to quash assigned as the only ground therefor that the judgment is void, the clerk being without authority to enter the same upon a judgment note, as was done, without suit and service of process.

As both sides agree the question presented is one of first impression in this State. We have no statute, as has Pennsylvania and many other states, regulating the subject. In the decision we are called upon to render, we must have recourse to the rules and principles of the common law, in force here, and to our statute law, applicable, and to such judicial decisions and practices in Virginia, in force at the time of the separation, as are properly binding on us. It is pertinent to remark in this connection, that after nearly fifty years of judicial history in this State no case has been brought here involving this question, strong evidence, we think, that such notes, if at all, have never been in very general use in this commonwealth. And in most states where they are current the use of them has grown up under statutes authorizing them, and regulating the practice of employing them in commercial transactions. In the early Colonial history of Virginia, they seem to have had considerable recognition, but their use was abolished, and prohibited by penal statutes, enacted in 1744, and they did not again come into use until that statute was repealed by the Code of 1849. 5 Hen. Stat. p. 240, sections 4 and 5; section 12, ch. 76, Code 1819; Revisors' Code, 826, note. This history is pretty thoroughly covered by the arguments of counsel, and the opinion of Judge Moncure in Insurance Co. v. Barley's Admr., 16 Grat. (Va.) 363, Anno. 144. We do not wish to be understood, however, as asquiescing in Judge Moncure's exposition of the common law on the subject, vouched in support of the early colonial practices so severely condemned by the statute of 1744. It is significant that this statute does not refer the practice condemned to the common law as its source. Section 4 thereof recites: "And whereas a practice has of late been introduced, of taking bonds, commonly called judgment bonds, with condition, for the payment of money, and a general power to any attorney, to appear, and suffer judgment, etc. * * *; which practice must be attended with ill consequences, debtors having no previous notice of the time and place of rendering such judgments, whereby they are deprived of an opportunity of making discounts appear against the bond, and are first put to unnecessary law charges, and then obliged to enter into expensive chancery suits for relief: To remedy whereof, &c."

The substantial features of section 5, of this act, are embodied in section 12, chapter 76, Revised Code 1819, reading as follows: "If any Attorney, or other person practicing as an Attorney, shall presume to appear under any power of attorney, made before action brought, for confessing or suffering judgment to pass by default or otherwise, for any defendant in any court of record within this Commonwealth, such Attorney shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay fifteen hundred dollars, to such defendant, for his own use, to be recovered, with costs, by action of debt or information, in any court of record; and, moreover, shall be liable to an action for damages, at the suit of the party grieved." It was this section which on recommendation of the Revisors, was omitted from the Code of 1849, repealing it, and by which repeal it is argued the common law was thereby restored. We find no justification, either in the history of the common law or elsewhere, for the argument presented here, that the repeal of the statute of 1744 by the Code of 1849, revived a local practice not known to the common law, and which the repealing act itself recites had "of late been introduced." That the common law so far as affected by Act of 1744, was restored by its repeal we concede, but farther than that we are unwilling to go.

In Insurance Co. v. Barley's Admr., supra, the latest Virginia case which can be said to have binding force upon us, suit had been brought, but it does not distinctly appear whether or not the process had been executed. The grounds assigned for the motion to set aside the judgment were: (1) That the power of attorney was executed before suit brought; (2) that an attorney in fact not an attorney at law could not confess judgment for his principal; (3) that if an attorney in fact could not confess judgment in open court, only the defendant himself could confess judgment in the clerk's office.

The only points of decision in that case, pertinent in this case, are covered by points 2, 3 and 4 of the syllabus, as follows: (2) "A power of attorney to confess a judgment may be executed before the action is brought." (3) "A judgment may be confessed either in court or in the clerk's office, by an attorney in fact, though the attorney is not a lawyer." (4) "When a statute changing the common law is repealed, the common law is restored to its former state." The fourth point we concede; and limited by the rules and principles of the common law, as modified by our statutes, section 43, chapter 125, and section 2, chapter 134, Code 1906, we do not know that any particular fault can be found with the general character of points 2 and 3. The Revisors of the Code of 1849, in a note, as a reason for omitting said section 12, as of no value, say: "We do not perceive any good reason why a power of attorney to confess judgment should not be lawful before a writ is sued out as well as after."

By gradual steps, however, the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, in subsequent decisions, have further innovated on the common law. In Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31 Grat. (Va.) 580, 599, it is held, that a judgment rendered in court, upon the confession of the defendant in person, is not subject to collateral attack for lack of process. The judgment in that case, however, was not predicated on the Virginia statute—the same as our section 43, chapter 125, supra—permitting a defendant in vacation to confess a judgment or decree in the clerk's office. This court held practically the same thing in Hunter's Ex'rs v. Stewart, 23 W. Va. 549. But in the later case of Shadrack's Admr. v. Woolfolk, 32 Grat. (Va.) 709, it was decided, that a judgment confessed by the defendant in the clerk's office in vacation is not the subject of collateral attack by other creditors. By obiter dicta, the court, however, ventured the opinion that if it plainly appeared that the judgment was confessed without a writ or previous process, it would not on that ground be void. Citing the Brockenbrough Case, which was a confession in court by the defendant in person. The court said, it perceived no substantial difference between the two cases. In Saunders v. Lipscomb, 90 Va. 647, 19 S. E. 450, relying on the two cases just referred to, and in Manson & Shell v. Rawlings, 112 Va. 384, 71 S. E. 564, the court went still farther, in holding in the first case, that a judgment by confession by an attorney in fact, in the latter, by defendant in person, in vacation, in the clerk's office, without process, was not subject to collateral attack, and it may be observed that the farthest any of these Virginia cases have gone, literally at least, is to hold such judgments not subject to collateral attack.

The case we have here, on the motion to quash, is one of collateral attack, and to sustain the motion and reverse the judgment below, we must hold the judgment void upon its face. Is it so void? As already indicated, the question must be answered practically upon the common law rules and principles. We have no statute in any way governing the subject, except section 43, chapter 125, of the Code, providing for a confession by defendant in vacation in the clerk's office. What then is the common law applicable to the case?

In 1 Black on Judgments, section 50, it is said: "All judgments rendered upon the confession of the defendant may be divided into two classes: 1. Those entered in an action regularly commenced by the issuance and service of process. 2. Those entered upon the confession of the defendant, or his warrant of attorney, without the institution of an action. The former class of judgments are well known to the common law, and must be tested and sustained by rules and principles existing independently of statute, while judgments of the latter class derive all their efficacy from positive law and must conform, in order to be valid, to all the requirements and formalities set up by the Legislature." In the same section this writer further says: "Now judgments entered for the plaintiff upon the defendant's admission of the facts and law, as the same are known to the common law and exist independently of statutes, are of two varieties; first, judgment by cognovit actionem, and second, by confession relicta verificatione. In the former case the defendant, after service, instead of entering a plea, acknowledges and confesses that the plaintiff's cause of action is just and rightful. In the latter case, after pleading and before trial, the defendant both confesses the plaintiff's cause of action and withdraws or abandons his plea or other allegations, whereupon judgment is entered against him without proceeding to trial. In order to sustain a judgment of either of these sorts, it is essential that process, regularly issued, should have been served upon the defendant (though he may accept service with the same effect as if the writ had been served as it usually is); and an agreement in writing made out of court, authorizing the clerk to enter up such a judgment, will not sustain it, where there has been no appearance by the defendant." Blackstone says, on the subject of confession of judgment at common law: "And this happens, in the first place, where the defendant suffers judgment to go against him by default, or nihil dicit; as if he puts in no plea at all to the plaintiff's declaration: by confession or cognovit actionem, where he acknowledges the plaintiff's demand to be just: or by non sum informatus, when the defendant's attorney declares he has no instruction to say any thing in answer to the plaintiff, or in defence of his client; which is a species of judgment by default. If these, or any of them, happen in actions where the specific thing sued for is recovered, as in actions of debt for a sum certain, the judgment is absolutely complete. And therefore it is very usual, in order to strengthen a creditor's security, for the debtor to execute a warrant of attorney to some attorney named by the creditor, empowering him to confess a judgment by either of the ways just now mentioned (by nihil dicit, cognovit actionem, or non sum informatus; in an action of debt to be brought by the creditor against the debtor for the specific sum due: which judgment, when confessed, is absolutely complete and binding. * * * 3 Blackstone, Com. 396, 397. The great Virginia commentator, Mr. Minor, says on this subject (IV Minor's Inst. 726): "The defendant was always allowed to acknowledge the plaintiff's action, and confess a judgment for the amount claimed, or for such part thereof as he and the plaintiff could agree upon, provided it was done in open court. But a confession of judgment in the clerk's office was never contemplated by the common law, and can only take place in pursuance of the authority of some statute."

So according to these authorities the warrant of attorney, in use at common law, was confined to the confession of judgments, in the three ways enumerated by Blackstone, in a pending suit; that is by answering nihil dicit, cognovit actionem, or non sum informatus. And as Mr. Black says, judgments by confession of defendant or on his warrant of attorney, without the institution of an action, derive all their efficacy from positive or statute law. And judgment in the clerk's office, as Mr. Minor says, was never contemplated at the common law. Such warrant of attorney was usually given by the defendant to the plaintiff, by way of security, on compromising an action; and it authorized the attorney to whom it was directed to appear for the defendant, and to receive a declaration in an action to be brought against him, and thereupon confess the same in the manner already indicated. Tidd's New Pract. (Ed. 1837) 275; 1 Tidd's Pract. (Ed. 1828) pp. 590, 606; 2 Chitty, Gen. Pract. 333.

In the case at bar, counsel for defendants in error say, they rely upon the fact that there is nothing in the record showing affirmatively that process was not served. The record, however, purports to be a complete transcript of all the proceedings which took place in the clerk's office in vacation, not at rules; and as no process is exhibited or referred to, we think we must necessarily say that no suit was begun by process, and that there was no action pending in which at common law, a judgment on a warrant of attorney could have been confessed, in either of the ways authorized by the ancient practice. Mr. Freeman says, 2 Freeman on Judgments, section 547: "Judgments by confession are in no wise exempt from the rule applicable to other judgments, that to be valid they must be entered in a court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action and the parties thereto. Though no adjudication is in fact required in entering a judgment of confession without action, yet it has all the qualities, incidents, and attributes of other judgments, and cannot be valid unless entered in a court which might have lawfully pronounced the same judgment in a contested action.' Where the law requires judgments to be signed by the judge, its provision extends to judgment by confession, and renders them void if not so signed." Looking to the literal terms of the power we see it authorizes appearance, but gives no specific authority to waive process, or to appear in the clerk's office, or waive the filing of the declaration; and limited by the rules and practices prevailing at common law, we must say no donee of the power had any authority to waive any of the rights of the plaintiff, to be sued and served with process, and to have a declaration filed on which judgment might lawfully be entered. Without jurisdiction thus acquired a judgment at common law on warrant of attorney would have been void. And even in those states, where it is otherwise provided by statute, the statute being in derogation of common law rights, the statutes are strictly construed. 23 Cyc. 699.

Let us see how this question has been viewed in the other states than Virginia. In Vermont, the Supreme Court says: "Judgments on confession without antecedent process have no basis other than the statute, and a full compliance with the statute is necessary to their validity, and the provisions authorizing them are to be strictly construed." Mason v. Ward, 80 Vt. 290, 87 Atl. 820, 130 Am. St. Rep. 987. In Iowa, in response to the contention that the statute there, regulating confession of judgment, was merely cumulative of the common law remedy, the court said: "We do not think this position is correct. * * * So far as we are advised it has never been the understanding of the profession nor of the business community in this State that warrants of attorney to confess judgment had any place in our law. A confession of judgment pertains to the remedy. A party seeking to enforce here a contract made in another State must do so in accordance with the laws of this State. Parties cannot by contract made in another State engraft upon our procedure here remedies which our laws do not contemplate nor authorize." Hamilton v. Schoenberger, 47 Iowa, 385. In New Jersey the entry of judgment by a justice on a judgment note without process or proof was declared illegal. That court said: "The defendant must be brought into court in the usual way, and the same proceeding had, as in other cases of written contracts." Stretch v. Hancock, 2 N. J. Law, 193. In Tennessee, in Carlin v. Taylor, 75 Tenn. 666, the Supreme Court held, that no judgment could be confessed in that state by an attorney, on a judgment note like the one involved here. And in Kansas and Missouri, such notes are condemned, and the practice of employing them repudiated on principles of public policy, and as giving to the defendant no day in court, and as permitting the defendant to bargain away his right to be heard in court, contrary to public policy. McCrairy v. Ware, 6 Kan. App. 155, 158, 51 Pac. 293; First Nat. Bank v. White, 220 Mo. 717, 730, 120 S. W. 36, 132 Am. St. Rep. 612, 16 Ann. Cas. 889. We are inclined to agree with the Missouri court in the case last cited, in which they say: "Such agreements are iniquitous to the uttermost and should be promptly condemned by the courts, until such time as they may receive express statutory recognition, as they have in some states."

Of course if a debtor has been summoned into court by process, and given a day and an opportunity to be heard, no good reason could be assigned why a judgment should not be pronounced against him at common law by confession on a warrant of an attorney. The fact that the Virginia court and this court have recognized the right of the defendant by personal appearance, to submit himself without process to the jurisdiction of the court, and to confess a valid judgment against him, and that a proper construction of our statute, section 43, chapter 125, of the Code, might authorize a defendant to appear in person in the clerk's office and make like confession of judgment, we do not regard any justification for the proposition, that he may by warrant of attorney authorize appearance by and confession of judgment, either in court or in the clerk's office, without process directed and regularly served upon him. It is contended, however, that the old legal maxim, qui facit per alium, facit per se, is as applicable here as in other cases. We do not think so. Strong reasons exist, as we have shown, for denying its application, when holders of contracts of this character seek the aid of the courts and of their execution process to enforce them, defendant having had no day in court or opportunity to be heard. We need not say in this case that a debtor may not by proper power of attorney duly executed, authorize another to appear in court, and by proper endorsement upon the writ waive service of process, and confess judgment. But we do not wish to be understood as approving or intending to countenance the practice of employing in this state commercial paper of the character here involved. Such paper has heretofore had little if any currency here. If the practice is adopted into this state it ought to be, we think, by act of the Legislature, with all proper safeguards thrown around it, to prevent fraud and imposition. The policy of our law is, that no man shall suffer judgment at the hands of our courts without proper process and a day to be heard. To give currency to such paper by judicial pronouncement would be to open the door to fraud and imposition, and to subject the people to wrongs and injuries not heretofore contemplated. This we are unwilling to do.

These considerations lead us to conclude that a judgment by confession in the clerk's office, on warrant of attorney, without process regularly issued and served upon or accepted by defendant is void on its face. We therefore reverse the judgment below, quash the execution, and award the defendants costs here and in the court below, incurred on said motion.

ROBINSON, J. (dissenting). The judgment on which the execution issued is regular and valid on its face. The execution could not be quashed. The order overruling the motion to quash the execution is right and should be affirmed. The only record on which the circuit court could act in determining that motion does not show the judgment void. As far as appears from the record leading to the judgment, that judgment is sound. It purports to have been entered in a pending action. The court could not say the defendants were not served with process and that no declaration was filed, even if those things were necessary as to a judgment by confession. But the judgment itself shows that the court had jurisdiction to enter it. The defendants appeared by attorneys-in-fact and answered the action; so says the record. Service of process has never heretofore been considered necessary as to a party who appears. We have always understood that a party could appear, waive a declaration, release errors, and do many other things toward the entry of a judgment against him. And we are sure that it has heretofore been well established that one could appear to an action by an attorney-in-fact and do all that he could in person. The record does not show that the defendants appeared in this action by attorneys-in-fact acting under the so-called judgment notes. For all the court could see in considering the motion to quash the execution, the attorneys-in-fact appeared and confessed for defendant under a valid power of attorney to do so. The power of attorney was not made a part of the record. It can not be assumed that an invalid power of attorney was recognized in the entry of judgment. The presumption is otherwise.

That the judgment was entered in the clerk's office in vacation, does not affect its verity on collateral attack. It has the same dignity in this respect as a judgment entered in court. The statute expressly says so. Code 1906, ch. 125, sec. 43. "Whether a judgment be the act of the court, or be entered up by the clerk under the statute, the effect is the same; in either case it is the act of the law, and until reversed by the court which rendered it, or by a superior tribunal, it imports absolute verity, and is as effectual and binding as if pronounced upon a trial upon its merits." 8 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 547.

The judgment has been overthrown on a collateral attack by bringing in matters that are not in the record. An issue of matters outside the record on which the judgment rests, made up on a motion to quash the execution, has been resorted to in finding the judgment to be void. Such matters could only be resorted to on a direct attack of the judgment. The circuit court well knew that it could not quash an execution that rested on a judgment fully purporting jurisdiction and validity—that the verity of such judgment could not be impeached on collateral attack. "Where a court of general jurisdiction acts within the scope of its general powers, its judgments will be presumed to be in accordance with its jurisdiction and can not be collaterally impeached unless the record discloses a want of jurisdiction." See the cases cited in 8 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 545.

If the case of direct attack dealt with by the majority opinion were properly before us, we would be of opinion that common law principles and Virginia law do not condemn the judgment as void, unless it be on the ground that the power of attorney in the notes is so sweeping and general, so full of partiality to the creditor, as to be void. But this moot question we shall not decide. We may suggest that the power of attorney in the notes is not of the definite and particular character of those powers of attorneys to confess judgments long recognized in Virginia. However, if the power of attorney is valid, no service of process on defendants was necessary when those persons authorized by it to appear to the action in behalf of defendants did so appear. Yet the majority opinion is rested on the want of process. Throughout it that ground is relied on; the concluding paragraph emphasizes that ground. Why is service of process necessary if the warrant of attorney is valid? If it is good, and the attorneys constituted by it to appear to the action do appear thereto pursuant to that authority, the defendants that made them attorneys-in-fact for that purpose have thereby entered an appearance. The defendants then have notice of the suit through their attorneys-in-fact. The court takes jurisdiction of the defendants by their appearance. When the attorneys-in-fact appear, that appearance is one by the defendants who authorized those attorneys-in-fact to make it. Surely, the want of direct service of process is not a sound reason for the majority opinion, if the power of attorney is valid. That opinion only makes it invalid because no process was served on the defendants who gave it.

The reasoning of the opinion virtually leads to this: A. is detained in California as an invalid. He hears from home that a creditor is threatening suit. He has no defense and deems it to his best interest that judgment be entered against him. He sends a warrant of attorney to B. to appear to an action instituted by the creditor and to confess judgment in his behalf. B. can not do so because no service of process can be made on A. The creditor can not take judgment though A. offers to appear and confess it by duly authorized proxy. If this is sound, it is strange that recognition and practise have long been otherwise.

There was just one question to be answered in the assumed case dealt with by the majority: Is the power of attorney a valid one? If it is valid, if it gave the authority it purports to give, a judgment could be confessed under it on behalf of defendants in an action, even in the clerk's office, and that confession would be a waiver or release of errors. 3 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 70, 74, 75.

BRANNON, P. I concur in the above dissent.

MILLER v. BERKELEY LIMESTONE CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 16, 1912. Rehearing Denied
June 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 118*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

The general rule, which obliges the master to furnish his servant a reasonably safe place in which to work, does not apply to a quarry, where the work to be done necessarily changes conditions and renders the place more or less dangerous as the work progresses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 250; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 211*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RISKS ASSUMED BY SERVANT.

The master is not liable to his servant, as for negligence in failing to furnish a reasonably safe place to work, for injury received in a quarry, by a stone falling upon him from the bank or cliff above, occasioned by the labor performed in operating the quarry. Such an accident was a risk assumed by the servant.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 199*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS.

All laborers employed by a common master to work in a stone quarry, whether their duty be to drill, to shoot off blasts, or to remove loose stone from the cliff, stand in relation to each other as fellow servants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 491; Dec. Dig. § 199.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 189*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANT.

The foreman of a crew of laborers employed to work in a stone quarry, who has power to employ and discharge men and to direct their work, is, nevertheless, only a fellow servant, unless his negligence relates to some nondelegable duty which the master owed to the injured servant. Whether a superior servant is a vice principal depends upon the nature of his negligent act, and not upon his grade or rank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 427-435, 437-448; Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 190*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS.

In the absence of the master's negligence in selecting his foreman, he is not liable for injury to a servant who was led into danger by a false assurance of safety given by the foreman, unless the negligent act of the foreman relates to the master's nondelegable duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 449-474; Dec. Dig. § 190.*]

Miller and Robinson, JJ., dissenting in part.

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County.

Action by Annie C. Miller, administratrix, against the Berkeley Limestone Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Faulkner, Walker & Woods, of Martinsburg, for plaintiff in error. Marshall McCormick, of Berryville, Va., H. H. Emmert, of Martinsburg, and James F. Minor, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. Plaintiff's intestate, John W. H. Miller, was employed as a driller in defendant's quarry and on the 16th of July, 1907, was fatally injured by a rock falling upon him, and died shortly thereafter. This action is to recover damages for his death, which plaintiff alleges was due to defendant's negligence in not providing deceased a safe place to work. On a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, the court rendered judgment for defendant, and plaintiff obtained this writ of error.

Counsel for plaintiff insist that the evidence was sufficient to prove negligence, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto. But the sufficiency of the evidence to establish negligence depends upon the law relative to defendant's duty to its servant in the premises.

Defendant operated a stone quarry and employed a number of men, who worked under a foreman. Deceased had worked in the quarry for six or seven years, except in the winter season, when the work stopped. The distance from the natural surface above to the bottom of the quarry was 60 to 80 feet, and the ledge on which deceased was working at the time of the fatal accident was about 8 feet wide, and from 15 to 20 feet below the natural surface. From the ledge upward, the face of the quarry sloped at an angle of about 45 degrees. This slope was not solid rock, but was composed of clay and rock mixed. On the day of the accident deceased and his helper, one Holly, were directed by the foreman to set the drill at a certain point on the ledge, and to begin drilling. They did so, and began drilling about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and in two or three hours thereafter a rock, weighing 300 pounds or more, which was partially imbedded in the clay some distance up the slope above the driller's head, loosened and rolled down, striking him on the head and fatally injuring him.

[1] It is a familiar rule of law, too well recognized to merit discussion, that one of the nonassignable duties of the master is to provide his servants a reasonably safe place in which to work. But, like most other general rules, this one has its exceptions, and one is that the master is not under duty to keep the working place safe, when the very work which the servant is employed to perform changes the condition of the place, and makes it more or less dangerous, as the work advances.

[2] As the drilling and blasting progressed, the face of the quarry underwent frequent changes, causing the working place to become more dangerous at some times than at others. Deceased knew this as well as his employer, and assumed such risks as would reasonably be expected to result from the changes in the condition of the place, and which would be brought about by the work which he was employed to perform. 2 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 588; White on Per. Devling, 34 Colo. 37, 81 Pac. 252.

Giving full credit to the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, considering all proper inferences deductible therefrom, and disregarding all of the testimony of defendant's witnesses conflicting therewith, as we must do on considering a demurrer to the evidence, the following facts may be regarded as proved, viz.: That it was the duty of Abe Miller, a shooter, and Allie Waters, his helper, after a blast was set off and before resetting the drill, to remove the earth and loose rock that would be liable to fall and injure the workmen below; that they knew, on the day before the accident, of the presence of the rock that fatally injured plaintiff's intestate, and thought it was dangerous, but failed to remove it; that Abe Miller, knowing that he himself would not be working at the quarry on the succeeding day, told his helper, Allie Waters, to remove the stone before the drill was set on the ledge below it on the next day; that Allie Waters did not remove it, because he was told by Tenas Milbourn, the foreman, to do something else. He does not remember what other work he was told to do. On cross-examination he says: "On Monday evening a while before quitting [which was the day before the accident], when the driller called my attention to it [the rock], I went and told Mr. Milbourn." Mr. Milbourn denies this, but on demurrer to evidence we must accept the testimony of Waters as true. Presumably, the driller referred to by Waters was the deceased. Abe Madden, another witness for plaintiff, testifies that on the morning of the accident he heard deceased tell Milbourn that "that stone looked dangerous up there," and that Milbourn replied that he had examined it, and that it was all right. This witness also says he heard Milbourn say to deceased that, if he did not set his drill there, he would get some one else in his place. Allie Waters also says that deceased "often helped [him] to clean off a set when he had no drilling to do."

J. F. Purcell, superintendent of the quarries and a witness for defendant, testifies that he instructed the drillers to see that everything was safe above them before beginning to drill, and that he personally instructed deceased on the day of the accident. This is not denied, except inferentially by one or two other drillers, who say that they were not so instructed. The foregoing recital is sufficient to show the state of facts which, as plaintiff's counsel contend, are sufficient to establish defendant's negligence. But some one, or more, of defendant's employes, whose duty it was to remove the dangerous stone, must stand in the relation of vice principal to deceased, before the law will hold it liable for their negligence. It is contended that Tenas Milbourn, Abe Miller, and Allie Waters were all vice principals. That depends, however, upon whether the negligent act, of which they were guilty, related to the performance of a nondelegable duty which defendant owed to deceased, and that, in turn, depends upon whether it was the company's duty to keep the quarry, at all times, in a reasonably safe condition. If so, then Abe Miller and Allie Waters, whose duty it was to take down the loose stone, were performing a nonassignable duty of the master, and therefore occupied the relation of vice principal to deceased. "Whether the employé whose negligence caused the injury was or was not a vice principal is determined by the nature of the functions which he was, as a matter of fact, discharging at the time when the injury was received, and not by the appellation by which he was designated." 2 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 508. Jackson v. Railroad Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337. But we have already said that the master was not under duty to keep the quarry safe. That it would sometimes become unsafe was to be expected. The work could not be performed without blasting down the cliff, and the blasting shattered the rock and made the place unsafe. Deceased must have known that loose stones were liable to fall after a blast, if they were not removed, and men were employed to remove them. The work to be performed being of such character as, necessarily, to produce changes in the conditions surrounding the workmen, the law does not impose upon the master the duty to be present for the purpose of keeping it in a reasonably safe condition. The bank above the ledge was clay mixed with boulders or separate stones, and it was reasonable to suppose that the falling of such stones would be a frequent and a natural occurrence. At least, it does not appear that such was not frequently the case. Why, then, was the fatal accident not an incidental risk which deceased had assumed? It is clearly proven, and not denied, that, before the drill was set, deceased and his helper removed the loose earth and stones that had slid down upon the ledge. How long since they had fallen does not appear, but deceased evidently knew that more was liable to come down.

In Durst v. Steel Co., 173 Pa. 162, 33 Atl. 1102, plaintiff was employed with a gang of men under a foreman, to make excavations, and was injured by the caving in of a bank. The court in point 1 of the syllabus stated the law as follows, viz.: "When danger can only arise as work progresses and be caused by the work done, the employer is not bound to stand by during the progress of the work to see when the danger arises. It is sufficient if he provides against such danger as may possibly or probably arise, and gives the workmen the means of protecting themselves. It is then the duty of the workmen to look out for such dangers, and use the means provided."

In Mielke v. Railway Co., 103 Wis. 1, 79 N. W. 22, 74 Am. St. Rep. 834, plaintiff was employed as a workman in a quarry and was injured by a rock falling, upon him from the cliff above, in very much the same manner that deceased was injured in the present case; the difference being that in that case, while it was shown to be the custom to examine the cliff after a blast was set off, it did not appear that such examination had been made before the accident, while in the present case the danger was apparent, but deceased had been told by the foreman that he had examined the rock and that it was safe. The court there held that the defendant was not liable as not having provided a safe place for his servant to work, and in its opinion (103 Wis. 5, 79 N. W. 23 [74 Am. St. Rep. 834]), says: "The plaintiff and his fellow workmen were practically making the place in which they were to work. At each succeeding blast the conditions and surroundings were changed. The danger to which they were exposed was the direct result of their own operations. It was the result of their common labor, including that of the foreman. The plaintiff was familiar with the work. He knew that the condition was constantly changing by reason of his own acts. He appreciated the danger, because he knew that rocks were liable to fall. As stated in the *Larson Case*¹: "The negligence, if any, in this view of the case, would be that of the plaintiff and his fellow servants, and the risk of it must be regarded as assumed by the plaintiff as incident to his employment; and, in any view that may be taken of the case, it must be regarded as a risk assumed by the plaintiff as an incident to his employment."

Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co., 45 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785, is also very much in point, because the plaintiff, in that case, was injured as a result of the negligence of a fellow servant in the performance of a particular work, a part of which was designed and intended as a convenient means to be used by plaintiff and others in performing their particular work. Defendant company was a manufacturer of lumber, and employed upon its yards a crew of 40 or 50 men, a part of whom were engaged in piling the green lumber, while others were employed in measuring, assorting, scaling, and delivering dry lumber. According to a prevailing custom, in stacking the boards, at certain intervals in the pile the ends of boards were projected from the pile to be used as steps in ascending and descending the pile. In one of the piles a defective board had been negligently put in as a step, and plaintiff, who belonged to the crew of scalers, and who had nothing to do with the piling, in ascending the stack, stepped upon this defective board, and it broke, precipitating him to the ground and causing his injury. There was no proof that the men employed as pilers were not competent workmen. It was contended that the defendant was liable for the negligence of the pilers who had used the defective board, that it did not furnish a safe place, or safe appliance, intended for plaintiff's use in performing his work. But the court there held that the relation of plaintiff to the pilers was that of fellow servant, and that defendant was not liable.

[3] The fact that the laborers were classified as drillers, shooters, and their helpers, does not affect their relation to deceased as fellow servants. They were all engaged in a common employment of the master, whose duty in the premises was discharged when it employed competent workmen, and furnished them proper machinery and appliances for carrying on the work safely. Thereafter the business of keeping the quarry in a reasonably safe condition was a part of the servants' general employment. It is not alleged that Abe Miller and Allie Waters were incompetent servants. They were fellow servants with deceased, and the defendant is not liable for their negligence that caused the death of deceased. Flannegan v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 40 W. Va. 436, 21 S. E. 1028, 52 Am. St. Rep. 896; Oliver v. O. R. R. Co., 42 W. Va. 703, 26 S. E. 444; Jackson v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Donnelly, 88 Va. 853, 14 S. E. 692.

[4] It is claimed that, because Tenas Milbourn had the power to employ and to discharge laborers, having actually threatened to get another man to drill in deceased's place if he did not set his drill on the ledge at the point designated and begin drilling, he was, therefore, a vice principal, and defendant is liable for Milbourn's negligence in failing to remove the rock after it had been brought to his attention. But, as we have already intimated, the relation of vice principal does not depend upon the servant's rank or his authority to direct the movements of the laborers under him. The relation of vice principal is determinable by the character of the negligent act which causes the injury; i. e., whether or not it pertains to a nonassignable duty of the master. It may be, and in fact is often, the case that a subordinate servant may be a vice principal in relation to a particular act or omission of duty, and only a fellow servant in all other respects; and, on the other hand, a foreman, having power to direct the movement of laborers under him, may be only a fellow servant. Jackson v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337, 2 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 520, and numerous cases cited in note.

[5] Notwithstanding an employer's liability statute, making the employer liable in damages to an employé who is injured and who is himself in the exercise of due care and diligence at the time, "by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, intrusted with and exercising superintendence, whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence," the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held, in McGinty v. Reservoir Co., 155 Mass. 183, 187, 29 N. E. 510, 512, that, in respect to the negligent act which caused the injury, the superintendent was not a vice principal, although the negligent act had been performed under his direction. That case is very much in point, and we here give the facts: McGinty brought an action for damages for injury, caused by the pulling up of a post to which the guy rope of a derrick had been fastened. It was the custom to move the derrick from place to place, and reset it, as occasion required. The post had been set by one Duval, under the direction of Pratt, who was the superintendent. There was no defect in the derrick, or the guy rope, or the post, or the piece of timber used to make the post more secure. The court below left it for the jury to determine whether or not Pratt, the superintendent, was a fellow servant with the plaintiff or a vice principal. But the court of appeals held that this was error, reversed the lower court, and held, as matter of law, as between plaintiff and the superintendent the relation was that of fellow servant. In the opinion the court says: "It was a part of their [the laborers'] duty to put down the post; and, if there was any negligence in the manner in which or the place where it was sunk, and the mode in which the cross-timber was used, it was their negligence, and not the negligence of the master, or of Mr. Pratt, as representing him. Mr. Pratt, although the superintendent, was still only a fellow servant, as between himself and the plaintiff, and the defendant would not be liable for his negligence."

"Where a city engineer, declared by the charter to be the general superintendent of all work done by the city in the streets, appoints a superintendent of sewer construction, to have charge of that department of the work, and the latter employs a foreman, who controls a gang of men, with power to hire and discharge, and direct when, where, and how to work, such foreman is not a general vice principal of the city in relation to a workman under him who is injured by his negligent act." City of Minneapolis v. Lundin, 58 Fed. 525, 7 C. C. A. 344. Additional authorities holding that unless the negligence of the foreman causing the injury related to a nonassignable duty of the master he is only a fellow servant, are the following: Moon's Adm'r v. Richmond, etc., Co., 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 401; Railroad Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71; Cleveland, etc., Ry. Co. v. Brown, 73 Fed. 970, 20 C. C. A. 147; Poorman Silver Mines v. Devling, 34 Colo. 37, 81 Pac. 252; What Cheer Coal Co. v. Johnson, 56 Fed. 810, 6 C. C. A. 148; Railroad Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 13 Sup. Ct. 914, 37 L. Ed. 772; White on Per. Inj. in Mines, §§ 293, 294, 295.

Plaintiff does not allege that defendant neglected to employ competent men to work in its quarry, or that it failed to furnish suitable machinery and appliances, or that it failed to formulate suitable rules to guide and protect its employés in the performance of their work. The only neglect complained of is the alleged failure of defendant to keep the bank of the quarry, above the place where deceased was working, in a safe condition; in other words, that it failed to furnish him a safe place in which to work. But, in view of the nature of the work to be performed in a quarry, defendant was not bound to keep the banks free from dangerous rocks. The unfortunate accident was one of the natural incidents common to deceased's employment, and was, therefore, a risk which he had assumed.

If Tenas Milbourn, the foreman, deceived deceased by assuring him that he had examined the rock and that it was safe, and thereby lulled his fears and led him into a danger which he would not otherwise have assumed, defendant is still not liable, for Milbourn, although foreman over deceased, was only his fellow servant. In ordering deceased to work in a place of danger, Milbourn was not representing defendant in relation to a nonassignable duty; and was, therefore, not a vice principal. 2 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 539; Briegal v. Sou. Pac. Co., 39 C. C. A. 359, 98 Fed. 958; Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson's Adm'r, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. 334, 64 Am. St. Rep. 785; Jackson v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337; Cochran v. Shannahan, 51 W. Va. 137, 41 S. E. 140.

It not being shown that defendant was negligent in any respect, the question of contributory negligence on the part of deceased becomes immaterial.

We will affirm the judgment.

NOTE BY MILLER, J. I concur in the result, but cannot give my unqualified assent to the points of the syllabus. I think they should be clearly limited by the principles stated in 1 Bailey on Personal Injuries (2d Ed.) §§ 127 and 250, and Haggerty v. Hallowell Granite Co., 89 Me. 118, 35 Atl. 1029, McMillan Marble Co. v. Black, 89 Tenn. 118, 14 S. W. 479, and Black's Adm'r v. Virginia Portland Cement Co., 106 Va. 121, 55 S. E. 587. According to these authorities a master of a stone quarry is liable for injuries sustained by his servant, due to his negligence in making reasonable inspections and tests, if a reasonable time has elapsed after the place has been rendered dangerous to give opportunity to the master to inspect and test the place and make it reasonably safe for his servant to work in. In Jacoby v. Williams, 110 Va. 55, 63, 65 S. E. 491, 494, that court says: "Unquestionably where a servant is employed to engage in a dangerous work, such as excavation, quarrying and the like, the master, as a general rule, owes him the duty to use ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to make his place of work as reasonably safe as the nature of the work admits of, but this general rule does not apply to a place which is constantly changing by reason of the work done." Citing 26 Cyc. 1117, and Finalyson v. Utica M. & M. Co., 14 C. C. A. 492, 67 Fed. 510. It will be observed that this decision, as do many others, limits the exception to places which are "constantly changing by reason of the work done." In other cases the general rule, with respect to the master's duty to provide a reasonably safe place to work, applies to quarries. 1 Bailey on Personal Injuries, § 127. The decisions above cited illustrate the application of this principle, and by which I think the points of the syllabus should all be limited.

In this case there is evidence tending to show that the master, through its foreman, had been warned and notified as long at least as the day before the deceased was injured, that the overhanging rock was dangerous, and assured deceased that he had examined the rock and found it safe, and I am not altogether sure but the question of the reasonableness of the time for inspection by the master ought not to have been submitted to the jury, but I have yielded this point to the opinion of the majority.

HARDMAN et al. v. BRANNON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 27, 1912. Rehearing Denied
June 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TAXATION (§ 656*)—TAX SALES—TIME FOR SALE.

A sheriff has no authority to sell land for delinquent taxes at a time not fixed by the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1347; Dec. Dig. § 656.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 656*)—TAX SALES—TIME FOR SALE.

If a sheriff should not receive the list of delinquent lands from the auditor in time to complete the publication of notice of sale, and thereafter sell in November or December, as provided in section 6, c. 31, Code 1906, he must, after first publishing the notice required, commence his sale on the first day of a circuit or county court, whichever is first fixed by law to be held in the next succeeding year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1347; Dec. Dig. § 656.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 734*)—TAX SALES—TIME FOR SALE.

A tax sale appearing on the face of the proceedings to have been made in the month of March in a county wherein the statute provides for a term of circuit court to begin on the first day of February is void, and a deed made in pursuance of such sale is also void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 734.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 688*)—TAX SALES—TIME FOR SALE.

Error in the time of making sale appearing on the face of the proceedings is fatal. It is not cured by section 25, c. 31, Code 1906.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1390; Dec. Dig. § 688.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 734*)—TAX SALES—TIME FOR SALE.

Such error will be presumed to have prejudiced the former landowner, and is good ground for avoiding the tax deed made in pursuance of such void sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 734.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 41*) — JUDICIAL NOTICE — TIME OF HOLDING COURT.

This court will take judicial knowledge of the time fixed by statute for the holding of regular terms of circuit courts in the various counties of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 56-60; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

7. TAXATION (§ 809*)—TAX TITLES—SUITS TO TRY TITLE.

A bill attacking the validity of a tax deed must allege the particular matter on which the pleader relies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1600-1604; Dec. Dig. § 809.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1178*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE — REVERSAL — LEAVE TO AMEND.

If the record discloses facts sufficient to avoid a tax deed, which have not been averred in the bill, and a decree has been entered on full hearing below dismissing the suit, without giving leave to amend, this court will reverse the decree, and will remand the cause, with leave to amend the bill to conform to facts so disclosed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4616-4619; Dec. Dig. § 1178.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Gilmer County.

Bill in equity by Marcellus Hardman and another against Edwin L. Brannon. From a decree for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with leave to plaintiffs to amend bill to conform to proof.

R. G. Linn and E. A. Brannon, for appellants. R. F. Kidd and W. W. Brannon, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. Marcellus Hardman and Marcellus Stump, in his own right and as executor of Susan M. Stump, deceased, have appealed from a decree of the circuit court of Gilmer county, made on the 15th of March, 1907, dismissing their suit which had been brought for the purpose of avoiding a tax deed made to Edwin L. Brannon on the 7th of June, 1904, for a tract of 95½ acres of land. Hardman acquired the land by deed from J. M. Hamilton, special commissioner, April 20, 1889, in a suit in the circuit court of Gilmer county, styled Spencer Collins, Trustee, v. Marcellus Stump and Others, but did not have his deed recorded until February 13, 1902. Hardman then sold it to Susan M. Stump, but retained title to secure $500 of the purchase price. Mrs. Stump died, testate, in May, 1904, leaving Marcellus Stump her sole devisee and executor. Hardman not having recorded his deed from the commissioner, the land remained on the land books assessed with taxes in the name of Marcellus Stump, the former owner, and present owner of the equitable title. It was sold in March, 1903, in the name of Marcellus Stump for the delinquent taxes of 1900 as a tract of 59 acres, and was purchased by the defendant for $13.60. Plaintiffs made a tender of the purchase money and interest. There was a demurrer to the bill, which the court overruled, and defendant answered, denying every allegation of the bill, and plaintiffs replied generally. The cause was heard upon the merits, on pleadings and proof, which was altogether documentary, and the court dismissed the suit without giving plaintiffs leave to amend their bill.

[3] The tax deed, which is exhibited with the bill, recites that the sale was commenced and completed in the month of March, 1903, and plaintiffs say that the invalidity of the deed is thereby shown, because the sheriff could not then lawfully sell. The time when he shall sell depends upon statute.

Section 6 of chapter 31 prescribes with great particularity the time when the sheriff shall commence his tax sales. After providing for the posting and publication of notices of sale, that section proceeds to fix the following time, or times, for commencing sale, in the following order, viz.: First, on the first day of the next November or December term of the circuit or county court of the said county, whichever may be held first after the completion of publication of notice; or, second, if no term of either court is held in either November or December, then on the second Monday in December next after the publishing of said notice; or, third, in the event the sheriff should not receive the list of delinquent lands from the auditor in time to publish notice and make sale in November or December, he shall commence his sale on the first day of a circuit or county court, whichever may be held first, in the succeeding year, next after the publication of notice. It does not appear why the present sale was not made in November or December.

[2] But, authority being given to sell on the first day of a circuit or county court in the succeeding year, in a certain event, we think it may be fairly and properly assumed that that event did happen, and that the sale in the succeeding year was made at the time fixed by the statute, unless the contrary affirmatively appear. The statute says he must sell on the first day of a circuit or county court, whichever is first held, after the completion of publication. No other time is given. Does it affirmatively appear that the sale was not commenced on the first day of the first term of a court, circuit or county, whichever was first held in 1903? We think it does, and in the following manner. Under the law then (1903) in force (Code 1899, p. 1148), a term of the circuit court for Gilmer county was appointed for the first day of February.

[6] This fact we take judicial knowledge of because it is fixed by a public statute. The sheriff's return of sales and the deed both show that the sale was begun on the 2d, and completed on the 3d day of March, 1903, a time beyond the February term of circuit court.

It is urged in brief of counsel for defendant that it is not proven that the February term of the circuit court was actually held, nor that a regular term of the county court was not held on the 2d of March, and that it was the first of either of the courts held in that year, in which event they say a sale on the 2d of March would be a compliance with the statute. We do not think this argument sound for two reasons: (1) Because it is the purpose of the statute in fixing the first day of the term of a particular court, as a date for the sale, to have it at a time when the people collect at the courthouse. It is also a continuing notice, in the body of the law, to all delinquent taxpayers, that their land is liable to be sold on a day certain. (2) The sheriff has to publish his notice in advance of the day fixed for the sale, and he must be governed by the statute fixing the time of the circuit court, and by the statute, or the previous order of the county court, fixing the time of holding that court, and he cannot anticipate that a term of the circuit court fixed in February would not be held. Publication of his notice will have been completed before he could know that a term of court, appointed by law, would not be held. There is a statute providing for the election of a member of the bar to hold the circuit court in the event the judge is not present. Whether the February term of the circuit court was actually held or not is not material, because the time fixed by the statute for the holding of the court is more material in determining the time when the sheriff should publish notice that his sale will be made than the actual holding of the court on the day fixed. Seeing that there was a term of the circuit court for Gilmer county which the statute says shall be held on the first day of February, we are of the opinion that the sheriff could not lawfully sell in the month of March.

[1] Sale of land for delinquent taxes is purely a statutory proceeding, summary in its nature, and, being in derogation of the common-law rights of property, the courts uniformly apply to such statutes the rules of strict construction. They hold that every step in the proceedings which results in divesting the owner of the title to his land must be strictly complied with. "A sale made at a time not appointed or provided for by law is without authority and void." 1 Blackwell on Tax Titles (5th Ed.) § 488; Black on Tax Titles (2d Ed.) § 221; Keith v. Preston, 5 Grat. (Va.) 120; Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. 119, 5 L. Ed. 221. Chief Justice Marshall, who delivered the opinion of the court in the case last cited, at page 127 of 6 Wheat. (5 L. Ed. 221), says: "In summary proceedings, where a court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute prescribing its course, we think that that course ought to be exactly observed, and those facts which especially give jurisdiction ought to appear, in order to show that its proceedings are coram iudice." This principle, we think, should apply with even greater force in a case wherein a sale of land is made by a ministerial officer, acting by virtue of authority conferred directly by statute, and without any process or order by a judicial court. A history of the statutory proceedings in Virginia and in this state for the sale of land for delinquent taxes, and the court decisions bearing thereon, are reviewed in a well-prepared and elaborate opinion written by Judge Holt in Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 613, 15 S. E. 223. The more recent decision of Collins v. Sherwood, 50 W. Va. 133, 40 S. E. 603, is direct authority on the point we are here discussing. It was decided in that case that the sheriff could not adjourn his tax sale from December 2, 1871, to January 9, 1872, under a statute which authorized him to adjourn his sales only from day to day, and that such unauthorized adjournment rendered the tax sale void. It necessarily follows that, if a sheriff cannot adjourn a sale, after it is properly begun, to a time other than that fixed by the statute, he cannot begin his sale at a time other than that fixed by the statute.

[4] But it is insisted by counsel for appellee that the failure to sell at the time provided by the statute is cured by section 25, c. 31, Code 1906. We do not think so. That statute is subject to the same rules of strict construction that govern the interpretation and construction of the general statute on the subject of sale of delinquent lands, and it cannot be properly held to embrace and cure any defect in the tax sale proceedings, not therein expressly included. The first part of section 25 prescribes the effect to be given to the deed which the clerk is authorized by a prior section to make to the tax purchaser, and then proceeds to say that it shall have such effect, "notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings under which the same was sold, not herein provided for, unless such irregularity appear on the face of such proceedings of record in the office of the clerk of the county court, and be such as, materially to prejudice and mislead the owner of the real estate so sold, as to what portion of his real estate was so sold, and when and for what year or years it was sold, or the name of the purchaser thereof; and not then, unless it be clearly proved to the court or jury trying the case, that but for such irregularity the former owner of such real estate would have redeemed the same under the provisions of this chapter."

In construing section 25, c. 117, Acts of 1872-73 which contained the same provision, in substance, as section 25, c. 31, Code 1906, in respect to proof of prejudice, and whether or not the former owner was misled, it was held by this court in McCallister v. Cottrille, 24 W. Va. 173 (Pt. 2, Syl.), that, if the error or irregularity appeared on the record of the proceedings, it must be presumed to have prejudiced the former owner, and that parol evidence was not admissible to prove the fact of prejudice. That decision is authority for the construction of the statute as it now is, and after it was amended by Acts 1882, c. 130, so far as it relates to errors appearing on the face of the proceedings, provided, however, the irregularity complained of is not expressly cured by said section as amended. The question then arises: Does section 25, c. 31, Code 1906, cure a mistake as to the time of sale? We do not think so. The time for making the sale is material for the reasons herein before named. The sheriff has no authority in law to sell at any other time. He cannot appoint his own time. He must pursue the statute strictly. The exror or mistake as to the time the sale was made appears on the record in the manner in which we have hereinbefore pointed out, and it is not one of the mistakes or irregularities embraced within any of the curative provisions of section 25.

[5] It must, therefore, be presumed that the owner was prejudiced by it, and for this reason we hold the tax deed to be void.

There is no merit in the claim that plaintiffs were misled by the description of the land in the sheriff's return of the list of sales. The land was assessed to Marcellus Stump as 59 acres, and described on the land book as "Steer Creek Mill," and had been so designated since and including the year 1889. It was proper for the sheriff to get his description of the land from the land book, and he apparently did so, for his return list describes it as "Steer Creek Mill." That was the description by which plaintiffs had paid taxes on the land for a number of years before. The fact that the surveyor reported the land to contain 95½ acres cannot affect the case. He did not make his survey and report until after the redemption year had passed. How, then, could that fact mislead and prevent redemption? It could not. That the tract contained, by actual survey, more land than was shown by the assessment and by the sheriff's list of sales, is not a matter of which plaintiffs have any right to complain. True, it had been sold and conveyed to Hardman by the commissioner as a tract of 95½ acres in 1898. But Hardman did not put his deed on record until 1902, nearly four years thereafter, and did not have the quantity of land corrected on the land books. It was the owner's fault that the correct quantity did not appear. On the list of sales, filed by the sheriff with the clerk, in the column headed "Date of each sale," opposite the tract of 59 acres, and just under the word "Redeemed," which is written opposite the tract next above, appear the following figures and marks, viz.: "3-3,." Do these ditto marks indicate that plaintiffs' land was redeemed, and was this notation such a fact as was calculated to mislead plaintiffs? We think not. In tabulated statements ditto marks are generally used to avoid repetition of words, and when so used they are understood to stand for, and to mean the same as, the words or figures next above them. But we think it sufficiently appears from an examination of the list itself that the ditto marks were not here intended to stand for the word "redeemed," but were intended to indicate the date of the sale. This column is headed "Date of each sale," and the first figures appearing in it at the top are, "3-3, 1903." The first two figures stand for March 3d, and, instead of repeating those figures where they would recur, opposite the various tracts of land, ditto marks are used, one set on the left of the column to indicate the month and the day of the month, and one set on the right to indicate the year. Some of the sales appear to have been made on March 2d, and the figures "3-2" are then used, and ditto marks appear under these figures, in like manner, until a tract is reached which was sold on the 3d, and then the figures, "3-3," are again repeated. This process is carried on throughout the column. The word "Redeemed" occurs in the column a great many times, and is sometimes repeated with no intervening ditto marks, thus clearly indicating that the ditto marks were intended to apply to the dates, and not to the word "Redeemed." Moreover, the law does not make it the duty of any officer to note on the list of sales what land has been redeemed, and it does not appear who wrote the word "Redeemed" on this list. So far as we know, it might have been written by a stranger. Therefore, even if improperly placed there, it is not an error appearing upon the face of the record. Must a tax purchaser's right be held to depend upon the mutilation or alteration of the record by a stranger? We think not. But, assuming that the word "Redeemed" was written by the clerk for his own convenience, and that possibly the ditto marks might be understood, by a person examining the record, to refer to the word "redeemed," and therefore to apply to the tract of land in question, still we think the owners of the land could not thereby have been misled to their prejudice. If land has been redeemed, the owner ought certainly to know it; if he does not he is at fault, and ought not to be heard to say that he was misled by believing that it had been redeemed. It is not possible for the owner to be misled in relation to the redemption of his land without knowing, at the time he discovers the alleged misleading fact, that his land was sold for delinquent taxes. He should then be held to the exercise of diligence to ascertain whether his land is in fact redeemed. The alleged misleading fact appeared on the record in the clerk's office, and, if the owner did actually see it, it would have been an easy matter for him to make inquiry of the clerk in relation thereto, and his failure to do so would be inexcusable negligence.

[7] It is urged that the invalidity of the tax deed, for want of authority in the sheriff to sell, cannot be relied on here as cause for reversal, because that matter was not averred in the bill, and the attention of the lower court was not directed to it. This point is well taken. The want of authority to sell depended on a fact which had to be established in some way, and it is a familiar rule of pleading that every fact, material to plaintiffs' case, must be alleged. Pleading must precede proof. Relief may be granted upon pleading when not denied, without proof, but never upon proof without pleadings. Plaintiffs do not specifically aver that the sale was made at a time not authorized by law, and counsel for defendant insist that, therefore, the bill is bad, and that the demurrer should have been sustained. The bill attacks the deed on two alleged grounds only, viz.: (1) Misdescription of the land; and (2) because they were misled into believing the land had been redeemed, on account of the word "Redeemed," and the ditto marks under it, appearing on the list of sales filed in the clerk's office. The bill then contains the following general averment, viz.: "For the irregularities aforesaid and other irregularities appearing upon the face of the record of the proceedings in the office of the clerk of the county court aforesaid," etc. This averment is too vague, general, and indefinite to be denominated good pleading. The particular fact relied on should be averred. That a part of the record of the tax sale proceeding is exhibited with the bill, and discloses the fatal error, does not dispense with the necessity of an averment in the bill pointing out the fact constituting the mistake on which plaintiffs rely. "A bill to set aside a tax deed for defects in the proceedings under which it was sold must point out those defects." State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 895 (Pt. 9 Syl.), and authorities cited on page 702, 47 S. E. 650, on page 658; Hogen v. Piggott, 60 W. Va. 541.†

[§] But, inasmuch as plaintiffs' documentary evidence exhibited with their bill, in connection with the fact that there was a February term of circuit court in Gilmer county, which we judicially know, proves a case which would entitle them to relief, if the matter thus established had been properly pleaded, we will reverse the decree, sustain the demurrer, and will remand the cause, with leave to plaintiffs to amend their bill to conform to the proof. The case being good as to proof, and bad only as to pleading, the court erred in dismissing the suit, without first giving plaintiffs leave to amend. Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288; Lamb v. Laughlin, 25 W. Va. 300; Doonan v. Glynn, 28 W. Va. 225.

1. PLEADING (§ 310*) — REFERENCE TO CONTRACT.

The propriety of the filing of a plea must be tested by the averments of the declaration. It can not be tested by a construction of a contract referred to in the declaration as annexed thereto.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 478*) — ACTIONS — PLEADING.

In an action on a note, defendant filed a special plea, setting up failure of consideration.

The declaration averred certain matters of agreement as to the transaction in which the note was given, and the plea set forth a different agreement, and that according to the terms thereof, the consideration had failed. Held, that the plea was good.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County. Action by A. M. Belcher, administrator, against John Q. Dickinson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A. M. Belcher, of Charleston, in pro. per. Linn & Byrne, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. The administrator of Wells sued Dickinson in debt, for the recovery of a promissory note. A special plea that the consideration had wholly failed was admitted over the objection and exception of plaintiff. No replication was put in; plaintiff rested the case on his exception to the filing of this special plea. Judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff prosecuted this writ of error.

If the special plea was properly filed, the judgment is right. Since there was no reply to the plea, it was confessed. Shires v. Boggess, 68 W. Va. 137, 69 S. E. 466. If it met the case made by plaintiff's declaration, defendant was entitled to judgment. Plaintiff insists that the plea presented no defense to his case, and that it was error to permit it to be filed.

An examination of the plea convinces us that it presents a good defense to that which is averred in the declaration. It avers matters showing a failure of the consideration for which the note was given. The declaration avers certain matters of agreement between the parties in relation to the transaction in which the note was executed; the plea sets forth indeed a different agreement and shows that according to the terms of the same the consideration for the note failed. If the averments of this plea were not true, plaintiff should have joined issue on it. If they were true, as we must take them to be on this record, the case presented by plaintiff is denied.

[2] Plaintiff submits that the consideration for the note was stock in a corporation sold by his decedent to defendant; and that, therefore, the plea which avers failure of consideration by a loss of title to land is no defense. But the plea, as well as the declaration, shows that each share of stock sold defendant represented the ownership of one acre of land. The plea avers that by the agreement under which the stock was sold defendant was to receive good title to as many acres of land as he purchased shares of stock. It avers that the land represented by the stock was so imperfect in title that the consideration, to the value of the note sued on, failed. The plea in fact avers that land was the real consideration for the note, and that defendant did not get by his purchase of stock the number of acres that he was to have thereby. It sufficiently shows that the real consideration for the note failed. The plea is good under Code 1906, c. 126, sec. 5.

[1] The contract referred to in the declaration as annexed thereto, and sought to be made a part of the declaration in that way, can not be looked to in determining the propriety of the plea. A contract can not be made a part of a declaration by mere reference or exhibition. Riley v. Yost, 58 W. Va. 213, 52 S. E. 40, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 777. Plaintiff argues a particular interpretation of this contract to show that defendant's plea does not meet the case. But he must be confined to the averments of the declaration in testing the applicability of the plea. We have said that the plea answers the declaration. Whether, if issue had been joined on the plea, and the contract had been introduced as evidence on a trial of that issue, the contract would have defeated the plea, we are not called upon to answer. Certain it is, the applicability of the plea to the case can not be tested by the contract, as plaintiff seems to assume. The applicability of the plea must be tested by the averments of the declaration.

An affirmance of the judgment will be ordered.

Error to Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Action by W. A. McCray and another, partners, against George Craig & Sons, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John W. Davis, W. A. Bratton, John A. Preston, and Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for plaintiff in error. F. R. Hill and Price, Osenton & Horan, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. [1] A defect in the bill of exceptions taken in this case precludes consideration of any of the assignments of error based upon the action of the court in admitting and excluding evidence, giving or refusing instructions, and overruling the motion to set aside the verdict. It contains no descriptive matter; affording means of identifying any paper as one embracing the evidence. An order makes a paper styled "General Bill of Exceptions" part of the record, but it says only this as to the evidence: "And the defendant hereby tenders this his general bill of exceptions, which contains all of the evidence and rulings of the court in this cause, not shown in the orders." Nothing purporting to be evidence is actually contained in it, nor is there in it a word purporting to incorporate therein anything as evidence by adoption of any other paper or reference thereto. The order, making the bill a part of the record, says the defendant had had the evidence duly transcribed by the court stenographer and "embodied in the General Bill of Exceptions," and that the bill of exceptions had been completed and the evidence transcribed and presented to the judge; but the order, like the bill, actually contains nothing purporting to be evidence, nor by any means of identification adopts any other paper containing evidence. Blanche Bays, designating herself as official reporter, certifies apparently full and complete evidence in the case, but no order shows her appointment as stenographer for the purposes of the trial. Her certificate is not enough to bring the evidence into the record. That can be done only by an order of the court or certificate of the judge in some form. The statutory method of making the record is exclusive. Though others may be just as good in point of fact, the court cannot adopt them, because the law requires the act of addition or annexation to be done in a particular manner, impliedly excluding all others. Even the liberal rule, applied in Marshall v. Stalnaker, 74 S. E. 48, just decided, following Jackson v. Railroad Co., 65 W. Va. 415, 64 S. E. 450, and De Board v. Camden, etc., Co., 62 W. Va. 41, 57 S. E. 279, falls short of the exigency presented here. Dudley v. Barrett, 58 W. Va. 235, 52 S. E. 100, rules the question, and determines it against the plaintiff in error.

[2] The assignment of error, challenging the sufficiency of the declaration, the only one having any basis in the record, is untenable. The common counts in the usual form are obviously good, and the special count on the contract for logging timber and peeling bark is direct, positive, and specific as to one item, compensation for the work done. Other items were for extra work caused by failure of the defendant to remove the delivered logs from the yards along the railroad, as contemplated by the contract, and to extend its railroad to a certain point, and for the hire of a horse used in the work. Nothing in the contract suggests any basis of liability for horse hire, but the other claims might arise upon breaches of implied undertakings of the contract. These are not in terms predicated on the contract, but that instrument is fully set out in the count, and the general averments of duty must necessarily be read in connection with it, and to this there is added an allegation of a promise to pay all of said sums.

[3] Only certainty to a common intent is required, and generally the ordinary rules of interpretation apply to pleadings. Ceranto v. Trimboli, 63 W. Va. 340, 60 S. E. 138; Cameron v. Hicks, 65 W. Va. 484, 64 S. E. 832. The blending of the three items, thus shown with reasonable certainty to have arisen out of breaches of the contract, is allowable under the rules of pleading. In actions to recover damages for nonperformance of a special contract, a breach of each stipulation or implied agreement may be alleged in one count. 1 Chitty, Pl. (11th Am. Ed.) mar. pp. 333, 334; Bressy v. Humphreys, Cro. Jac. 557; Smith v. B. C. M. Railroad, 36 N. H. 458. See form in 2 Chitty, Pl. (11th Am. Ed.) mar. p. 332.

Finding no error in the judgment, we affirm it.

TAXATION (§ 810*)—TAX SALE—IDENTITY OF LAND.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County.

Suit by Lucy Lovell and others against P. M. Jamison and others to remove a cloud on title. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dillard & Lee, for appellants. E. W. Saunders and L. W. Anderson, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The appellants, Lucy Lovell and others, are the children and heirs at law of John Fountain Lovell, referred to in the record as "Fount" Lovell, who was the owner of a tract of land delinquent for taxes in the year 1881, and purchased by the commonwealth at a tax sale in 1886. On the 15th of June, 1898, P. M. Jamison filed an application with the clerk of the county for the purchase of this tract, and a copy of the application was served upon divers persons, and among them upon "Fount" Lovell. Lovell died pending the proceedings, in December, 1898, and all the preliminaries having been complied with, on the 19th of December, 1899, the clerk of the county court of Franklin county conveyed the property in dispute to P. M. Jamison. The recitals of the deed, if true, show a compliance with the law in such cases made and provided, and constitute prima facie evidence of the truth of what is therein stated. See Wright v. Carson, 110 Va. 498, 66 S. E. 37.

In 1907 the heirs of "Fount" Lovell filed their bill attacking this deed. Defendants answered, and the case was heard upon the bill, answer, exhibits, and depositions, and thereupon the circuit court entered the decree dismissing the bill for want of equity, and the case is before us upon appeal.

We find nothing in the record to overcome the prima facie case made on behalf of appellees by the deed executed by the clerk of the county court of Franklin county, already referred to.

The principal, if not the sole, reliance of appellants, is upon the proposition that the land covered by the deed was never sold for taxes and never purchased by the state, and, therefore, could not properly pass under the deed from the clerk of 1899. The evidence upon the subject of the identity of the land is somewhat obscure, but is sufficient, we think, to maintain the decree. A witness, J. W. Turner, for instance, a brother of "Fount" Lovell's wife, and an uncle, therefore, of the appellants, says: "I saw the advertisement [of the sale of the land] and let Mr. Lovell know about it. Q. What did Mr. Lovell say to you about it? A. He said to let them sell it; that he had three years to redeem it in."

It seems sufficiently to appear from the proof that the land in controversy was delinquent for taxes in 1881, and that Lovell knew it was delinquent; that it was advertised in 1886 for sale for delinquent taxes; that it was sufficiently described by the treasurer's notice, and that Lovell knew it was his land that was being advertised; that it was sold for taxes under said advertisement; that Lovell knew of its sale; and that he was also advised of the application to purchase by P. M. Jamison, but took no steps to redeem it. The land seems to have been of little value, as there is evidence in the record tending to show that he sold it to Geo. E. Hundley for a wagon, received the wagon, but never made a deed for the land, and that he offered to sell it to Bowles for a yoke of oxen, worth $40 or $50.

It was suggested in argument on behalf of appellees that the decree of the circuit court which dismissed the bill for want of equity could be sustained upon the ground that a court of equity did not have jurisdiction to hear and determine the controversy.

The bill was filed to remove a cloud upon title. It is admitted that at the institution of the suit the land was in possession of appellees; so it is contended that the proper remedy would have been an action of ejectment, and that, while there was no demurrer to the bill, the want of jurisdiction may be relied upon in the first instance in this court; and the authorities seem to maintain that position. See Boston Blower Co. v. Carman Lumber Co., 94 Va. 94, 26 S. E. 390; Collins v. Sutton, 94 Va. 127, 26 S. E. 415.

On behalf of appellants on this point, the attention of the court is called to the fact that after the institution of the suit, but before the decree was entered, the Legislature passed an act giving courts of equity jurisdiction to entertain suits to remove clouds upon title by reason of a sale and conveyance for nonpayment of taxes, although the complainant had been only the equitable owner of the land in question, and might have been out of possession when the suit was instituted.

In the view we take of the case it is unnecessary to pass upon the effect of the statute, for in any event we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

1. COURTS (§ 66*)—TERMS—ADJOURNMENT—VALIDITY.

Under Code 1904, § 3059, as amended by Acts 1910, c. 107, authorizing the continuance of any term of the circuit court by adjournment, but providing that no term shall be continued beyond the day fixed for the beginning of the next regular term, an order of the circuit court adjourning a term until after the beginning of the next term is a nullity, though made under the erroneous belief that a prior order omitting such next term was in force, while it was superseded by act of 1910, fixing the terms of court.

Error to Circuit Court, Princess Anne County.

Action between the Virginia Beach Development Company and A. E. Murray. There was a judgment for the latter, and the former brings error. Affirmed.

Theo. A. Williams and Geo. A. Frick, for plaintiff in error. J. Edward Cole and L. D. Yarrell, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. All the errors assigned are based upon bills of exceptions which it is insisted by the defendant in error are no part of the record, since they were not signed by the judge during the term at which final judgment was rendered, or within 30 days after the end of that term. Code, § 3285, as amended Acts of Assembly 1908, c. 225, pp. 336, 337.

The case was tried and a verdict rendered at the December term, 1909, of the circuit court of Princess Anne county. During the same term a motion was made to set aside the verdict, but that motion was not disposed of until the July term of the court (September 8), 1910, when it was overruled and a final judgment entered pursuant to the verdict. On the same day an order was entered adjourning the court until Wednesday, the 20th of that month; the last-named date being after the third Monday in the month—the day fixed by statute for holding the September term of the court for that county. Acts of Assembly 1910, pp. 152, 160. On the 17th of October following the bills of exceptions were signed and ordered to be made a part of the record.

By an order entered in the law order book of the court in March, 1904, in accordance with section 3059, Va. Code 1904, the September term of that court had been omitted, and no doubt the order entered on September 8, 1910, adjourning the court until the 20th of the month, was made under the belief that said order omitting the September term was still in force. But by an act of assembly approved March 9, 1910 (Acts 1910, c. 107, pp. 152, 154), section 3059, Va. Code 1904, had been amended, and it was declared that "until otherwise provided by law the time for holding the said terms in said counties and cities shall be as follows"; and section 3059bb fixes the third Monday in January, March, May, July, September, and November as the time for holding the terms of court in that county. The section as amended also confers power on the circuit courts, under certain circumstances, to omit one of the terms designated by the statute.

In October, 1910, the circuit court did enter an order omitting the September term; but as it was not made until after the order of September 8, 1910, and the order of March, 1904, being rendered of no effect by the amendment made to section 3059 of the Code by the act of March 9, 1910, the question under consideration must be determined without reference to either of those orders omitting the September term of the court.

[1] While section 3059, as amended, provides that the judge of the circuit court might continue the term of a court by adjournment until after the beginning of the term of the court for any other county of his circuit, it expressly declares that "no term of the court shall be so continued beyond the day fixed by law for the beginning of the next regular term of the court for the county or city of the circuit whose term is so extended." The order of September 8th, adjourning the court until after the beginning of the next term of the same court, was not only unauthorized, but in plain violation of the statute.

The record shows that the court was not in session until the 20th of that month, the day to which it had been attempted to adjourn the court. On that day the following entry was made in the order book: "At a circuit court continued and held for Princess Anne county on Wednesday, the 20th day of September, 1910. Present: Hon. B. D. White, Judge. Ordered that court be adjourned to court in course."

The attempted adjournment of the court on September 8th to a day in the next term being a nullity, we have a case where the judge leaves the bench without any order for final adjournment, without again holding court for that term, or intending to do so, until a day after the beginning of the next term, when, even if the statute had not forbidden it, he could not have held it, since two terms of one and the same court cannot be in session at one and the same time and place.

[2] Under these circumstances the 8th day of September ought to be treated as the end of the July term of the court, for it was the last day on which the court was in session during that term, or the judge intended that it should be in session during the period in which under the law it could sit; for after that day no legal business could have been transacted for want of a judge.

In Wight v. Wallbaum, 39 Ill. 554, where a court was regularly in session on the 23d of the month, and on that day was regularly adjourned until the next day, and after that time regular convening and adjourning orders were entered from day to day for a week, no judge being present after the 23d of the month, it was held that that day was the end of the term.

In State v. Todd, 72 Mo. 288, it was held that an adjournment to the day fixed for the beginning of the next regular term puts an end to the current term.

In Johnson v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 47 Ohio St. 318, 24 N. E. 493, where the journal of the court of common pleas showed a regular adjournment from day to day up to a day certain of the term, but no other adjournment afterwards during the term, except an entry of an adjournment sine die on the last-named day, which entry was at the next term by a nunc pro tunc order stricken from the journal as having been made through the mistake of the clerk, and it was further shown that no judge was present and no business was transacted in the court after such certain day to which the court had adjourned until the commencement of the next succeeding term, it was held that the term should be deemed to have closed on such day certain, and that a bill of exceptions might be signed and filed within 30 days from that time.

The July term of the court having ended on the 8th day of September, and the bills of exceptions not having been signed until October 17th, more than 30 days after the end of the term, they are no part of the record.

There being no errors assigned, except those based upon the rejected bills of exceptions, it follows that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

W. W. V. CO., Inc., v. BLACK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 18, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 193*)—MISJOINDER OF ACTIONS—MANNER OF RAISING QUESTION.

The proper method of raising a question of misjoinder of actions is by a demurrer to the whole declaration containing separate counts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 425, 428-435, 437-443; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

2. THEATERS AND SHOWS (§ 4*)—TICKET OF ADMISSION—BREACH OF CONTRACT—REMEDY.

An action of tort will not lie against the proprietor of a theater for not performing his contract, evidenced by a ticket of admission, or continuing his license of admission; but a patron having a ticket, who is prevented from entering the theater, or who is removed therefrom, can only sue on the contract for the money paid for the ticket and the damages sustained by a breach of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Theaters and Shows, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 204*)—DECLARATION—CAUSES OF ACTION—DEMURRER.

Where the declaration contains two counts stating good causes of action in tort and another count intended to be in tort, it is immaterial whether the latter count states a good cause of action as against a demurrer to the whole declaration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 486-490; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by George H. Black against the W. W. V. Company, Incorporated. There was a judgment overruling a demurrer to the declaration, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The second count of the declaration states a cause of action for false imprisonment.

The third count states a cause of action for assault and battery.

Allen G. Collins, for plaintiff in error.
John A. Lamb, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This case is here upon a writ of error to the action of the circuit court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration.

There are three counts in the declaration. The demurrer is to the whole declaration, and is based upon the ground that the first count is to recover damages for breach of a contract, and the others to recover damages for a tort, and that there was, therefore, a misjoinder of causes of action.

[1] It is not true, as argued by the counsel for the defendant in error, plaintiff in the trial court, that a misjoinder of actions cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer unless it be to each count as well as to the whole declaration. The proper method of raising the question of misjoinder of actions is by a demurrer to the whole declaration. Creel v. Brown, 40 Va. 265; Ferrill v. Brewis' Adm'r, 66 Va. 765, 767; Gary v. Abingdon Publishing Co., 94 Va. 775, 27 S. E. 595, and authorities cited; 1 Chit. Pl. (7th Ed.) 228, 696.

The second and third counts are admittedly counts in tort. The first count is in the following words:

"George H. Black, plaintiff, complains of the W. W. V. Company, Incorporated, a corporation chartered by and doing business under the laws of the state of Virginia, defendant, which has been duly summoned, etc., of a plea of trespass on the case for this, to wit: That heretofore, to wit, on the 16th day of December, 1910, the said defendant was the owner, user, operator, manager, or lessee of a certain theater or place of amusement in the city of Richmond, Virginia, known as the 'Colonial Theater,' at which said theater or place of amusement said defendant gave certain entertainments to the public, and for which said defendant charged a certain fee or reward to it in that behalf. And said plaintiff says that on December 16, 1910, aforesaid, the said defendant gave at its said theater or place of amusement in the city of Richmond a certain entertainment, to which the plaintiff purchased a ticket from the defendant and paid therefor the price demanded by said defendant, and which price so paid was accepted by said defendant, and the ticket so purchased as aforesaid entitled the plaintiff to attend and witness said entertainment. And the said plaintiff says that for the purpose of seeing said entertainment he tendered to said defendant the ticket so purchased by him as aforesaid, and was admitted by said defendant to its said theater or place of amusement aforesaid. Yet the said plaintiff says that after he entered said theater or place of amusement aforesaid, as he had a right to do, the said defendant without any cause or justification did illegally, unlawfully, wantonly, maliciously, and with force and violence eject said plaintiff from said theater or place of amusement against the will of said plaintiff, and in utter disregard of the rights of said plaintiff. And said plaintiff says that by reason of the unlawful, illegal, wanton, and malicious conduct of said defendant he has been greatly injured and damaged in his good name, fame, and reputation, and has been humiliated and embarrassed, worried and annoyed, and has been held up to public ridicule, scorn, and disgrace, and has been otherwise seriously injured and damaged, to the damage of the said plaintiff $10,000.

The plaintiff insists that upon the facts averred in the first count he had the right either to sue in assumpsit for the breach of the contract or in tort for a breach of the duty which the defendant owed to him, and that this right of electing which of these two remedies he would pursue must be considered in determining whether the count is in tort or in assumpsit.

[2] There is a large class of cases in which the foundation of the action springs out of the privity of contract between the parties, but in which, nevertheless, the remedy for the breach or nonperformance of it is indifferently in assumpsit or in case upon tort, as in the case of bailments, attorneys, surgeons, carriers, and the like. See Ferrill v. Brewis' Adm'r, supra; Spence v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 92 Va. 102, 113, 22 S. E. 815, 29 L. R. A. 578; 1 Chit. Pl. (7th Ed.) 151, 152, and authorities cited. But it seems to be well settled, in the absence of legislation to the contrary, that an action of tort will not lie against the proprietor of a theater for not keeping or performing his contract or continuing his license of admission to his place of amusement.

It is said in 21 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 647 (and the text seems to be sustained by the great weight of authority), that "a theater ticket being a mere license to the purchaser, which may be revoked at the pleasure of the theatrical manager, upon such revocation, if the person attempts to enter, or if, having previously entered, he refuses to leave upon request, he becomes a trespasser, and may be prevented from entering, or may be removed by force, and can maintain no action of tort therefor. His only remedy is by action on the contract to recover the money paid for the ticket and damages sustained by the breach of the contract implied by the sale and delivery of such ticket." See Wood v. Leadbetter, 13 M. & W. 838; Burton v. Scherpf, 1 Allen (Mass.) 133, 79 Am. Dec. 717; McCrea v. Marslf, 123 Gray (Mass.) 211, 71 Am. Dec. 745; People v. Flynn, 189 N. Y. 180, 82 N. E. 169, 12 Ann. Cas. 420; Purcell v. Daly, 19 Abb. N. O. (N. Y.) 301; Horney v. Nixon, 213 Pa. 20, 61 Atl. 1088, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1184, 110 Am. St. Rep. 520, 5 Ann. Cas. 349; Taylor v. Cohn, 47 Or. 538, 84 Pac. 388, 8 Ann. Cas. 527; Buenzle v. Newport Amusement Ass'n, 29 R. I. 23, 68 Atl. 721, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1242; Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) 308; 38 Cyc. 264, 265.

The plaintiff having no right to bring an action of tort for the breach of the contract between him and the defendant, the question of choice of remedies cannot be considered in determining whether the first count is in assumpsit or in tort.

[3] But it is manifest, we think, from the whole declaration, that all the counts were intended to be in case. The contract or license is set out in the second and third counts, as well as in the first. This was done as matter of inducement, and to explain the circumstances under which the wrongs and injuries complained of in each count were done. It is immaterial whether or not the first count states a good cause of action. The second and third counts each do state a good cause of action, not for a breach of the contract or license, but for the wrongs and injuries alleged to have been done the plaintiff by assaulting and imprisoning him. The demurrer being to the whole declaration, and not to each count thereof, and there being no misjoinder of actions, the demurrer was properly overruled.

The judgment complained of must therefore be affirmed. Affirmed.

BROWN et al. v. SURRY LUMBER CO.

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALES OF STANDING TIMBER—FAILURE TO REMOVE.

Where it was claimed that it was intended by the parties to a contract for the sale of standing timber that the purchaser should commence cutting within a reasonable time, and that he had forfeited his rights by delay, a remark by the seller in a casual conversation with the purchaser that he thought it was time the purchaser was cutting the timber, if he intended to cut it, was not a sufficient demand that the purchaser proceed to justify the court in declaring a forfeiture, especially where for seven years thereafter the seller made no further mention of the matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALES OF STANDING TIMBER—TIME FOR REMOVAL.

A deed conveying all the standing timber on a tract of land of a specified size at the time of cutting, together with a right of way across the land for the purpose of removing the timber, and providing that the purchaser should have five years in which to cut and remove the timber from the time they commenced manufacturing it into wood or lumber, but that they should not be limited as to the time within which they should commence the cutting or removal, did not give the purchaser a perpetual right to enter on the land and cut the timber, but merely a right to do so within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 324*)—VALIDITY.

Contracts which contravene no rule of law must be enforced by the courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1549-1557; Dec. Dig. § 324.*]

4. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALES OF STANDING TIMBER—TIME FOR REMOVAL.

Where a deed conveying standing timber provided that the purchaser should have 5 years to cut and remove the timber after commencing cutting, but should not be limited as to the time within which to commence, and the purchaser without protest from the seller delayed commencing for nearly 14 years, the seller is not prejudiced by a decree construing the deed as providing for a reasonable time only within which to commence cutting, and holding that one year after the termination of the action would be such reasonable time.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sussex County.

Action by R. A. Brown and another against the Surry Lumber Company. From the decree, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. Mason and Chas. E. Plummer, for appellants. Wm. B. McIlwaine, W. B. Cocke, and Davis & Davis, for appellee.

KEITH, P. R. A. Brown and his sister, Mrs. Parker, filed their bill in the circuit court of Sussex county, from which it appears that they were seised in fee simple of two tracts of land in the county of Sussex, containing 264½ acres; that by deed dated the 21st of March, 1896, filed as an exhibit with the bill, they sold to the Surry Lumber Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of Virginia, all the timber on the said tracts measuring over 12 inches in diameter at the stump at the time of cutting the same, together with a right of way across the land for the purpose of removing the timber cut from the same and that cut from any other tract of land by said company, and for the purpose of operating a railway, in consideration of $250 paid in cash, and $300 to be paid on April 1, 1897. In said deed it was "covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said Surry Lumber Company shall have five years in which to cut and remove said timber from the time they commence to manufacture said timber into wood or lumber, but that they shall not be limited as to the time in which they shall commence to cut or remove the same. And it is also further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said Surry Lumber Company shall not commence to cut or remove any of the timber conveyed by this instrument of writing until the purchase price in full for the same shall have been paid."

The deferred payments seem to have been promptly met. The bill charges that at the time the deed was entered into it was contemplated by the parties, and so stated on the part of the Surry Lumber Company, that the timber should be cut without unnecessary delay, and that five years would be ample time for cutting and manufacturing all of it, and the plaintiffs in the court below contend that the proper construction of the deed is, and the intent of all the parties thereto was, that the said company was bound to commence the cutting of timber within a reasonable time after the last payment of the purchase money became due and was paid, and to complete the cutting and removal thereof within five years after so commencing, and that it had, and would have, no right or title to any of the timber not so cut and removed within that period, and that Brown, one of the plaintiffs, several times so notified the company through its agent.

The answer denies that there was at the time of the execution of the deed any purpose or intent, expressed or implied, not contained within the deed itself, and further denies that it ever received notice from the plaintiffs of their construction of the contract as stated in the bill. The answer admits that the defendant did not begin to cut and remove the timber until the latter part of December, 1909.

[1] There is nothing in the proof which affords any aid in the proper construction of the deed in question, nor does the proof sustain the averment in the bill that the company was notified that it was bound to commence to cut the timber conveyed to it within a reasonable time after the last payment of the purchase money became due and was paid. The only evidence upon that subject is contained in the depositions of Edward Rogers and the plaintiff Robert A. Brown. Rogers was asked this question: "Do you remember that some six or seven years ago Mr. Robert A. Brown, one of the grantors, who was then deputy treasurer of Sussex county, called on you at Dendron, perhaps with regard to taxes, and took dinner with you, and after dinner, down about the company's office, mentioned this deed to you at this time, and he told you he thought the company had had time enough to take the timber off, and that he wanted it done? A. No, sir; I have no recollection of such a conversation, and am sure that Mr. Brown never made any demand on us in that way to cut and remove the timber. If he mentioned the subject, it made no impression on me, and I do not remember it."

Speaking on the subject, Brown, in answer to substantially the same question, said: "I think it was about seven years ago. I was deputy treasurer for Mr. Jarratt. I went down there at Dendron one day in regard to taxes. Mr. Rogers was always very nice to me in that respect, and we were walking out there by the office, and I said to him: 'Mr. Rogers, I think that it is getting time you were cutting my timber, if you want it. I do not consider that you have any more than an option on it.' And I said: 'I think it is getting time you were buying it or cutting it.' Q. State whether or not you told him that you wanted him to cut that timber without further delay? A. I told him I thought, if they expected to cut it, it was getting time they were cutting it—that I thought it had been standing here long enough."

Mr. Brown answers frankly, and his statement of the transaction may be taken as true; but it falls short of being a demand that the Surry Lumber Company should begin to cut the timber embraced in the deed. The subsequent conduct of Brown shows that his statement to Mr. Rogers was never intended as a formal demand by which his rights and those of the Surry Lumber Company were to be determined. He waited for nearly seven years after this conversation before bringing suit, without making any further mention of the matter, and we cannot think that this casual conversation presents such a case of a demand that the Surry Lumber Company should proceed to enforce its rights as would justify a court in what would be in substance and effect the declaration of a forfeiture.

The circuit court heard all these matters, and was of opinion that the rights of the parties were to be ascertained by a construction of the deed, and decreed that the deed executed by the plaintiffs to the defendant company passed to and vested in the company "the present absolute title to all the timber upon the tracts of land in the bill described and mentioned at the date of the said deed, which was then 12 inches in diameter or larger at the stump, or which should grow to the said size within the time limited and fixed by the said deed for removing the same, which title is defeasible as to such of the said timber as shall not be removed from the said land within the time prescribed in the said deed, as herein construed; that the title to the said timber has never reverted to the plaintiffs; and that the Surry Lumber Company was at the time this suit was instituted, and is now, entitled to a reasonable time within which to cut and remove the same from the said land, which reasonable time the court, upon the evidence in this cause, adjudges to be one year from the time that the said plaintiffs shall notify the said defendant that they do not propose to take an appeal from this decree. * * *

[2] The general subject of the construction of deeds such as that in question was carefully examined and considered in Young v. Camp Mfg. Co. and Wright v. Camp Mfg. Co., 110 Va. 678, 66 S. E. 843. By the deed in that case the Camp Company was granted all the pine timber 12 inches in diameter across the stump at the time of cutting on a tract of land in the county of Brunswick, and the right to remove the same for a period of five years from the date of the deed, and the further right, if it should fail to remove the timber within five years, to have such further time in which to remove it as it might desire; provided, that it pay interest to the grantors at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the purchase price named in the deed. The court held, among other things, that a deed to standing timber, with the right to erect buildings and use and operate railroads on the land, and with the right, for a fixed period, to cut and remove the timber, and with the further right, on the grantee failing to remove the same within the fixed period, to such additional time as he may desire, on paying interest on the price annually, does not convey an absolute and unconditional title to the timber, but only conveys title to such as may be cut and removed within the fixed period, and such reasonable extensions thereafter as the grantee is entitled to, or as may be agreed on between the parties, and does not give the grantee a right to cut and remove the timber for an indefinite period, and that unless the deed clearly manifests an intention of the grantor to convey to the grantee a perpetual right to enter on the land and cut trees, the grantee of standing timber is allowed only a reasonable time to remove the timber, where the conveyance contains no provision as to the time of exercising the right of removal.

Looking to the deed in this case and all of its terms, we are of opinion that it does not clearly manifest an intention in the grantors to convey to the grantee a perpetual right to enter on the land and cut trees. The grant to the lumber company was for the purpose of enabling it to enter upon the land of Brown and cut and carry away his trees, and, while its language is very broad, we think that, construed in the light of the purpose and intent of the parties to the instrument, the right to cut and remove the timber must be exercised within a reasonable time.

The principal difference between the case under consideration and that of Wright v. Camp Mfg. Co., supra, is that in the latter case the inquiry as to what was a reasonable time was directed to the determination of the period within which the removal of the timber was to be accomplished after the operation began, while here the question to be determined is what was a reasonable time within which it was the duty of the lumber company to begin its operations. The lumber company had no right to begin to cut until payment in full of the purchase price had been made; but this provision is immaterial, as the money was promptly paid. The only other provision of the deed touching the question is that the Surry Lumber Company "shall have five years in which to cut and remove said timber from the time they commence to manufacture said timber into wood or lumber, but that they shall not be limited as to the time in which they shall commence to cut or remove the same."

[3] Contracts made between parties, which contravene no rule of law, must be enforced by the courts; for if they be such as the parties have a right to make, they constitute for those who enter into them the law by which they are bound. The grantors in this deed have contracted to "grant, bargain and sell, with general warranty, unto the said Surry Lumber Company, their successors or assigns, all of the timber on that certain tract or parcel of land" (describing it), containing 264½ acres; it being mutually agreed and understood "that all trees under twelve inches in diameter at the stump at the time of the cutting of the said timber is reserved and not included in this conveyance." Language could not be broader than this, and the only limitation upon it is to be found in the fact that in order to avail itself of its rights it had to enter upon the land of Brown in order to remove the timber from it, and that right the parties saw fit to limit, as above stated, to five years from the time the process of removal commenced, but without limit as to the time within which the process of removal should begin.

In Young v. Camp Mfg. Co., supra, the deed contained the statement that, if the Camp Company "shall fail to remove said timber within said time [the specified period of five years], it may have such further time to remove the same as it may desire"; and commenting upon that language this court said that if literally construed it "might be extended to one, or a hundred, or a thousand years—that is to say, it is wholly indefinite, and fixes no time within which the contract is to be executed—and it is therefore to be executed within a reasonable time."

As said in 25 Cyc. 1553: "Except where the deed clearly manifests an intention on the part of the grantor to convey to the grantee a perpetual right to enter upon the land and cut trees, the purchaser will be allowed only a reasonable time to remove the timber, where the conveyance contains no provision as to the time for exercising the right of removal. * * * The question of what is a reasonable time is one of fact, dependent on the circumstances of each case. There are no fixed rules for its ascertainment."

If the intention of the parties had been to give to the grantee a perpetual right to enter upon the land and cut the timber, the deed should have ended with the granting clause and no period should have been inserted—which can have no other sensible operation than as a limitation upon the right to cut and remove, which would otherwise have been absolute and unfettered.

[4] This deed was executed on the 21st of March, 1896. The parties, with knowledge of all the facts, remained quiescent until December, 1909; the grantee exercising no rights under the deed, and grantors making no effective protest or complaint until January, 1910, when they filed their bill. Can the court, in the face of the provision of the deed, that the lumber company should have five years within which to cut and remove said timber from the time they should commence to manufacture it into wood or lumber, but that they should not be limited as to the time in which they should commence to cut or remove it, decree that the right to cut and remove has been lost by delay, in the very teeth of the contract between the parties, which they had a lawful right to make? We think the circuit court went as far as it properly could go when it held that, taking the whole deed together, and construing it in the light of the obvious purpose for which it was made, the appellee should be allowed one year "from the time that the said plaintiffs shall notify the said defendant that they do not propose to take an appeal from this decree, or, in case an appeal is allowed from this decree to the Supreme Court of Appeals, one year from the time the final decree shall be entered in the said cause by the Supreme Court of the state, fixing the rights of the parties under the deed herein referred to."

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the circuit court to the prejudice of appellants; and it is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

HERRELL, County Treasurer, v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF PRINCE WILLIAM COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 71*)—AUTHORITY TO SUE—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

An objection that an attorney, suing for a county board of supervisors, was not authorized to sue, was waived by an allegation in defendant's answer that he waived any demurrer to the bill, answered the charge, and courted and demanded the fullest investigation of his official conduct, praying that the cause might be referred, with instructions to inquire into all his settlements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 97-101; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 103*)—AUTHORITY TO SUE—RATIFICATION.

Where, after an attorney had brought suit on behalf of a county board of supervisors to compel an accounting by the county treasurer, the board ratified the attorney's act and employed special counsel to assist in the prosecution thereof, the board's failure to expressly confer on the attorney original authority to sue was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 154; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

3. ACCOUNT (§ 20*) — PROCEEDINGS BEFORE COMMISSIONER—NOTICE.

Where a commissioner to whom a suit for an accounting was submitted began the reference on February 6, 1908, "by consent of parties," and defendant and his counsel were present throughout the taking of testimony and participated in all the proceedings, he could not thereafter object that the account was taken without notice to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Cent. Dig. §§ 109-131; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

4. ACCOUNT (§ 20*) — PROCEEDINGS BEFORE COMMISSIONER.

Where a commissioner was appointed to take an account in a suit against a county treasurer for an accounting, the fact that the chancellor went over the calculations with the commissioner was not a proper ground for exception.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Prince William County.

Suit by the Board of Supervisors of Prince William County against James E. Herrell, County Treasurer, for an accounting. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. H. Lion and C. E. Nicol, for appellant. Robt. A. Hutchison and H. T. Davies, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. This suit (in which the county school board intervened by petition) was instituted by the appellee, the board of supervisors of Prince William county, against the appellant, James E. Herrell, county treasurer, praying for an adjustment of the county levies and moneys received by him, and not accounted for, from the year 1899 to and including the year 1906.

Upon such accounting the court decreed that the board of supervisors recover against the defendant $1,709.79, with interest on $1,345.48 from May 1, 1910, until paid, and the county school board $829.64, with interest and costs. From that decree this appeal was allowed.

[1, 2] In the first assignment of error it is insisted that the suit was instituted against the appellant by the commonwealth's attorney, without authority of the board of supervisors. This assignment is not sustained; but if there were any irregularity in that respect, it was waived by the defendant, who in his answer avers "that he waives any demurrer thereto [the bill], and hastens to answer every charge therein contained, and now courts and demands the fullest investigation of his official conduct. * * * Respondent unites in the petition and prayer of complainant that this cause be referred to a master commissioner of this court, with instructions to inquire into all the settlements of your respondent. * * *". Moreover, the action of the commonwealth's attorney in bringing the suit was expressly ratified by the board of supervisors, and the board employed special counsel to assist in its prosecution. Sutherland v. People's Bank, 111 Va. 515, 523, 69 S. E. 341.

[3] The second assignment of error is that the account of the commissioner, upon which the decree appealed from is founded, was taken without notice to appellant.

This assignment is not borne out by the record. Under the decree of reference of February 6, 1908, the commissioner, by consent of parties, began the account on March 11, 1908, and the appellant and his counsel were present throughout the taking thereof, and participated in all the proceedings. The report was returned May 10, 1910, and found against the defendant the amounts covered by the decree of December 21, 1910. To this report the defendant excepted, and on July 13, 1910, the court, without passing on the exceptions, on the motion of the defendant, recommitted the account, with instructions to the commissioner to consider his former report in connection with the exceptions, and to amend the same or make a new report, based on his former report and the depositions theretofore taken and papers and records filed, and in light of the exceptions and calculations and evidence, and to make such report as in his judgment might be proper.

On November 22, 1910, the commissioner returned his second report, in which he adheres to his findings on the original settlement. The second reference was merely out of abundant caution, to enable the commissioner to go over his work in light of the exceptions and papers filed therewith and test its accuracy. This he did in the most careful manner, and in the presence of and with the assistance of the honorable judge of the court, and verified the correctness of his former findings.

[4] The action of the judge in thus going over these calculations with the commissioner is made the ground of exception and criticism. So far from subjecting him to censure, as matter of correct procedure, the chancellor was well within his rights, and his painstaking and earnest effort to reach the very right of the cause is highly commendable.

The defendant was fully apprised of these calculations, and given ample opportunity to be heard; but, when his attention was specially called to the matter by the commissioner, he stated that "he had nothing further to offer."

[5] The last assignment of error is because the commissioner failed to apply the statute of limitations to all demands against the defendant arising out of any account settled by him with the board of supervisors, and to all demands of every sort which arose against him three years prior to the institution of this suit.

[6] We know of no such limitation as is here contended for in a suit by the board of supervisors against a county treasurer to recover public moneys in his hands. Jennings v. Taylor, 102 Va. 191, 45 S. E. 913. Besides, in this case, the defendant has expressly waived such right in his answer by uniting in the prayer of the bill for an account, and specifically praying for an inquiry into all settlements made by him "from the time he became such treasurer until the present moment." He adhered to this position until after the evidence was closed, when, for the first time, he interposed the plea of the statute of limitations before the commissioner. No excuse was, or is, offered for his unreasonable delay in tendering the plea, and, even if it had set up a bar to the suit, it might well have been rejected as coming too late.

Other exceptions to the commissioner's report were not pressed, and, being without merit, they do not call for special notice.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court is without error, and must be affirmed.

HOLLY v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. LARCENY (§ 30*) — INDICTMENT — SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code 1904, § 3994, which provides that in a prosecution for larceny of United States currency it shall be sufficient if accused be proved guilty of the larceny of national bank notes or any other form of money issued by the government, though the particular species be not proved, an indictment charging larceny of three notes of United States currency of the value of $20 sufficiently charges grand larceny.

2. LARCENY (§ 40*) — VARIANCE — PROPERTY TAKEN.

There was no material variance between an indictment charging larceny of three notes of United States currency of the value of $20 and proof of the taking of one $10 bill, one $5 bill, five $1 bills, and 65 cents in fractional coin. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 102-126, 160; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Hampton Holly was convicted of grand larceny, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Minter & Minter, of Pocahontas, for plaintiff in error. Samuel W. Williams, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, J. The accused, Hampton Holly, was found guilty of grand larceny and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for one year.

[1] There are only two assignments of error which need be noticed. The first is to the action of the court in overruling a motion to quash the indictment for alleged insufficiency in the description of the money which is the subject of the larceny.

The indictment charges larceny from the person of the owner of three notes of United States currency of the value of $20. Va. Code 1904, § 3707.

In Leftwich's Case, 61 Va. 716, the court held an indictment for the larceny of United States currency bad, since that was a general term, and not a sufficient designation of the kind of money charged to have been stolen. In consequence of this decision the statute now incorporated in Code, § 3994, was passed.

The last paragraph of that section provides: "And in a prosecution for the larceny of United States currency * * * it shall be sufficient if the accused be proved guilty of the larceny of national bank notes or United States treasury notes, certificates for either gold or silver coin, fractional coin, currency, or any other form of money issued by the United States government, * * * although the particular species be not proved."

After this enactment, in Dull's Case, 66 Va. 965, it was held that "an indictment for the larceny of divers notes of the 'national currency of the United States' is equivalent to the phrase in the statute of 'United States currency,' and the indictment is sufficient."

The obvious purpose of the statute is to prevent the escape from punishment of guilty parties by imposing upon the prosecution the difficult, and in most instances impossible, task of describing with precision the particular species of stolen money. The present indictment is plainly within the terms of the statute, and is sufficient.

[2] The last assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to grant the accused a new trial because of supposed material variance between the allegations of the indictment and the facts proved.

As observed, the offense charged is larceny from the person of the owner of three notes of United States currency of the value of $20. That allegation is the equivalent of the charge of larceny of three notes, one for $10 and two for $5 each, since three notes of those denominations are necessary to amount in the aggregate to $20.

The evidence showed that, while a confederate held the owner, the accused took from his pocket one $10 bill, one $5 bill, five $1 bills, and 65 cents in fractional coin. And it is contended that this variance between the allegation and proof is fatal.

Discrepancies as to value of property stolen between the indictment and evidence are contemplated by the statute (Code, § 4043), which provides that in a prosecution for grand larceny the accused may be found guilty of petit larceny, or in a prosecution for petit larceny he may be found guilty of that offense, though a case of grand larceny be proved.

But upon common-law principles the contention cannot be maintained.

In 2 Bishop on Criminal Procedure, § 712, the rule is correctly stated as follows: "More proved than alleged—Less—Part insufficiently described.—If the proof shows that more articles were stolen at the same time than the indictment charges against the defendant, this will be no variance; for in all criminal cases the allegation may cover less ground than the actual transaction covered. So, on the other hand, if there is less proved than charged, there may be a verdict and judgment sustaining so much of the allegation as the proof covers. Likewise, if the indictment is for the larceny of several articles, and one of them is insufficiently described, and there is a general verdict, judgment may be rendered against the defendant as for the articles of which the description is adequate."

The object of the rule invoked is to protect the accused against a second prosecution for the same offense.

In 12 Cyc. 280 b (a treatise on Criminal Law by H. C. Underhill, assisted by William Lawrence Clark), it is said: "A test almost universally applied to determine the identity of the offenses is to ascertain the identity, in character and effect, of the evidence in both cases. If the evidence which is necessary to support the second indictment was admissible under the former, related to the same crime, and was sufficient, if believed by the jury, to have warranted a conviction of that crime, the offenses are identical, and a plea of former conviction or acquittal is a bar."

So, at page 289 (6), the rule is thus stated: "The theft of several articles at one and the same time constitutes an indivisible offense, and a conviction or acquittal of any one or more of them is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the larceny of the others."

Tested by these well-settled principles, the accused could not have been jeopardized by the ruling of which he complains.

The judgment of the circuit court is plainly right, and is affirmed.

Error to Corporation Court of Roanoke.

One Jeffries was convicted of crime, and he brings error. Reversed, and prosecution dismissed.

Hairston & Willis, A. B. Hunt, and Hoge & Williams, for plaintiff in error. Samuel W. Williams, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

HARRISON, J. [1] The indictment in this case charges the plaintiff in error with unlawfully selling and dispensing ardent spirits between midnight of a Saturday in July, 1910, and sunrise of the succeeding Monday morning. There is no charge that the accused was selling ardent spirits without a license, but the prosecution is for a violation of the statute prohibiting the sale of ardent spirits on Sunday, and the indictment is, in form, under section 3804 of the Code, which has been repealed by section 19 of the act of March 12, 1908, known as the Byrd law (Code, vol. 3, p. 778), which simply provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell ardent spirits on Sunday, and does not, as provided by section 3804, make the violation of the statute to consist of selling spirits between 12 o'clock on Saturday night and sunrise of the succeeding Monday morning. Section 27 of the Byrd law provides a different punishment for its violation from that prescribed by section 3804 of the Code; and section 35 declares that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith are thereby repealed. So that the only existing statute making it unlawful to sell ardent spirits on Sunday is the act of March 12, 1908, known as the Byrd law, which provides that no person shall sell ardent spirits on Sunday.

[2] As Sunday is from 12 o'clock Saturday night until that hour Sunday night, the charge of the indictment that the sale was between midnight of Saturday and sunrise of the succeeding Monday morning may be true, and yet the accused be innocent of violating the statute, because, if the sale was made after 12 o'clock Sunday night and before sunrise Monday morning, it was made at a time not inhibited by the statute.

It is clear, therefore, that the demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained, because the sale could have been made as therein charged and still not have been a violation of the law.

The judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and this court will enter the order the lower court ought to have entered, sustaining the demurrer to the indictment and dismissing the prosecution.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by one Chalkley against the American Locomotive Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

McGuire, Riely & Bryan, for plaintiffs in error. A. B. Dickinson and D. M. White, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. In this action damages were awarded the defendant in error, Chalkley (plaintiff below) against the American Locomotive Company and Richmond Locomotive Works for the loss of one of his eyes while in the service of the defendants; the casualty being imputed to their negligence. At the time of the injury the plaintiff was employed as a member of the night force to operate a drill press, which is described as a rotating spindle in a sliding head, used for boring metal. The machine is controlled by belts and pulleys connecting it with a countershaft, which, in turn, is connected with the line shaft. All the machines of that character in the defendants' shops are equipped with "loose pulleys," by means of which any one of them may be stopped without affecting the others. This result is produced by means of a "shifter," an appliance which transfers the belt from a tight pulley to a loose pulley on the countershaft, and stops the machine. When the shifting is reversed, the machine is at once set in motion again. The line shaft is constantly in motion, and distributes power to all machines connected with it.

On the occasion of the accident Chalkley had started the drill press; but, discovering that the bit or drill in the "chuck" was bent and useless, he stopped the machine in the usual way for the purpose of replacing the defective drill with a new one. He had inserted the new drill in the "chuck" and was tightening it with a hammer when the machine suddenly started, causing the spindle to rapidly revolve and the drill to strike against the hammer with great force, by means of which a scale or piece of metal was broken off and penetrated the plaintiff's left eye, putting it out.

[1] The specific ground of negligence upon which the plaintiff bases his right of recovery is that the drill press was out of repair and in a dangerous condition, of which condition the defendants had actual notice. This notice was sought to be brought home to the defendants by the testimony of an employe named Pierotti, who operated the drill press several weeks before the plaintiff entered the employment of the defendants. This witness testified that on several occasions the machine "started up on him," and he reported the fact to the night foreman. But it appeared that the last trouble that Pierotti had with the drill press occurred at least 2 weeks before Chalkley entered the service of the defendants, and 2½ weeks before he was hurt. In the meantime, and shortly before the accident, the machine had been overhauled by a competent millwright of more than 20 years' experience, who put it in thorough repair. From that time to within a few moments of the accident the machine had been in operation, and there was no indication of its being out of repair.

[2] In these circumstances, it is not possible to ascribe to the defendants want of ordinary care in not discovering the alleged defects, to the existence of which the accident is proximately attributed. Besides, there was other evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff which is fatal to his right to recover.

H. C. Chalkley, a brother of the plaintiff, testified that soon after the plaintiff was injured he examined the overhead shafting and belting to discover, if possible, and correct the defect which caused the accident; that in rendering this service he was acting under the orders of a man whom he took to be the foreman of the defendants. His inspection disclosed that the hanger under the loose pulley had dropped down at one end about three-fourths of an inch, the threads of the bolt were worn, and the tap had worked loose and dropped down, which threw the countershaft out of parallel with the main shaft. The inevitable result of this condition was to cause the belt (following the line of least resistance) to run up the countershaft on the tight pulley and start the machine. This the witness said would happen in half a minute, and the machine would "keep driving."

Assuming, as we must assume, the truth of this statement, it demonstrates that the defect which caused the accident developed in the brief space of time which elapsed after the plaintiff stopped the machine to insert a new drill in the "chuck" and the sudden starting of the machine which caused the accident. The plaintiff, therefore, wholly fails to show that the defendants either knew of the defect in question, or could, in the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered it in time to prevent the injury.

[3] The principle is well settled that, to render a master liable for injuries to a servant from defects in machinery or appliances, it must be shown that the master knew of the defects, or in the exercise of due care ought to have known of them. Va. & N. C. Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. 976; Cabin Branch Mining Co. v. Hutchinson's Adm'x, 112 Va. 37, 70 S. E. 480.

[4] The remaining assignment of error is to the rejection by the trial court of evidence of an alleged custom, where a drill press has been set up and the countershaft made plumb, not to inspect the latter while it continues to work satisfactorily, or within a month or six weeks, to ascertain if the countershaft is plumb.

The tendency of such a custom, if allowed to prevail, would contravene the rule of law which imposes upon the master the duty of exercising reasonable care to inspect machinery and appliances. Hence there was no error in excluding this evidence.

Upon the main assignment of error, the judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Bill by one Hughson, trustee in bankruptcy of J. C. Dameron, against Dameron and others, to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance. Bill dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for an accounting.

Polindexter & Hopwood, Wilson & Manson, and James D. Johnston, for appellant. I. P. Whitehead and Alfred B. Percy, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. This is a suit in equity, brought by appellant, as trustee in bankruptcy of J. C. Dameron, to set aside a transfer from the bankrupt to his wife, N. W. Dameron, of the grantor's ⁸⁵/₁₀₀ interest in two letters patent, the one to a hay press and the other to a baling press. The assignment, which on its face purports to be for the nominal consideration of $5, is dated January 1, 1910, and was recorded in the United States Patent Office 11 days thereafter.

The bill charges that the assignment was voluntary, and made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the husband's creditors. From a decree denying relief and dismissing the bill, this appeal was granted.

[1] Adopting the language of the brief of counsel for appellees: "The theory of the defense to this suit is twofold: First. That the decree dismissing the suit styled 'Roanoke Sheet Metal Co. v. Dameron' was an adjudication of the title to said patents in N. W. Dameron: (a) As to Adams, Payne & Gleaves, Incorporated, because the suit was for the same purpose and was between the same parties, and was a decision on the merits; (b) that the Roanoke Sheet Metal Company's suit was a proceeding in rem, and partakes of a public nature, and may be pleaded even against strangers. Second. That the conveyance of the letters patent to N. W. Dameron was a settlement upon her of this property in consideration of the fact that she had mortgaged her estate to secure the payment of money which her husband owed."

The suit of the Roanoke Sheet Metal Company, a judgment creditor of J. C. Dameron, was brought against him and his wife and C. W. Wade to set aside the transfer from the husband to the wife of his interest in the patent rights on the ground that it was voluntary and fraudulent. Of these patent rights $\frac{15}{100}$ were admittedly owned by Wade, Adams, Payne & Gleaves, Incorporated, and other creditors of J. C. Dameron, filed petitions in the suit, asking to be made parties and seeking to subject the husband's interest to the satisfaction of their debts. The case was pending in the law and chancery court of the city of Roanoke, and at the June term, 1910, there was a final decree reciting that, it appearing to the court that a satisfactory compromise and settlement had been effected, the case was stricken from the docket at the costs of the plaintiff and petitioning creditors. In point of fact, the evidence shows that Wade purchased and took assignments of all demands asserted in the suit, which was afterwards dismissed by the decree referred to. These debts, aggregating upwards of \$3,000, were bought at a discount by Wade, who took the joint note of J. C. Dameron and his wife for the full amount thereof, secured by a deed of trust on the $\frac{25}{100}$ interest in the patents, in which the husband and wife united. In addition to the debt asserted by Adams, Payne & Gleaves, Incorporated, in that suit, the firm held a separate demand against J. C. Dameron, upon which they subsequently brought an action at law. The case was contested, but resulted in the recovery of a judgment for the plaintiff for \$1,957.50, with interest and costs. Within less than four months after the date of this judgment, J. C. Dameron was, upon his own petition, adjudged a bankrupt, and listed the judgment in his schedules as a subsisting debt against his estate.

Upon these facts, we fail to appreciate the force of the contention of appellees that the decree of the law and chancery court dismissing the suit of the Roanoke Sheet Metal Company is res adjudicata as to the judgment of Adams, Payne & Gleaves, Incorporated, which had not been recovered at that time, and was in no way involved in that litigation.

[2] Nor can we assent to the proposition that the Roanoke Sheet Metal Company's suit was a proceeding in rem, in the sense that the decree therein settled the title of N. W. Dameron to the patent rights, so far as demands not asserted in that case are concerned.

We are, moreover, of opinion that the evidence does not establish actual fraud against J. C. Dameron in the transfer to his wife of the $\frac{25}{100}$ interest in the letters patent.

The sole question for our determination, therefore, is whether or not the assignment was voluntary and void as to existing creditors of the grantor, under Va. Code 1904, § 2458.

[3] It is the settled doctrine in Virginia that, in a suit between creditors of an insolvent husband and his wife to avoid a transfer of property from the husband to the wife, the burden of showing the bona fides of the transaction and that it was made upon a valuable consideration is cast upon the wife. The decisions of this court upon that proposition are too numerous and too recent to require citation.

[4] The evidence shows that the husband, who was the inventor of the hay press and baling press, did not have the necessary means to perfect and patent his devices. The wife, on the other hand, owned a house and lot in the city of Roanoke and some property in the country. From time to time, both before and after the assignment, she advanced money to her husband in connection with these patents and in paying his debts, using her separate estate as a basis of credit to raise money for those purposes. It furthermore appears that the wife assumed these liabilities under such circumstances as to create a quasi relation of principal and surety between her husband and herself, and it is clear, under the authorities, that the assignment should be held valid to the extent to which it may be necessary to indemnify her for such expenditures. William & Mary College v. Powell, 53 Va. 372, 385; Rixey v. Deltrick, 85 Va. 42, 6 S. E. 615; Miller v. Ferguson, 110 Va. 222, 65 S. E. 564.

[5] In April, 1910, the Dameron Machinery Corporation was organized, with $80,000 of common stock, and acquired the patent rights for $10,000 in money and 5 per cent. of the common stock. Of the $10,000, $5,500 was paid to Mrs. Dameron in cash. In addition to the common stock, there was also to be an issue of preferred stock, each share of which carried as a bonus one share of common stock. J. C. Dameron, as attorney in fact for his wife, subscribed to 50 shares of preferred stock, upon which $2,750 was paid.

Our conclusion upon the foregoing facts is that the decree of the circuit court is erroneous, and must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings, looking to an accounting between J. C. Dameron and his wife. And upon such settlement Mrs. Dameron is to have credit for all expenditures made by her on behalf of her husband, and shall be charged with the net amount received by her in money from the sale of his interest in the patents. There must also be an account of subsisting debts against J. C. Dameron, which were contracted prior to January 1, 1910. And if upon such accounting a balance shall be found against Mrs. Dameron, such balance will constitute an ultimate asset to be resorted to in the event it shall become necessary to discharge the debts of the class referred to, after exhausting the stock in the Dameron Machinery Corporation held by Mrs. Dameron by virtue of the assignment from her husband. But in the event there should be a balance in her favor, such balance shall constitute a prior claim against the assets. And, finally, if a surplus shall remain after satisfying the debts of the specified class, such residuum shall be decreed to Mrs. N. W. Dameron.

Reversed.

SAUNDERS et al. v. BANK OF MECKLENBURG et al.

1. EQUITY (§ 149*)—PLEADING—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

A bill by the depositors of an insolvent bank, all of whose contracts are identical and who are entitled to participate equally in its assets, against the directors for negligent mismanagement, is not multifarious because the depositors' causes of action are separate and distinct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 342, 368-370; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

2. EQUITY (§ 149*)—PLEADING—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

A bill by the depositors of an insolvent bank to recover from the directors for their negligent mismanagement is not multifarious because it fails to state the time the directors assumed their duties or when the complainants became depositors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 342, 368-370; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 55*)—LIABILITY—DIRECTORS—SUIT BY STOCKHOLDERS.

Where a bank became insolvent and its property was transferred to a receiver, the depositors cannot in their own name maintain a suit against the directors to recover for their negligent mismanagement, unless the receiver has on their demand refused to act, the receiver occupying a fiduciary relation toward them, and being entitled to sue for all wrongs done the corporation which he represents; and so a mere allegation in such a bill that the receiver declined to bring the suit is insufficient, it not showing a demand.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-104; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mecklenburg County.

Bill by one Saunders and others against the Bank of Mecklenburg and others. From a decree sustaining a demurrer to the bill, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

John A. Lamb, W. E. Homes, and S. A. Anderson, for appellants. Hill Carter, E. P. Buford, R. T. Thorp, Harry C. Smith, and E. C. Goode, for appellees.

KEITH, P. Saunders and others, depositors in the Bank of Mecklenburg, filed their bill in chancery against certain directors of the bank, in which they allege that the bank had suspended payment and was insolvent; that, owing to the carelessness, negligence and utter disregard of their duties as directors, loans had been recklessly and improvidently made to insolvent corporations, firms, and individuals; that certain persons named had been allowed to overdraw their accounts—all of which acts of omission to perform their duties had inflicted great loss upon the depositors. They therefore prayed that the directors be made parties defendant, and that proper accounts should be taken to ascertain their liability.

This general statement of the charges of the bill we deem sufficient to bring out the propositions of law which are involved in this cause.

The bill was demurred to upon several grounds—that it fails to show such negligence as would make the defendants, or any of them, liable to complainants; that it fails to show at what time complainants became creditors of the Bank of Mecklenburg; that it fails to show what acts of negligence were committed by the defendants; that it fails to show why the receivers were not proper parties to bring suit against the defendants, or any reason why the complainants undertook to bring suit, instead of the receivers; that it fails to show any request made by the complainants of the receivers to bring suit against the defendants; that the bill is multifarious, in that it seeks to join in the same suit matters which cannot be joined, matters which occurred when some of the defendants were not directors with matters which occurred when they were.

The circuit court sustained the demurrer to the bill, but upon what specific ground of objection is not stated, further than to say that it was dismissed for want of equity.

[1] We will first consider the objection as to multifariousness.

This subject has been very recently considered in the case of Seefried v. Clarke, 113 Va. —, 74 S. E. 204, where, after considering many authorities, the principle is stated to be that where causes, though distinct, are not absolutely independent of each other, and it would be more convenient to dispose of them in one suit the objection of multifariousness will not prevail.

In this case the suit is brought by depositors of a bank whose contracts with the bank are identical, they are entitled to participate equally in its assets, they are very numerous, and every consideration of convenience can be urged in support of their right to unite as plaintiffs.

It is a different case from that of Brown v. Bedford City, 91 Va. 31, 20 S. E. 968. In that case certain stockholders had been fraudulently induced to become subscribers to a company by identical representations. It was held that it was proper for them to unite in one bill, but creditors having been united in the same suit, whose rights and interests were not only diverse, but wholly antagonistic to the stockholders, a demurrer to the bill was sustained; it being pointed out that the interest of the stockholders was to be relieved from their subscriptions by reason of fraud, while it was to the interest of the creditors that they should be held bound by their undertaking.

[2] Nor does the omission in the bill to state precisely at what time the directors assumed the duties of their office, or when the complainants became depositors, render the bill demurrable.

A similar objection was taken to the bill in School Board v. Farish, 92 Va. 156, 23 S. E. 221. In that case the decedent had been county treasurer for several terms, and had given official bonds, with sureties, for each term for which he was elected. Upon his death a bill was filed against his administrator and the sureties on his several official bonds as treasurer, for the purpose of administering his estate, settling his several accounts as treasurer, and having decrees against his administrator and the sureties on his several official bonds for the amounts due by them respectively. It was held that the method pursued was convenient and suitable, that no injury was thereby done to any one, and that the bill was not on that account multifarious.

In Ackerman v. Halsey, 37 N. J. Eq. 356, it was held: "That some of the defendants have been directors longer than others is no ground of demurrer, because the court can discriminate between them, and hold those elected recently only liable for losses incurred during their term of office."

[3] In Marshall v. Farmers' Savings Bank of Alexandria, 85 Va. 676, 8 S. E. 586, 2 L. R. A. 534, 17 Am. St. Rep. 84, it is said that directors "hold to stockholders, depositors, and creditors the relation of trustees to cestui que trust, and as such are personally responsible for frauds and losses resulting from gross negligence and inattention to their trust duties."

The authority of that case is somewhat diminished by the fact that two of the judges dissented and a third concurred only in the result. It is doubtless true that there is much authority in support of the principle, which it enunciates, that directors stand in the relation of trustees to the stockholders and creditors of a bank. As to what is the precise relation, there is much conflict of authority; many of the courts holding that the directors are officers of the corporation and responsible only to it. Other cases hold that the directors are responsible for actual fraud to the creditors, but not for mere negligence.

We do not deem it necessary to undertake to harmonize the conflict, if that were possible, or to ascertain to what extent a trust relation exists between the directors of a bank and its depositors, as the demurrer to the bill, in our judgment, was properly sustained upon a ground about which there is little diversity of opinion.

Upon the death of an individual all rights of action which survive pass to his personal representative, and are to be asserted by him.

In Beaty v. Downing, 96 Va. 451, 31 S. E. 612, it was held that "neither a legatee nor a creditor of a decedent can maintain a suit against his personal representative and another who is a debtor to the estate for the purpose of collecting the debt, except under special circumstances, such as the insolvency of the personal representative, collusion between him and the debtor, the fact that the debtor was a partner of the decedent, or a trustee holding property for, or an agent of, the decedent. A bill which fails to charge these or other special circumstances which will take the case out of the general rule is bad on demurrer."

Conrad v. Fuller, 98 Va. 16, 34 S. E. 893, is to the same effect. For a legatee, distributee, or creditor of the decedent to institute suit against a debtor of the decedent, "there must be some special circumstances which render it necessary or proper for the protection of the rights of such distributee, legatee, or creditor, such as collusion between the personal representative and the debtor, refusal to sue, some impediment in the due prosecution of a suit by the personal representative, or the like."

In Mount v. Radford Trust Co., 93 Va. 427, 25 S. E. 244, it was held that "a stockholder in a corporation has no right to bring a suit in equity in his own name, or for the benefit of himself and other stockholders, upon a cause of action existing in the corporation, and in which the corporation is itself the proper complainant, except where it actually or virtually refuses to institute or prosecute the suit. It must be averred and proved that application was made to the proper authorities to institute suit and they refused, or that such a state of facts exists that the application itself would be useless, or the facts charged must be such as to show that it is reasonably certain that a suit by the corporation would be impossible. But the suit, when brought, is still the suit of the corporation; the stockholder being permitted to sue in this manner simply to set in motion the judicial machinery of the court"—citing Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 1095; Dulaney v. Smith, 97 Va. 130, 33 S. E. 533.

Cook on Stockholders, at section 740, says: "Inasmuch as a fraud, or ultra vires or negligent act, of directors of a corporation is an injury done to the corporation itself, it is the duty and proper function of the corporation to institute any action that may be brought to remedy the injury to the corporation. As already explained, however, a stockholder may bring the action if the corporation improperly refuses or neglects to institute such suit. Before the stockholder brings suit, he must make a formal request to the corporate officers that suit be instituted by the corporation. Upon its refusal or neglect to comply with that request, he may then bring suit himself. It is well settled, however, that he must allege in his bill in equity that such a request has been made and has not been complied with."

In Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. Ed. 827, the court examined the right of the shareholder to sustain a suit under the authorities, English and American, and thus states its conclusion:

"There must exist as the foundation of the suit:

"1. Some action or threatened action of the managing board of directors or trustees of the corporation which is beyond the authority conferred by their charter or other source of organization; or

"2. Such a fraudulent transaction, completed or threatened, by the acting managers in connection with some other party, or among themselves, or with the other shareholders, as will result in serious injury to the corporation, or to the interests of the other shareholders; or

"3. Where the board of directors, or a majority of them, are acting for their own interests in a manner destructive of the corporation itself, or of the rights of the other shareholders; or

"4. Where the majority of shareholders themselves are oppressively and illegally pursuing a course, in the name of the corporation, which is in violation of the rights of the other shareholders, and which can only be restrained by the aid of a court of equity.

"5. It must also be made to appear that plaintiff has made an earnest effort to obtain redress at the hands of the directors and shareholders of the corporation.

"6. That he was the owner of the stock on which he claims the right to sue at the time of the transaction of which he complains, or that it has since devolved on him by operation of law."

The opinion in that case was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, whose judgments will be respected as long as the orderly administration of justice in the courts shall obtain.

Appellants rely largely upon the case of Campbell v. Watson, 62 N. J. Eq. 396, 50 Atl. 120, which is doubtless entitled to great respect, and in which the court says that "a bank's creditors, on its insolvency, have a direct interest in its affairs, and are the cestui que trust of the receiver, entitled to enforce all the corporation's rights, and to collect its assets, including the right to claim damages for the directors' negligence." But that case is not in conflict with the principle we are seeking to enforce, which is that, where the assets of an insolvent corporation have passed into the hands of a receiver, it becomes his duty to collect all of its assets for the benefit of its creditors, including damages which may have accrued by reason of a director's negligence; but it does not follow that because the bank's creditors, upon its insolvency, have a direct interest in its affairs, that it is not their duty to call upon the receiver to collect its assets. In the case of Campbell v. Watson the suit was brought by a receiver, and the opinion of the court is to be construed in the light of that fact.

In Ackerman v. Halsey, supra, it is held that "where the receiver of an insolvent bank refuses to bring suit, a creditor and stockholder thereof may, for the benefit of himself and of such other creditors and stockholders as elect to join him, maintain a suit against the president and directors for gross official neglect and mismanagement, whereby the bank was financially ruined." This case is cited with approval in Campbell, Receiver, v. Watson, supra, 62 N. J. Eq. at page 406, 50 Atl. 120. While the latter case fully maintains the ultimate right of the stockholders and creditors of an insolvent corporation to maintain a suit against directors for official negligence and mismanagement, it is apparent that it was not within the thought of the judge who delivered the opinion to disturb the settled law as to the course of procedure by which their remedy was to be sought.

In Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 88 N. Y. 52, it is said that "the directors of a corporation, if through gross negligence and inattention to the duties of their trust they suffer the corporate funds to be lost or wasted, are liable for the loss so sustained," and "in case the receiver is one of the directors chargeable with neglect of duty, such action may be maintained by the stockholders, and when the stockholders are numerous the action may be brought by one or more in behalf of all." In such an action "it is not necessary to allege in the complaint a direction from the comptroller, or a demand upon him and a refusal to direct the receiver to bring the action, or a refusal of the receiver to sue."

In Trustees of Dollar Savings Bank v. Bosselux (D. C.) 3 Fed. 817, 4 Hughes, 387, the suit was brought by the trustees in bankruptcy of an insolvent bank, and it was held that they might sue the directors of the bank for moneys lost by their gross negligence and a habitual inattention to their duties.

In Marshall v. Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, supra, it appears that the bank, having become hopelessly insolvent, ceased to transact business and suspended payment on the 1st day of December, 1876; that the board of directors held a meeting on the 7th of December of that year, and appointed Jefferson Tacey to collect and disburse the assets of the bank under the direction of the board of directors; that on the 21st of December, 1877, the bank made a deed of assignment of its assets and property of every kind and description to Jefferson Tacey, in trust, to collect and convert them into cash; that the said Jefferson Tacey had been an officer of the bank from its organization, and was, at the time of its suspension, a director, and was, therefore, as stated in the bill, "not a proper person to whom the whole of the assets of said concern should have been assigned for administration, and that without security." There was no demurrer to the bill, and, therefore, the opinion in the case discusses nothing except the sufficiency of the proof to establish the negligence charged. The defendants were well advised not to enter a demurrer, for the action of the bank in placing the control of all of its assets and the management of all of its affairs in the hands of Jefferson Tacey, one of the offending directors, and that without security, brought the case squarely and fully within the influence of the exceptions to which we have adverted. The authorities which we have cited fully sustain that bill. It is, indeed, strikingly similar to Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, supra, where the receiver was one of the directors chargeable with neglect of duty, and it was held that the suit might be maintained without a demand upon and refusal by him to bring suit.

The bill in this case attempts to meet the requirement under consideration by the naked statement that "the receivers of said Bank of Mecklenburg have declined to institute any suit against said directors to assert the liability herein asserted." It is not stated by whom the demand was made, or, indeed, except inferentially, that any demand was made, or the ground upon which the demand was placed. It falls short of what the law requires.

In Cook on Stockholders, supra, it is said that, before a stockholder can bring suit, he must make a formal request of the corporate officers that a suit be instituted by the corporation; and in Hawes v. Oakland, supra, it is said that it must be made to appear that the plaintiff has made an earnest effort to obtain redress at the hands of the directors and shareholders of the corporation.

In considering this question, we have dealt with cases which deny the right of stockholders to bring a suit in their own name, of the creditor or distributee of an estate to bring a suit against the administrator and a debtor of the estate, or of the creditor of a corporation, after the appointment of a receiver, to institute a suit in his own name to recover the assets of the corporation, except after a demand and refusal by those upon whom the right to sue is primarily cast, save under exceptional circumstances, because they all depend substantially upon the same considerations, and are subject to the same exceptions. That the relation of trustee and cestui que trust does or does not exist is not the determining factor. If the creditor of a decedent were permitted to exercise the unrestricted right to sue the debtors of the estate, or the stockholders of a corporation, or the creditors of an insolvent corporation, it would lead to infinite confusion. At the same time the stockholder and the creditor have rights which must be protected, and if those upon whom the law has imposed the duty of guarding their rights fail or refuse, after proper request, to take such steps as may be necessary for their protection, or if conditions exist from which it shall reasonably appear that such a request would have been unavailing, then it is plain, from the authorities which we have considered, that they may themselves bring suit, and thus, as Mr. Pomeroy phrases it, "set in motion the judicial machinery of the court."

We are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court must be affirmed.

BANKS AND BANKING (§ 55*)—PLEADING—PETITION TO INTERVENE.

Where an insolvent bank made an assignment of all its assets, and the assignee sued, asking the aid of the court of chancery in the administration of the trust, a bill by creditors of the bank, who sought to recover from the directors for their negligent mismanagement, which was properly dismissed, because there had been no demand upon and refusal by the assignee to begin suit, cannot be treated as a petition to intervene in the suit by the assignee.

KEITH, P. The Traders' & Truckers' Bank became insolvent, and Murrell and others, creditors of the bank, instituted a suit against the directors to recover damages from them for gross neglect of duty upon their part. This case differs from that of Saunders v. Bank of Mecklenburg, 75 S. E. 94, just decided, in no material respect.

It seems that on the 9th of August, 1909, the bank made an assignment to Winston, trustee, of all of its assets, and that he, at a subsequent date, instituted suit, asking the aid and direction of a court of chancery in the administration of the trust. The bill in the case before us prays that it be heard along with the suit of Winston, Trustee, v. Traders' & Truckers' Bank, and it was suggested in argument that the bill in this case might be treated as a petition in that suit. There was a demurrer to the bill, which the circuit court sustained, and the bill was dismissed.

For the reasons given in the case of Saunders v. Bank of Mecklenburg, we are of opinion that there was no error in the decree. We cannot maintain the bill in this case, either as an original bill or as a petition, without doing violence to the principle there established, as it does not appear that any demand or request was made upon the trustee to proceed against those who are named as defendants in this suit. To hold that the bill could be treated as a petition would be a transparent effort to escape from a salutary principle of chancery pleading and practice.

We are of opinion that the decree should be affirmed.

EVANS, P. J. The Republican campaign committee of Georgia was organized for the purpose of furthering the candidacy of Hon. W. H. Taft for the President of the United States. The committee consisted of Clark Greer, chairman, Henry Blun, Jr., J. B. Gaston, Harry S. Edwards, and Fred Dismukes. W. J. Massee was the secretary and treasurer of the committee. Massee was not able to give his personal attention to the work, and he employed C. M. Preston to represent him in the work of the committee, and authorized him to sign checks in his name as secretary and treasurer. The headquarters of the committee were at Macon, Ga., in charge of the chairman. The campaign ended with the election of Mr. Taft on November 4, 1908. Some time during the latter part of December, Preston, on the authority of Greer, contracted with the plaintiff for the printing of lists of names in various counties of Georgia. The account for the printing was proved in bankruptcy by the plaintiff against Greer, and a dividend was paid thereon. The plaintiff then sued the members of the committee, except Greer and Dismukes, alleging that they did business as a Georgia mailing list company. The defendants denied liability.

The contention of the plaintiff was that in carrying on their work the committee had compiled a list of voters in various counties of the state, and that it occurred to Greer to publish this list as a mailing list for advertising purposes, and sell the same for the purpose of raising funds to liquidate any indebtedness of the committee, and to build up a permanent campaign fund. On the other hand, the defendants contended that the campaign had ended with the election of Mr. Taft, that all expenses of the committee had been paid, that the committee had dissolved, and that the subsequent contract with the plaintiff was made by Greer and Preston without their knowledge or authority, and was the private and individual enterprise of Greer and Preston. The jury found for the defendants.

On the trial the controlling point was the authority of Preston, who made the contract, to bind the defendants. We have carefully examined the evidence, and have reached the conclusion that the verdict is amply supported by the evidence, that the case was fairly submitted to the jury, that the instruction of the court was free of any substantial error, and that the verdict should stand.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 588*)—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

On November 15, 1911, the trial judge heard the application of the defendant in error for temporary alimony, and on December 8, 1911, rendered judgment allowing a specified amount as temporary alimony and another amount as attorney's fees for counsel representing the applicant. Thereupon the plaintiff in error sued out a bill of exceptions, complaining of this judgment. The bill of exceptions was certified on the 20th day of December, 1911. The evidence is not embodied in the bill of exceptions, but an approved brief of the same is specified as a part of the record. It appears that this brief of the evidence was not approved until the 5th day of January, 1912. Held, that the brief of evidence cannot be considered by this court. The trial judge was without authority to approve the brief of evidence after the bill of exceptions had been certified. 2. DEDICATION (§ 1*)—REQUISITES—PAROL DEDICATION.

An express dedication to a municipality of a particularly described parcel of land for use as a public street may be made by parol.

3. DEDICATION (§ 35*)—ACCEPTANCE—EXTENT.

Where the confines of the land dedicated to a municipality for use as a street are definitely fixed by the dedicator in his offer of dedication, municipal acceptance of the whole may be implied from improvements or repairs done on a portion of the street by the municipality in recognition of the dedication.

4. DEDICATION (§ 33*)—ACCEPTANCE—EXPRESS ACCEPTANCE.

Inasmuch as an acceptance of the dedication of a street imposes upon the municipality duties and burdens with respect thereto, an express acceptance must be by authorized officials or the governing body of the municipality.

5. DEDICATION (§ 36*)—ACCEPTANCE—EXTENT.

If an owner offers to dedicate land to a municipality for a public street on condition that the whole parcel defined by him must be opened by the grading of the entire width of the street, and by removing all obstructions therefrom, acts done by the municipality from which an acceptance will be implied must be in compliance with the prescribed condition. But if the intent of the dedicator be to dedicate a street of specified dimension to be opened up by the municipality, and the street is opened up by the municipality so as to meet the exigencies of safe and convenient travel, such acts by the municipality would be sufficient to indicate acceptance of all the land which was dedicated for use as a street.

6. DEDICATION (§ 43*)—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

7. DEDICATION (§ 43*)—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

On the issue of whether or not an owner of land had dedicated a street to a municipality and marked it out, testimony that the defendant, who was the grantee of the alleged dedicator, and a citizen of the municipality several years after the alleged dedication, shortly before the trial measured the width of the street, is irrelevant.

Error from Superior Court, Jeff Davis County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by the Mayor and Aldermen of Hazelhurst against R. S. Ellis and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

P. L. Smith, of Hazelhurst, and W. W. Bennett, of Baxley, for plaintiffs in error. S. D. Dell, of Hazelhurst, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. This contest is between the city of Hazelhurst and a landowner over the width of Gill street. The landowner was proceeding to erect a fence on what he claimed to be the outer limits of his land abutting on Gill street, and the city filed a petition to enjoin the building of the fence, which was alleged to encroach 20 feet on the street. The city submitted evidence tending to show the following: Gill street extends westward from second avenue to the incorporate limits, crossing a branch. In 1898 W. C. Swain owned a tract of land lying westward from the branch and reaching beyond the city limits. He lived on this land, and desired to open a street 80 feet in width from the branch to the corporate limits of the town. Accordingly, in that year, he staked out a street 80 feet in width from the branch to the city limits, and constructed fences on both sides of the street. In some places the fences were a little more than 80 feet apart. He said to several people that he would give the street to the town if they would open it up. He told his son that he was giving the street to the town to open it up. In 1899 he sold 12 acres of land to Mr. Leeth, "beginning at the old hand mill branch at the foot of Gill street, and then running 280 yards towards the residence of the said W. C. Swain, down a street 80 feet wide to be given and appropriated to the town of Hazelhurst by the said W. C. Swain, bounding said 12 acres on the south." He also sold land to Mr. Deal, giving Gill street as a boundary. He told another person that "he donated that 80 foot street to the town if they would open it up." Shortly after these declarations and transactions, the city authorities worked the street by grading the roadbed from the branch to the top of the hill, keeping it in repair, and constructing a sidewalk on the north side for about 280 yards. From the top of the hill to the city limits the land was level, and the consistency of the soil was such that the roadbed required very little attention to keep it in good condition. The city's street force, and some citizens who were permitted to do personal labor in lieu of street tax, worked the street, shaping up the roadbed to the top of the hill, and cutting the underbrush from the top of the hill to the corporate limits. The larger trees were not cut, but were left for shade trees. The sidewalk was constructed on the northern side of the street, and the roadbed, including the drain ditches to the top of the hill, was about 35 or 40 feet wide, and from the top of the hill the roadbed was level, and had been worked sufficiently to keep it in repair up to the filing of the suit. The defendant Ellis purchased a tract of land, which embraced the street in its description, from W. C. Swain in December, 1903. He testified that, when Swain sold him the land, he told him "that he had opened up that road out there himself, so that he would be able to sell to Mr. Leeth; * * * that he intended giving the plaintiff a street, but had not done so." At the time the defendant bought the land from Swain, there was just a road opened up about 12 feet wide, and that was all that Swain ever opened up. The fences built by Swain were about 120 feet apart. The defendant had built the fence, with the exception of two panels, at the time of the service of the injunction;

and these were built afterwards by permission of the court. The defendants offered testimony as to the amount of the work done by the city, the character of the growth of the timber on the land, and the intention of Swain to give to the city the street if it would open it up.

[1] 1. Under the testimony submitted by the plaintiff, the jury were authorized to find a dedication of the street to the city and its acceptance by the city, and the court properly refused a nonsuit.

[2] 2-4. A dedication results where one being the owner of land consents either expressly or by his actions that it may be used by the public for any particular purpose. No particular form is required in making a dedication. It may be done orally or in writing, or it may be inferred from acts or implied from long user. Mayor, etc., of Macon v. Franklin, 12 Ga. 239. An express dedication of a particularly described parcel of land to a public use may be established by parol evidence, and its acceptance also be so shown. Where an owner of land makes an express dedication of a particular portion of his land to a municipal corporation, its acceptance may be shown by any act of the municipality recognizing the existence of the street and treating it as one of the streets of the city.

[3] Where the extent of the grant is defined by the landowner himself in his statement making an express dedication to a municipality, it is not necessary that the public authorities should work the entire street within the confines of the grant to make effectual the act of acceptance. Any improvements or repairs done on the street by the public authorities in recognition of the dedication of a defined strip of land for a street may be regarded as an acceptance of the dedication. 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, §§ 167, 168, 169. The distinction should be noted between acts of user when solely relied on to raise an implication of a dedication, and acts of user as evidencing an acceptance of an express dedication. In the former case a dedication will not be implied beyond the use (Swift v. Lithonia, 101 Ga. 706, 29 S. E. 12), while in the latter the dedicatory has definitely fixed the limits of the land dedicated to public use, and proof of any acts by the public authorities, done in recognition of the offer of dedication, will be sufficient to imply an acceptance of the dedication.

[4] An express acceptance is usually shown by the order of some officer or body having jurisdiction in such matters. Inasmuch as an acceptance of the dedication of a street imposes upon a municipality duties and burdens with respect thereto, if an express acceptance be relied on, it must be by authorized officials or governing body. 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 166. It was therefore erroneous for the court to charge the jury, on the subject of express acceptance, that "acceptance by any official of the city would be presumed to be done by the authority from the city itself."

[5] 5. One of the points made by the defendant is that the dedication was made on the condition that the entire width of the street should be opened up by the city, and that the failure of the city to cut the trees and remove every obstruction within the 80 feet defeated the dedication. If the dedicatory by the act of dedication had expressly provided that the acceptance could be evidenced only by such acts, there could be no acceptance except in compliance with the terms imposed by the dedicatory. On the other hand, if the intent of the dedicatory was to dedicate a street of a specified dimension to be opened up by the city, if it was opened up by the city so as to meet all the exigencies of safe and convenient travel, such acts by the city would be sufficient to indicate acceptance of all that was dedicated.

[6] 6. Over the defendant's objection the court allowed in evidence a deed to J. W. Leeth from W. C. Swain, the defendant's predecessor in title, recorded prior to the defendant's purchase, wherein the land conveyed was bounded as follows: Beginning at the old hand mill branch at the foot of Gill street, and running 280 yards toward the residence of W. C. Swain, down a street 80 feet wide to be given and appropriated to the town of Hazelhurst by W. C. Swain, bounding said 12 acres on the south, etc. This deed was admissible as a declaration of the dedicatory of his intention to donate the street to the town. The deed from Leeth to Miles was inadmissible, being res inter alios acta.

[7] 7. The court allowed testimony to the effect that a witness and the defendant, just prior to the filing of the suit, measured the street and staked it off. While this testimony bore no relation to the act of dedication, its admission was not harmful to the defendant.

[8] 8. Complaint is made of a preliminary instruction by the court that "most of the evidence only indirectly bears upon the issues in this case." This remark of the court was inapt. Its tendency was to confuse the jury as to what evidence bore directly on the case, and that which indirectly illustrated the issue.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 245*)—RENT—LIEN.

Where a landlord sold to a tenant certain mules and wagons and supplies in the month of November, 1909, the tenant giving his notes for the purchase price of such articles, and the articles were furnished to the tenant for the purpose of making a crop upon the lands rented to him by the landlord for and during the year 1910, the landlord had a lien upon the crops raised by the tenant during the year 1910, under the provisions of section 3348 of the Code, and the lien could be enforced in the manner provided in section 3366 of the Code.

2. FORECLOSURE OF LANDLORD'S LIEN—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the jury to find that the tenant, the plaintiff in error here, was a resident of Walton county at the time of the foreclosure of the landlord's lien in that county.

Grounds of the motion for a new trial, not argued in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, are treated as abandoned.

JORDAN v. J. A. CALLAWAY & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 241*)—JUDGMENT ON BOND.

Judgment against the sureties on a bond to dissolve an injunction and receivership cannot be entered in the main case, as in appeal cases, by virtue of Civil Code, § 3550, except where the bond is conditioned for the payment of the eventual condemnation money. Where the bond is conditioned otherwise than for the eventual condemnation money, and especially where the verdict fails to fix liability according to the terms of the bond, the remedy is by an independent action on the bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 544-552; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 489*)—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where the court is without authority to enter up a judgment against a surety on a bond in the main case, the judgment is to be treated as void, and not as merely erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 924, 925; Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 415*)—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

A party against whom a void judgment exists may bring an equitable petition to have such judgment canceled and set aside.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Action by J. A. Callaway & Co. against W. W. Washington. Judgment for plaintiffs against defendant and G. L. Jordan, surety on his bond, and Jordan brings error. Reversed.

Jas. K. Hines, of Atlanta, and E. C. Collins, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Burkhalter and Way & Burkhalter, all of Reidsville, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. J. A. Callaway & Co. filed a petition against W. W. Washington, alleging: The defendant and one Blount entered into a contract with them, wherein Callaway & Co. were to furnish to Washington and Blount the necessary funds to pay for turpentine timber then bought and boxed on the lands of J. L. Cowart, F. M. Williams, and others, to the amount of $492.28, and to pay the necessary pay rolls of Washington and Blount while chipping and otherwise working the timber for turpentine during that season; Washington and Blount agreeing to deliver to their turpentine still all the crude turpentine made by them that season, to be distilled by Callaway & Co. at $6.50 per barrel, the spirits to be shipped by them to the Savannah market, the net proceeds from the spirits and rosin to be applied to the cost of distillation and advances of every kind made by Callaway & Co., and the balance, if any, turned over to Washington and Blount. By mutual consent Blount was discharged from the contract, and Washington assumed all his obligations. Washington was indebted to Callaway & Co. under this contract $457.13, besides interest, as appeared by an attached bill of particulars. Washington agreed that all existing leases, and such as he might subsequently acquire, should be assigned to Callaway & Co. as security for the money and advances made by them; and agreeably to this arrangement all leases were assigned to Callaway & Co., except one from J. L. Cowart to 600 acres of land. Washington refused to transfer this lease, or to pay to Callaway & Co. the amounts advanced by them to pay for the lease; but, on the contrary, he was going forward gathering the gum from the trees for the purpose of using the same independently of his contract, and he was insolvent. They prayed that Washington be enjoined from removing any of the crude gum from the trees covered by any of the turpentine leases mentioned, that a receiver be appointed to take charge of his turpentine business, and that they have judgment against him for the amount of their account. The court granted a temporary injunction and appointed a receiver, and afterwards dissolved the injunction and dismissed the receiver, upon the defendant filing with the clerk of the superior court a bond, with good security, in the sum of $750, "conditioned to pay the plaintiffs the net proceeds of all turpentine products derived, between this date and the final determination of this cause, from the lands covered by the J. L. Cowart lease, as described in said original petition, provided the jury trying said case shall find that the plaintiffs are entitled to the same and in favor of the injunction." The defendant gave bond, with G. L. Jordan as security, pursuant to this order. Subsequently the case came on to be tried, and the following verdict was rendered: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs to the amount of $392.09." Upon this verdict a judgment was entered against the defendant W. W. Washington, and against G. L. Jordan as security on the injunction bond. A fi. fa. issued and was levied upon the property of the surety, who filed a petition to declare the judgment null and void, on the grounds that it was unauthorized by the verdict; that he did not contract to become liable to pay any judgment that might be rendered against Washington in the case, but only for such gum as they might recover from the Cowart lands, and such sums as he received from the receiver, in the event the jury trying the case should find the plaintiffs were entitled to the same and in favor of the injunction; and that there was no finding in the case that the plaintiffs were entitled to the gum or an injunction, but merely a general verdict that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover a stated sum on the account sued on. A demurrer to the petition was filed, on the grounds that no cause of action was set out; that the surety had his day in court, and could not afterward be heard; that the bond bound him to pay the amount for which Callaway & Co. obtained judgment against Washington; and that, under the statutes in such cases made and provided, judgment was properly entered up against him on the injunction bond, which judgment had not been excepted to. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and exception is taken to this judgment.

[1] 1. Prior to the act of 1893 (Civil Code, § 3550), it was necessary to bring an independent suit on all bonds given in an equitable proceeding. Since that enactment, when a bond has been made by the losing party in an equitable proceeding, conditioned to pay the eventual condemnation money in that action, it shall not be necessary to bring suit on the bond, but judgment may be entered thereon in the main case as in appeal cases. This enactment is applicable only to cases where a bond has been given by the losing party, conditioned to pay the eventual condemnation money in the action; and if the bond is otherwise conditioned, the obligee is remitted to an independent action for redress. Offerman, etc., R. Co. v. Waycross R. Co., 112 Ga. 611, 37 S. E. 871. The eventual condemnation money secured by an injunction bond is the amount ultimately fixed and settled by the judgment or decree of the court in the case. Lockwood v. Safold, 1 Ga. 72. The bond given in this case was not for the eventual condemnation money. It was not a bond obligating the security for the amount to be recovered on the trial of the case. It was a bond conditioned to pay the plaintiffs the amount of the net proceeds derived from the turpentine privileges upon said tract of land between the date of the order, and that of the final hearing, as well as the amount in the hands of the receiver directed by said order to be delivered to the defendant, in the event the jury trying the case should find the plaintiffs were entitled to the same and in favor of the injunction. It was executed pursuant to an order dissolving an injunction and dismissing the receiver, upon the execution of a bond in the sum of $750, "conditioned to pay the plaintiffs the net proceeds of all turpentine products derived, between this date and the final determination of this cause, from the lands covered by the J. L. Cowart lease, as described in said original petition, provided the jury trying the case shall find that the plaintiffs are entitled to the same and in favor of the injunction." The verdict of the jury was for "the plaintiffs to the amount of $392.09." Verdicts are to be construed in connection with the pleadings in the case. The suit was to recover certain sums alleged to be due upon an attached bill of particulars, and the prayer for injunction and receiver was ancillary to this relief; the plaintiffs contending that by reason of the special facts of the case, and the insolvency of the defendant, they were entitled to have the crude turpentine produced from the premises leased from J. L. Cowart impounded for the purpose of appropriating so much thereof as might be necessary to the satisfaction of the judgment. It is clear from the general scope of the pleadings that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover from the security on the bond any sum, except that which was established in the trial as being the net proceeds derived from the turpentine privileges upon the Cowart tract of land. Even if in this particular proceeding a judgment could have been entered upon the bond, it was a prerequisite that there be a finding fixing the surety's liability according to the condition in his bond. The verdict was general, and did not cover this issue. A judgment cannot be entered up upon a verdict, except as authorized by the verdict.

[2] 2. It is said that the remedy of the surety was by direct exception to the decree as entered. If the bond had been for the eventual condemnation money, so as to have authorized judgment to have been entered against the surety, and the judgment as entered was merely erroneous, the remedy of the surety to avail himself of any error in the judgment would have been by direct exceptions to it. Booth v. Mohr, 125 Ga. 472, 54 S. E. 147. But as we have already pointed out, the bond given in this case was not a bond for the eventual condemnation money, which would authorize a judgment to be entered upon it in the main case as a result of the verdict, nor was there any verdict to support a judgment against the surety. The judgment against the surety is not merely erroneous; it is void.

[3] 3. In his equitable petition the security prays that the judgment entered against him be declared null and void. A party against whom a void judgment exists has a right to have it set aside, and thus clear away any cloud that it may cast upon his right to alienate his property so long as it remains of record against him. Crane v. Barry, 47 Ga. 476. One of the jurisdictional grounds of equity is to cancel writings which cast a cloud over the complainant's title.

FINLEYSON v. INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO. OF AMERICA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 176*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—RENEWAL NOTE.

Where, in 1907, a promissory note was given in renewal of an original note which had been executed in 1903 for the purchase price of a mowing machine and rake, and in the latter note it was recited that, "in consideration of this renewal contract and the extension of time hereby given, it is agreed that said payee has fully kept and made good all its representations, warranties, and obligations in the sale of said machine," a recovery on such note could not be prevented, or the amount thereof reduced, on the ground that when the sale was made and the original note given the agent of the plaintiff agreed that the plaintiff would open an agency for supplies at a named place where the purchaser could conveniently get supplies and repairs for the mower; that this furnished a consideration for the note, and that the seller had not complied with such agreement. Accordingly in a suit on such note it was not error, as against such a defense, to direct a verdict for the principal and interest specified on the face of the note. American Car Co. v. Atlanta Street Ry. Co., 100 Ga. 254, 28 S. E. 40; Atlanta Street Ry. Co. v. American Car Co., 103 Ga. 254, 29 S. E. 925; Atlanta Consolidated Bottling Co. v. Hutchinson, 109 Ga. 550, 35 S. 2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 537*)—ACTIONS—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Where a promissory note, in addition to principal and interest, provided for the payment of "reasonable attorney's fees in collecting by suit or otherwise," the presiding judge was not authorized to direct a verdict for a certain amount as attorney's fees because of the testimony of a member of the bar that such amount would be reasonable, although there was no conflicting evidence on the subject. Baker v. Richmond City Mill Works, 105 Ga. 225, 31 S. E. 426; Jennings v. Stripling, 127 Ga. 785, 56 S. E. 1026; Proctor v. Crooker, 129 Ga. 732, 59 S. E. 781; McCarthy v. Lazarus, 137 Ga. 282, 73 S. E. 493.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 714, 1140*)—COSTS (§ 233*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—AFFIRMANCE ON CONDITION—RECORD—COSTS ON APPEAL.

Direction is given that if, within 20 days from the filing of the remittitur in the office of the clerk of the superior court, the defendant in error will write off from the verdict the amount of attorney's fees included therein, the judgment will stand affirmed; otherwise, it will be reversed and a new trial granted.

(a) It is stated in the brief of counsel for defendant in error that he has written off the recovery of attorney's fees; but there is nothing in the record or bill of exceptions to show that this has been done, and this court is bound to act upon what appears from the record and bill of exceptions.

(b) As the plaintiff in error has obtained a material modification of the judgment which was rendered against him in the trial court, judgment is rendered in his favor for the costs of bringing the case to this court and the costs in this court.

STARNES v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1023*)—APPEAL—FINAL DECISION—DECLARATION OF MISTRIAL.

Under section 6138 of the Civil Code of 1910, "no cause shall be carried to the Supreme Court upon any bill of exceptions, so long as the same is pending in the court below, unless the decision or judgment complained of, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error, would have been a final disposition of the cause, or final as to some material party thereto." The mere passing of an order declaring a mistrial in a capital case in the absence of the defendant terminates the trial, but is not a final decision in the cause, which is still left pending for trial under the indictment. Neither is it a ruling upon any motion or question raised by the plaintiff in error which would have been a final disposition of the cause if it had been rendered as contended for by him. Hence a bill of exceptions complaining only of the granting of an order declaring a mistrial in the absence of the defendant is prematurely brought, and will be dismissed on motion. Oliveros v. State, 118 Ga. 776, 45 S. E. 596.

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 176*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—PAYMENT OF PRICE—ABATEMENT.

A bond for title contained the usual formal parts and the recital that "the condition of the obligation is such that whereas, the above bound [obligor] has this day agreed to sell the said [obligee] a certain tract or parcel of land lying and being in the 1,397th and 502d

Williams place, for the sum of $3,031.25, and has given his promissory notes dated September 4, 1906, and due as follows:” the dates upon which the notes fell due being set forth. In defense to a suit on the notes, the obligee in the bond pleaded that there was a deficiency in the acreage, and that the land described by boundaries contained 18½ acres less than had been represented by the agent of the vendor that it contained, and asked a proportional abatement of the purchase price represented by the promissory notes sued on. The plaintiff, the administrator of the obligor named in the bond for title, contended that the sale of the land was by the tract, and not by the acre. Held, construing the entire instrument, that the sale was by the acre, and, that being true, the defendant was entitled to a proportional abatement of the purchase price.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by T. A. Fowler, administrator, against E. V. Wood. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

I. L. Oakes, of Lawrenceville, for plaintiff in error. O. A. Nix, of Lawrenceville, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The plaintiff in error, Fowler, administrator upon the estate of Williams, brought suit upon certain promissory notes against Wood, the defendant in error. The defendant in his plea admitted the execution of the notes, their delivery to the plaintiff, and the ownership of the latter, but contended, among other defenses, that the notes were given for the purchase price of a certain tract or parcel of land; that at the time of the execution of the notes a bond was delivered to him, conditioned to make title to the land upon the payment of the notes. The bond for title was as follows, omitting the formal parts and the recital of the penal sum: “The condition of the obligation is such that whereas, the above bound W. C. Williams has this day agreed to sell the said E. V. Wood a certain tract or parcel of land lying and being in the 1,397th and 562d dist. G. M., and bounded as follows: Adjoining lands of Mrs. S. E. Cain, A. J. Crane, J. W. Roebuck, Isaac Duncan, J. C. Pool, G. W. Martin, J. S. Hardy, G. W. Hardy, Mrs. Holman—containing 242½ acres, at $12.50 an acre, known as the W. C. Williams place, for the sum of $3,031.25, and has given his promissory notes dated September 4, 1906, and due as follows [reciting the dates of each note]: Now, if the said E. V. Wood shall well and truly pay the said several sums of money at the time or times specified, then the said W. C. Williams is bound to execute to the said E. V. Wood or assigns a good and sufficient title to the aforesaid tract of land; but on failure of the said E. V. Wood to pay the aforesaid sums of money, or either of them, at times specified, then the obligation to be void and of no effect.” Defendant alleged that upon a survey of the land described it was found to contain 223½ acres, or about 18½ acres less than it had been represented to contain, and insisted that he was entitled to a proportional abatement of the purchase price. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff’s motion for a new trial was overruled.

[1] 1. Construing the entire instrument together, we are of the opinion that the bond for title set out in the statement of facts shows a sale of land by the acre; and, that being true, the defendant was entitled to an abatement of the purchase price proportionally to the deficiency in acreage.

[2] 2. Exception is taken to the following charge of the court: “But at last, considering the whole case, all that occurred, the burden rests upon the plaintiff to satisfy you of his right to recover in the case.” Immediately preceding this instruction the court had charged the jury as follows: “Under his plea the defendant admitted what is known as a prima facie case. He assumes the burden of establishing his right to prevail on account of the allegations set up in his plea; that is to say, he admitted the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the notes and had a right to recover upon them, unless he could show he did not have the right. When he did that, at that point the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this case before any evidence was introduced; then the plaintiff, Fowler, was entitled to recover the full amount appearing to be sued upon these notes, principal, interest, and attorney’s fees. At that point defendant takes up the issue and undertakes to show, as he contends, that he is not entitled to recover that amount for the reasons stated to you awhile ago and set forth in his plea. Then he assumes the burden at that point to establish his contention. The burden of proof in the beginning was upon the plaintiff, and when he made this admission it was shifted to the defendant.”

We do not think this charge was error. While the defendant in the case, by admitting the execution, delivery, and ownership of the notes, had shown a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, and had thereby assumed the burden of proof and obtained the right to open and conclude, as the case developed under the evidence the burden finally rested upon the plaintiff “to satisfy the jury,” in the language of the court’s charge, "of his right to recover in the case." When the bond for title was introduced in evidence by the defendant, it showed upon its face, as we have ruled above, that the sale of the land was by the acre, and that the defendant was entitled to an abatement of the purchase price proportionally to the deficiency in acreage. The plaintiff contended that the words "at $12.50 an acre" were not in the bond for title when it was delivered to the defendant, the obligee in the bond. The defendant insisted that those words were in the bond. The plaintiff introduced evidence to show that the bond had been altered by the insertion of this very material stipulation. It not appearing from the record that the bond bore internal evidence of any alteration, prima facie upon its production the case stood in favor of the defendant. Whether the bond had been changed or not in the respect indicated was the controlling question in the case under the evidence, and the right of the plaintiff to recover depended upon his showing that the words "at $12.50 an acre" had been inserted in the bond after its delivery to the defendant. This was the vital, controlling issue upon which the plaintiff's case rested, and as to this controlling question the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff. So, in the language of the court's charge, "at last, considering the whole case, all that occurred, the burden rested upon the plaintiff to satisfy the jury of his right to recover in the case."

The court submitted to the jury for their determination the question as to whether the sale of the land was by the tract or by the acre. This affords the plaintiff in error no ground of complaint, as the court was authorized to instruct the jury, under the bond for title as it appeared to be written, that the sale was by the acre.

WEBB v. NEWSOM, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 55*) — AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—REFUSAL TO ACCEPT.

Mandamus will not lie as a remedy to compel a sheriff to accept an affidavit of illegality filed to an execution issued by the Comptroller General against a tax collector in default and his bondsmen, and which was levied on the property of one of the alleged bondsmen, who avers in his affidavit of illegality that he did not sign the tax collector's bond, or authorize any one else to do so for him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 109-112; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. EXECUTION (§§ 166, 171*)—REMEDY—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY.

In such case an equitable petition for injunction is an available remedy, when filed by a bondsman.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 485, 486, 497-518; Dec. Dig. §§ 166, 171.*]

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by J. C. Webb for writ of mandamus against J. B. Newsom, Sheriff. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Shipp & Kline, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error. Bennet, Long & Harrold, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The Comptroller General issued a fi. fa. against Gibson, as the tax collector of Brooks county, and the sureties on his bond, for the sum of $5,596.33. This execution was levied by the sheriff of Brooks county on the property of J. C. Webb, one of the alleged sureties on the collector's bond. Webb tendered an affidavit of illegality to the sheriff, wherein he alleged, among other things, that he did not sign the bond of the tax collector, or authorize any one else to sign his name thereto. This affidavit was refused by the sheriff, who continued to advertise Webb's property for sale. Before the date of the sale of the property Webb presented a petition for mandamus to the judge of the superior court of the circuit in which the parties resided, praying that the sheriff be required to accept the illegality and file the same with the clerk of the superior court of Brooks county for trial. The judge to whom the petition was presented denied the writ as prayed for, on the sole ground that "illegality was not and is not the remedy of the plaintiff." To this judgment the plaintiff excepts, and brings his case to this court by bill of exceptions for review.

[1] 1. The only question to be decided is whether the court erred in denying the writ of mandamus, and in holding that affidavit of illegality was not the proper remedy of the plaintiff. We think the court was correct in so holding. The earlier decisions of this court, based upon Tax Act 1804 (Cobb's Digest, p. 1052) § 24, were to the effect that an affidavit of illegality would not lie to an execution proceeding against a defaulting tax collector and his sureties. And it was held that that part of the act of 1804 which prohibits an affidavit of illegality from being entertained by the courts was constitutional. Eve v. State, 21 Ga. 50, 59. See, also, Perkins v. State, 101 Ga. 291, 28 S. E. 840. By the act of 1823 the duty of issuing executions was changed from the Treasurer to the Comptroller General. Cobb's Digest, p. 1025. The general rule was stated, in some of the earlier decisions, to be that there could be no judicial interference hindering or delaying the state in the collection of taxes due it. See Decker v. McGowan, 59 Ga. 805; Brown v. Barnes, 99 Ga. 4, 28 S. E. 86; Bohler v. Schneider, 49 Ga. 201. It was said, in some decisions, that the parties complaining must pay the taxes and pursue their remedy, either against the tax collector individually, or the taxpayer could pay to "the government what it demanded of him, at the time of the demand, as he will be certain of getting it back, with interest, after more or less of delay." Just how is not stated. This last view was expressed in Eve v. State, 21 Ga. 59. See, also, Cody v. Lennard, 45 Ga. 85, 88; Vanover v. Justices, 27 Ga. 354, 357; Yancey v. Manchester Mfg. Co., 33 Ga. 622.

Prior to the act of 1910, following the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Wright, Compt. Gen., 207 U. S. 127, 28 Sup. Ct. 47, 52 L. Ed. 134, 12 Ann. Cas. 463, and Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. Wright, Compt. Gen., 207 U. S. 127, 28 Sup. Ct. 47, 52 L. Ed. 134, 12 Ann. Cas. 463, the declared policy of the state was that there should be no replevin, or judicial interference, in any levy or distress for taxes due under the Code, but the party injured was left "to his proper remedy in any court of law having jurisdiction thereof." 1 Civil Code 1895, § 903, and citations. In the cases just cited, on page 131 of 207 U. S., on page 48 of 28 Sup. Ct. (52 L. Ed. 134, 12 Ann. Cas. 463), it was said: "Actions were begun by the plaintiffs in error, in the superior court of Fulton county, to enjoin the enforcement of executions in the hands of the sheriff, issued for taxes assessed by the Comptroller General on the shares of the corporate stock of the Western Railway of Alabama, an Alabama corporation, which stock was alleged to be held and owned by the plaintiffs in error. The superior court refused to award an injunction. Upon writs of error the Supreme Court affirmed the judgments of the court below. 124 Ga. 596, 53 S. E. 251; 124 Ga. 630, 53 S. E. 207. The cases were remitted to the superior court of Fulton county, and that court rendered final decrees in favor of the defendants below, holding the tax executions to be lawful. The cases were again taken to the Supreme Court of Georgia and there affirmed. 125 Ga. 589, 54 S. E. 52; 125 Ga. 617, 54 S. E. 64." And, after an elaborate discussion of the tax laws of Georgia, the decision of this court, holding that an injunction would not lie in those cases, was reversed, on the ground that the tax system of this state did not afford due process of law under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Subsequently to the decision last cited, the Legislature of this state amended the law relative to the method of assessing and collecting taxes. Acts 1910, p. 22. By the fourth section of that act it is provided that, "should the taxpayer desire to contest the taxability of said property under this section, he may do so by petition in equity in the superior court of the county where said property is assessed." Thus it will be seen that the policy adopted by the Legislature of the state as to the method of contesting the "taxability of said property" is by "petition in equity in the superior court of the county where the property is assessed."

No constitutional question was raised by the earlier decisions, which were rendered prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Nor was the kind of remedy to be used decided, but merely the right to test the enforcement of the execution at all. The cases where this court held that illegality would not lie would probably have applied to any other remedy under the act of 1904. But the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Wright Cases, supra, reversing this court, held that a taxpayer must have a hearing and due process of law. And if this is true as to the taxpayer, how much more must it hold good as to a security on a tax collector's bond, who avers that he never signed the bond at all, or authorized any one to sign it for him. In other words, that he is not even surety on the bond and that no liability attaches to him.

What, then, is the remedy in such a case? For, for every right there must be a remedy. Our Civil Code 1910, §§ 1034-1041, provides that any railroad company, desiring to resist the collection of the tax provided for in the preceding sections, may resist its collection by filing an affidavit of illegality to the execution issued by the Comptroller General, which shall be returnable to the superior court of Fulton county, to be determined as other illegalities. This is the only case where provision is made for the return of illegality in such cases, so far as we know, except by municipal charter in some instances. Under the law the Comptroller General issues the tax fi. fa., but no provision is made generally, or otherwise, for the return of an illegality to the Comptroller General, who has no authority to try it. The general rule is that an illegality must be returned to the court from which the fi. fa. issues. Civil Code 1910, § 5307. But the Comptroller General is not a court, and no express authority has been conferred on him by the Legislature to hear and determine such cases. If the sheriff of Brooks county had taken the illegality tendered him in this case, where would he have returned it? No place has been fixed by law for returning it, and he properly declined to take it. Mandamus, therefore, would not lie to compel the sheriff to take the affidavit of illegality.

[2] 2. What, then, is the remedy in a case like the present? Reasoning by analogy from former decisions of this court, and from the act of the Legislature of 1910, supra, in the case of the taxpayer, where petition to a court of equity and injunction is the declared remedy, we hold that injunction is a proper remedy in a case like the present. City of Atlanta v. Jacobs, 125 Ga. 528, 54 S. E. 534. In the older cases, holding that illegality would not lie, the form of the remedy was not attacked merely, but the right to interfere at all. Neither did the cases holding that injunction was a remedy establish the fact that resort to a court of equity was the exclusive remedy; but they recognize that it is a remedy, and the Legislature, following the decision in the Wright Cases, supra, provided for an equitable proceeding by a taxpayer. It is true that none of the acts or decisions apply in terms to the bondsmen of tax collectors, but only to taxpayers and tax collectors; but, analogizing from the act of 1910, we think the better view is that the remedy is by equitable petition and injunction. Instances may be conceived where the only adequate relief would be in a court of equity. This is an available remedy, and mandamus to compel the sheriff to take an affidavit of illegality will not lie.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CRUMM v. J. P. ALLEN & CO.
(No. 3,932.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 16, 1912.
On Motion for Rehearing, May 27, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 524*)—ACTION BEFORE A JUSTICE—APPEAL—WHO MAY ENTER.

Any officer or agent of a corporation against whom a suit has been brought in a justice's court, who appears and manages the case in behalf of the corporation, may enter an appeal for the corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2131-2137; Dec. Dig. § 524.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 577*)—EVIDENCE AT FORMER TRIAL—"INACCESSIBLE"—WITNESS.

A party to a pending case is not, though beyond the jurisdiction of the court when the case is tried, "inaccessible," within the meaning of section 5773 of the Civil Code of 1910, so as to authorize the introduction of his testimony delivered on a former trial of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2406; Dec. Dig. § 577.*]

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 111*)—TRIAL—NONSUIT.

Where a case has been called for trial in a justice's court, and the attorney for the plaintiff announces ready, participates in the selection of a jury, and offers evidence in behalf of his client, the justice of the peace is not authorized to grant a nonsuit, though the plaintiff fails to make out his case; and the case should be disposed of by a verdict of the jury in the defendant's favor.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. I. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by C. V. Crumm against J. P. Allen & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Lowndes Calhoun, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. George Gordon, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The certiorari was overruled. It appears from the petition, which is verified by the magistrate's answer, that the defendant, a corporation, was sued in a justice's court upon an open account. A plea was filed by the defendant, denying indebtedness, and this plea was verified by the oath of J. P. Allen, who swore that he was authorized to file the plea, and was familiar with the facts therein stated. The judgment of the magistrate was in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant entered an appeal to a jury in the justice's court. The appeal and bond were signed, "J. P. Allen Company, per J. P. Allen, Secretary." When the case was called for trial on the appeal, a motion was made to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that the appeal and bond had not been executed by an authorized officer of the corporation. The justice postponed decision on this motion, and allowed the defendant to file at the next term of the court a written ratification of the act of J. P. Allen in entering the appeal, which ratification was duly executed by the corporation, and under its seal. The motion to dismiss the appeal was overruled. The plaintiff announced ready for trial, and a jury was stricken. The attorney for the plaintiff testified that she was absent in the city of New York, and he offered to prove the testimony of the plaintiff delivered on a previous trial of the case. The court refused to permit this, and, the plaintiff offering no other evidence, the defendant was allowed to take a verdict.

1. Section 5002 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that "an appeal may be entered by the plaintiff or defendant in person, or by his attorney at law or in fact." Section 5005 provides that, "in case of corporations, the appeal may be entered by the president or any agent thereof managing the case, or by the attorney of record." Counsel for the plaintiff in error rely upon King Hardware Co. v. Bowden, 113 Ga. 924, 39 S. E. 404, to sustain the proposition that a secretary and treasurer of a corporation is not, by virtue of his office, clothed with the authority to sign an appeal bond and enter an appeal in behalf of the corporation. It may be conceded that the decision relied on sustains the position taken by counsel; and that the appeal in the present case could not on its face be said to have been entered by an authorized agent of the defendant. A corporation can, of course, act only through an agent; and any officer duly authorized so to do by the corporation may enter an appeal in its behalf. If, therefore, a person undertakes to enter an appeal in behalf of a corporation, it should appear that he has been clothed with authority to act for the corporation and bind it by the appeal so entered. But section 5005 of the Civil Code of 1910 expressly provides that any officer of the corporation managing the case may enter the appeal. We do not think it absolutely essential that the appeal itself should recite that the person acting for the corporation was the agent managing the case. The appeal is valid if it appears from the record in the case, and if the court knows as a matter of fact, that the person thus undertaking to bind the corporation by the appeal is its agent managing the case. The record shows that J. P. Allen filed the plea in behalf of the corporation, and made oath to the defense that he was authorized to file the plea, and was familiar with the facts therein stated, and that these statements were true. It is therefore apparent that Allen was the agent of the corporation managing the case, and, as such, he had authority to enter the appeal. This being so, no ratification of such authority was necessary; and it is immaterial whether the ratification filed in this case would have been sufficient if the agent entering the appeal had been undertaking to act as an attorney in fact under the provisions of section 5002 of the Civil Code of 1910.

[2] 2. Error is assigned upon the refusal of the justice of the peace to permit proof of the testimony of the plaintiff in a former trial of the case. The Civil Code of 1910, § 5773, provides: "The testimony of a witness, since deceased, or disqualified, or inaccessible for any cause, given under oath on a former trial, upon substantially the same issue and between substantially the same parties, may be proved by any one who heard it, and who professes to remember the substance of the entire testimony as to the particular matter about which he testifies." Counsel raises the rather novel point that his client was inaccessible, within the meaning of this section of the Code, so as to authorize the admission of her testimony on a former trial; but we do not think the case comes within either the letter or the spirit of the statute. The whole purpose of the statute was to enable a party to obtain the benefit of the testimony on a former trial of an absent witness, inaccessible to the court, without the consent or procurement of the party. If a party should procure the absence of a witness beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or do anything to bring about such absence, he certainly would not be permitted to use the former testimony of the witness. The statute means that the witness whose testimony is sought is inaccessible, both to the party desiring his testimony and to the court. Certainly it could not be said that a party could ever be inaccessible to himself. He is presumed to know when his case will be called for trial; and it is his duty to be present if he desires to offer himself as a witness, or to testify by depositions in support of his claim. It has frequently been held that, while secondary evidence of the contents of a writing is admissible when the writing is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, yet that, where the writing is in the possession of a party to the case, it cannot be said to be beyond the jurisdiction until it has been determined by notice to produce that the writing is not in the power, custody, or control of such party; for, where a writing is in the possession of one of the parties to the case, it cannot be said to be inaccessible. Cutter-Tower Co. v. Clements, 5 Ga. App. 291, 63 S. E. 58. If a party to a pending case should die, evidence of his testimony on a former trial of the case would be admissible; but it can never be said that a party in life is so inaccessible, within the meaning of the statute, as to authorize proof of his testimony offered on a former trial of the case.

[3] 3. The only other point arises upon the contention that the justice should have dismissed the action or granted a nonsuit; and that he had no right to permit a verdict to be returned in favor of the defendant. Counsel rely upon Bateman v. Smith Gin Co., 98 Ga. 219, 25 S. E. 422, to support this contention. In that case the plaintiff failed to appear; and the justice permitted counsel for the defendant to impanel a jury and take a verdict in his favor. It appears in the present case that counsel for the plaintiff were present in court when the case was called, announced ready for trial, and joined with the defendant's counsel in the selection of a jury. It further appears that the plaintiff did offer evidence, because her counsel took the stand in her behalf and testified that she was absent in New York. The mere fact that he was not allowed to testify further what the plaintiff had sworn to on a former trial is immaterial. The case was not different from any other, where the plaintiff has offered evidence and failed to make out the case. The justice of the peace had no right to award a nonsuit, and had very little, if any, control over the case at all. The jury stood in the place of the magistrate, were judges of both the law and the facts; and, under the circumstances, the only proper disposition that could have been made of the case was by a verdict in the defendant's favor. See Favors v. Johnson, 79 Ga. 553, 4 S. E. 425.

Judgment affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error has filed a motion for rehearing, upon the ground that this court has misapprehended the scope and effect of the ruling of the Supreme Court in the case of King Hardware Co. v. Bowden, cited in the opinion. A decision of the Supreme Court is binding upon this court as a precedent only in so far as the ruling therein announced may have been authorized by the facts of the case under consideration. In the Bowden Case, it appears that the attorney for the King Hardware Company stated in his place that C. L. King, who signed the appeal bond, was the agent of the King Hardware Company managing the case. This was the only evidence before the court that King was the agent of the company managing the case; and the only question really presented to the Supreme Court for decision was whether this statement of counsel was sufficient to show that King had authority to enter the appeal in behalf of the King Hardware Company. We do not feel bound to extend the doctrine of that decision further than the facts of the case demand. It is true that the Supreme Court in the course of the opinion, said that the bond should on its face disclose that it was executed by some person authorized to sign thereto the appellant's name; but, as we have shown, this statement of the court was obiter, and we think the ruling which we have heretofore announced is to the effect that, where the record itself discloses that the person who signed the appeal bond in behalf of the appellant corporation was in fact its agent managing the case, this would be sufficient to save the appeal.

Moreover, the Supreme Court held directly, in Sanders v. Mathewson, 121 Ga. 302, 48 S. E. 946, that, to render the appeal valid, it was not necessary that the appellant should sign the appeal bond at all. In the course of the opinion, Mr. Justice Lamar said that, in order to show that the appellant assented to the appeal, good practice would suggest that he or his authorized attorney should execute the bond; and the case of King Hardware Company v. Bowden is cited in support of this proposition. But, nevertheless, the court held that, there being no statute in this state requiring the appellant to sign the bond, his failure to do so would not work the dismissal of the appeal, if the proper security were given. As was said by the learned justice who wrote the opinion: "Here the bond recites that the appeal was by the appellant, and that she tendered the security. Inasmuch as there has already been a judgment against her, and she is bound thereby, and will likewise be bound for the eventual condemnation money, in case another judgment is recovered against her on the appeal, it is a needless thing for the appellant to sign the appeal bond. The appellee requires nothing more from him, except security; and that is furnished when the surety signs the bond."

The copy bond appearing in the record of the present case does not disclose that it was signed by the surety; but, inasmuch as no point is made on this by the plaintiff in error, and no motion was made to dismiss the appeal for this reason, we assume that the omission of the name of the security was a clerical error in the copy, in view of the fact that the bond recites on its face that the appellant, J. P. Allen & Co., comes and tenders a named person as security. Of course, it must appear in all cases that the appellant consented to the appeal. The present record discloses that Allen filed a defense for the corporation, verifying the truth thereof by his affidavit, and that afterwards the corporation filed in the justice's court a document, under the seal of corporation, stating that Allen did have authority to enter the appeal for the corporation, and that it ratified his act in so doing. It is true that this written ratification was not filed within the time required by section 5002, Civil Code 1910; but, nevertheless, it can be looked to for the purpose of showing that the corporation had in fact assented to the entering of the appeal by its officer and agent, Allen. We see no reason for changing the view expressed in the opinion originally filed in this case, and we adhere to the decision then made.

Motion denied.

O'CONNOR et al. v. UNITED STATES, for use of WM. M. BYRD & CO.

(No. 4,117.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 5, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 175*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—CERTIFIED COPY.

Whenever in a suit in one of the courts of this state the contents of a public document of the United States government become material as evidence, a duly certified copy of such document is the best evidence of which the nature of the case will admit; the original of the document being required, by the acts of Congress and the rules and regulations of that department of the United States government having custody of the paper, to be kept on file in the proper office of such department.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 561, 565, 568, 569; Dec. Dig. § 175.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 84*)—PROCEDURE—TIME FOR MAKING DEFENSE.

When suit is brought in a justice's court upon a written instrument other than an unconditional contract, it is not necessary that the defendant shall file his defense at the first term. The marking of the name of his counsel on the docket is sufficient appearance, and the defendant may make his formal defense at any time before final trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 266-278; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

3. UNITED STATES (§ 67*)—CONTRACTS—ACTIONS ON CONTRACTORS' BONDS.

This being an action upon the bond of a contractor with the United States government, conditioned to pay the claims of all laborers and materialmen which the contractor failed to settle, and there being no proof either of the breach of the bond or of the amount which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs were unauthorized, and should have been set aside on certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see United States, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 43*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—RECORD IN OTHER CAUSE.

In the trial of one case the court cannot take judicial notice of the record of another case even in the same court, without its formal introduction in evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by the United States of America, for the use of Wm. M. Byrd & Co., against E. J. O'Connor and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Goodrich contracted with the United States government through one of its quartermasters to erect a public building, and gave bond payable to the United States of America, with O'Connor and Schweers as sureties, in which it was stipulated that Goodrich should make full payment to all persons supplying him with labor or materials in the prosecution of the work. Wm. M. Byrd & Co. furnished certain materials to the contractor, and, upon his failure to pay for them, sued him in a justice's court, and obtained a judgment. Suit upon the bond was afterwards brought in the justice's court, in the name of the United States of America, for the use of Byrd & Co., to recover the amount of that judgment. No written defense was filed at the first term, but counsel for the defendants marked his name upon the docket. Several terms after the term to which the summons was made returnable the case was called for trial. At that time, pending the trial, defendants offered a written plea denying the allegations of indebtedness in the summons, and demanding proof thereof. The magistrate refused to allow this plea to be filed. The plaintiff offered in evidence a certified copy of the contract made with the government by Goodrich, and also certified copies of contracts relating to alterations to be made in the building, and to extensions of the time limit within which the work was to be completed, to which extensions the sureties on the bond had assented in writing. Objection was made to the introduction of all these papers, on the ground that the originals were the best evidence; their loss or destruction not having been shown. This evidence being admitted, no further evidence was introduced by the plaintiff, and no evidence of any character was introduced by the defendants. The justice of the peace thereupon entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants for $94.06, being the amount of the judgment which had theretofore been recovered against Goodrich. The defendants sued out a certiorari to the superior court, complaining of the judgment entered against them and of the rulings hereinbefore referred to, made during the progress of the trial. The certiorari was overruled, and defendants except.

POTTLE, J. [1] 1. The contract and the bond to secure its performance were made under the provisions of Act Cong. Aug. 13, 1894, c. 280, 28 Stat. 278 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2523). That section provides, among other things, that "any person or persons making application therefor, and furnishing affidavit to the department under the direction of which said work is being, or has been, prosecuted, that labor or materials for the prosecution of such work has been supplied by him or them, and payment for which has not been made, shall be furnished with a certified copy of said contract and bond, upon which said person or persons supplying such labor and materials shall have a right of action, and shall be authorized to bring suit in the name of the United States, for his or their use and benefit, against said contractor and sureties, and to prosecute the same to final judgment and execution." The right to sue was not restricted to courts of the United States, and hence it was competent for the plaintiffs to institute their action in any court of the state of competent jurisdiction. Mondou v. New York, New Haven & Hartford R. Co., 223 U. S. 1, 32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Wallace, 223 U. S. 481, 32 Sup. Ct. 205.† The copy contract and bond which were offered in evidence were certified under the seal of the War Department of the United States by the Quartermaster General of the army. His certificate recited that the contract and bond thereto attached were true copies of the records of the War Department in the office of the Quartermaster General. There was a further certificate, signed by the acting Secretary of War, that the person claiming to be such was the Quartermaster General of the army of the United States, and that full faith and credit should be given to his attestation as such. We fully agree with counsel for the plaintiff in error that Congress has no right to prescribe rules of evidence for the state courts. Small v. Slocumb, 112 Ga. 279, 37 S. E. 481, 53 L. R. A. 130, 81 Am. St. Rep. 50. All that the law of this state requires is that the best evidence which exists of the fact sought to be proved must be produced, unless its absence be satisfactorily accounted for. Civil Code 1910, § 5748.

[5] Secondary evidence is defined to be "such as from necessity in some cases is substituted for stronger and better proof." Civil Code 1910, § 5750. The originals of the contract and bond were on file in the office of the War Department at Washington, and were, therefore, inaccessible to the plaintiffs. The statutes of the United States require such records to be kept on file in the proper office of the government. When, in a suit in a court of this state, the contents of a public record of the United States government, on file in one of the departments, becomes material as evidence, the law of this state will not require a suitor to produce the original record, but a duly authenticated copy is admissible in evidence, not by virtue of any act of Congress undertaking to prescribe rules of evidence for the state courts, but under and in pursuance of the rules of evidence prescribed by the Legislature of this state. Such is the uniform current of authority. See 17 Cyc. 345-346, and cases cited. In Huckabee v. State, 7 Ga. App. 677, 67 S. E. 837, this court held that a certified copy of a record in the office of the collector of internal revenue of this state, showing the names of all persons who had paid special taxes in his district, was admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing that a particular person had paid the special tax as a retail liquor dealer. This decision was rendered before the passage of an act of the General Assembly of this state, making such a record admissible in evidence in the courts of this state, and was decided upon the general rules of evidence prevailing in this state at the date of the decision. This decision is really controlling upon the point presented in the present case. Moreover, it is to be observed that the act of Congress upon which the suit is predicated expressly provides that any person furnishing labor or materials shall have a right to bring suit upon a duly certified copy of the contract and bond. This would seem to be something more than a mere rule of evidence. The statute creates a right to sue upon the copy contract and bond. It does not say that, when suit is brought upon the original bond, a certified copy will be admissible in evidence, but it says that the suit itself may be brought upon a certified copy of the bond. Under the very terms of the act of Congress, a certified copy stands for all purposes in lieu of the original bond. There was no objection to the jurisdiction of the state court; and, having assumed jurisdiction, it was incumbent upon the Georgia court to give full effect to the act of Congress upon which the suit was predicated.

The further objection was made that the certificate to the contract and bond was not in the proper form, because it recited that the contract and bond attached were true copies of the records of the War Department in the office of the Quartermaster General, and that it did not appear from the evidence that these copies were true copies of the original contract and bond. The recital in the certificate that the papers attached were copies of the records of the War Department sufficiently indicates that they were copies of the originals in that department. It is not to be presumed that the War Department would have on file simply copies of a contract and bond executed with the United States government, but the presumption is that the records on file in that department were original documents, of which copies were attached to the certificate.

[2] 2-4. The magistrate was evidently of the opinion that the suit was upon an unconditional contract in writing, and that, therefore, it was necessary under section 4734 of the Civil Code of 1910 for the defendants to make their defense at the first term. See, also, G., F. & A. Ry. Co. v. Sheppard, 3 Ga. App. 241, 59 S. E. 717. In Smith v. Chivers, 6 Ga. App. 154, 64 S. E. 493, it was held that the defendant in a justice's court, when sued on an unconditional contract in writing, must appear and make his defense at the first term, either by pleading or by marking his name or that of his attorney on the docket. When the contract sued upon is not unconditional, there is no requirement that the defendant shall make his defense in the justice's court at the first term. He may do so at any time before final trial, even on the appeal. Lewis v. Nevils, 97 Ga. 744, 25 S. E. 409. The magistrate, therefore, erred in refusing to permit the defendants to enter their defense at the trial.

[3] It was also error to award judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs failed to make out their case. There was no proof of the breach of the bond, nor of the amount which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

[4] It is argued in the brief of counsel for the defendants in error that, the judgment against Goodrich having been rendered in the same court in which the suit on the bond was pending, the court had a right to take judicial cognizance of the existence of this judgment and of the amount which had been recovered thereon against Goodrich. This contention is effectually disposed of by the decision in the case of Glaze v. Bogle, 105 Ga. 295, 31 S. E. 169. In that case a plea of res adjudicata was filed, setting up a judgment in a former suit between the same parties in the same court. When the plea was read, the judge, without any evidence having been introduced, directed the jury to sustain the plea by finding a verdict for the defendants. The Supreme Court held: "In the trial of one case the court can no more take judicial notice of the record in another case in the same court, without its formal introduction in evidence, than if it were a record in another court; much less can this court take notice of the existence of a record not introduced in evidence in the court below." The judge of the superior court should have sustained the certiorari and remanded the case for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

NEELEY v. TOWN OF CAMERON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 22, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 495*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—AMOUNT OF DAMAGES.

In a personal injury case, an estimate of the damages is peculiarly for the jury from facts, data, and circumstances detailed by witnesses, and a mere opinion as to the amount of damages suffered is not admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2283; Dec. Dig. § 495.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of improper opinion evidence is not always ground for reversal. If a statement of inference, conclusion, or judgment is accompanied by the facts on which it is based, error in admitting it is usually harmless, since the jury can judge of its probative value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where the opinion of a witness, accompanied by the facts on which it is based, relates merely to the amount of damages suffered by personal injury, and it plainly appears that the jury acted on the facts and excluded the opinion in estimating the damages, the admission of the opinion will not call for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1031*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

Though it is always good practice directly to predicate an instruction relating to facts on the belief of the jury "from the evidence," harm from failure to do so will not be presumed and reversal based thereon when it does not appear that the jury were misled thereby, their verdict being clearly within the evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Marshall County.

Action by S. B. Neeley against the Town of Cameron. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McCamie & Clarke, of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error. Simpson & Showacre, of Moundville, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. The Town of Cameron seeks to reverse a judgment recovered against it by Neeley, who sued for damages arising from personal injury caused by a defective street.

At the trial, plaintiff, a witness in his own behalf, was asked to state how much he had been damaged by the injury. Over the objection of defendant, he was permitted to answer and stated that he thought he had been injured about five thousand dollars. Defendant insists that the testimony was inadmissible—that its admission calls for a reversal and new trial. Let us briefly consider the point.

[1] In a personal injury case, an estimate of the damages is peculiarly for the jury from facts, data, and circumstances detailed by witnesses, and a mere opinion as to the amount of damages suffered is not admissible. The court should have sustained the objection to the question. Plaintiff had testified to the jury as to the character of his injury, the severity and duration of his pain and suffering, the loss of time from his occupation, and the amount of his expenditure for attention and cure. It was for the jury, not for himself or other witnesses, to say how much he was injured. The case is different from those in which this court has sanctioned the admission of opinion evidence, such as Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 787, 53 Am. Rep. 121; Hurxthal v. Boom & Manf. Co., 65 W. Va. 346, 64 S. E. 355; Kunst v. City of Grafton, 67 W. Va. 20, 67 S. E. 74, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1201. The reasons given for the admission of opinion evidence in cases like those do not generally apply to proof of damages for personal injury. Besides, the element of pain and suffering, at the least, is a distinguishing feature. Human judgment is not so safely in accord in regard to that element of damages as it is in regard to such things as rental value, depreciation in land, and other commercial matters, which have a familiar standard in every community. The same is true as to a permanently crippled part of the body. At wide variance would different witnesses value the loss. Each one would assume his own standard since every day knowledge and experience, tending to a general standard, cannot guide him.

[2] But the admission of improper opinion evidence, is not always ground for reversal. "If a statement of inference, conclusion, or judgment is accompanied by an enumeration of facts on which it is based, the error, if any, is usually harmless; as the jury can estimate the true probative value of the statement. Thus, where a witness states, merely by way of summary or introduction, his mental induction or deduction from facts which he gives in detail, the error does not furnish cause for reversing a judgment." 17 Cyc. 60. In this connection it has been stated: "Harm cannot be predicated of an opinion which goes no further than the witness has just presented of his own knowledge in the nature of actual demonstration." Brown v. Town of Swanton, 69 Vt. 53, 37 Atl. 280.

[3] In the case before us, plaintiff had given to the jury an enumeration of the facts on which he based the opinion he gave. The jury were, therefore, enabled to say to what extent the opinion was worth consideration. Indeed it appears that the jury gave it no consideration; for, from the same facts and circumstances on which plaintiff said he was injured five thousand dollars, they found that he was injured only in the sum of four hundred and six dollars and twenty-five cents.

It must be observed that this improper opinion evidence related not to the establishment of the right to recover, but merely to the estimate of damages. The jury have said from much competent evidence that plaintiff had the right to recover. The error does not pertain to the finding of that right. It must be dealt with solely in relation to the finding as to the amount of damages. The unquestioned facts before the jury showed that he was entitled to the amount found, if entitled at all. Then, can we say that the error in admitting this opinion evidence harmed defendant so as to demand a reversal? Certainly not. It plainly appears that the jury acted on the facts—not on the opinion of plaintiff—that they found for plaintiff only such an amount as the facts warranted and not such an amount as he claimed in his testimony. It seems clear that if the improper evidence had been excluded, the result would have been the same. Since the jury found only a little over four hundred dollars which the facts justify, it is plain that they were controlled by the facts and gave no weight to the plaintiff's opinion in relation to five thousand dollars. Defendant was not prejudiced in point of fact by the improper ruling. Principles enunciated in Hall v. Lyons, 29 W. Va. 410, 1 S. E. 582, Taylor v. Railroad Co., 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. 29, and other cases, are applicable here.

[4] Defendant submits that one of the instructions given for plaintiff was improper because it did not directly say to the jury that they must be governed by the evidence. It is always good practice to predicate instructions on the belief of the jury "from the evidence." There is authority saying that instructions not so predicated are bad. But certainly it goes far in technicality to say that jurors must always be told to act on the evidence. Jurors know that they must rely on the evidence as a basis of their finding, even when not directly reminded in that particular. The following quotation is pertinent: "The objection made to the plain-tiff's prayers, that they do not say that 'the jury must find from the evidence' is hypercritical. All instructions are based on the evidence; and the jury are told that if they find, which means, without possible chance of misleading, that, if the evidence convinces them of the state of facts set out in 'the prayer, then they must find for the plaintiff.'" Blumhardt v. Rohr, 70 Md. 328, 17 Atl. 266. The instruction before us relates to the elements of damages that the jury may consider. Instructions similar to the one in question, with the omission of a clause predicating that the jury shall believe from the evidence, have been approved by this court. Riley v. Railroad Co., 27 W. Va. 151; Evans v. Huntington, 37 W. Va. 601, 16 S. E. 801. This instruction is one telling the jury that, if they find for the plaintiff, they may consider certain proper elements in estimating the damages and award him such sum as in their judgment will compensate him for the injuries which they find are the natural and direct result of the negligence complained of. It is argued that the jury were left free to depart from the evidence. We do not think so. The elements of damages mentioned in the instruction are merely those which from the evidence related to the case. Fairly construed, the instruction limited a finding under it to the evidence. Other instructions given in the case relating to finding on the main issue of negligence or no negligence were directly predicated on the belief of the jury "from the evidence." We shall not indulge the presumption that because of this one instruction the jury ran at large in considering their verdict. It is not reasonable to do so. Moreover, the finding of the jury is within the evidence. It clearly appears from the record that the jury did not go beyond the evidence in any particular—that they were not misled. If the instruction was erroneous, it affirmatively appears that it did no harm.

The other points submitted for reversal are not tenable. They involve no novel propositions of law and do not demand definite discussion. Except as to the harmless error which has been referred to, the case was fairly tried and submitted to the jury. The evidence sustains the verdict. The judgment must be affirmed.

BEMISS et al. v. COMMONWEALTH et al.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1234*)—LIABILITY ON BONDS—EXTENT OF LIABILITY.

Under Code 1904, § 3470, providing that the condition of supersedeas bonds shall be to perform and satisfy the judgment, etc., and to pay all actual damages incurred in consequence of the supersedeas, where a supersedeas was given to suspend the operation of a decree directing the delivery of bonds to a party, damages from the depreciation in the value of the bonds and the loss of the difference in interest between that borne by the bonds and that which could have been realized on the money invested therein are recoverable, although the supersedeas did not contain a provision for the payment of actual damages; the statute being read into every statutory supersedeas given since its passage.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1234*)—LIABILITY ON BONDS—EXTENT OF LIABILITY.

Where bonds directed by a decree to be delivered to a party depreciated in value during the time the operation of the decree was suspended by a supersedeas, the recovery on the supersedeas of the damages from the depreciation cannot be denied, on the ground that by delivery of the bonds after affirmance of the decree the party received all that he was entitled to under the decree.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action between the Commercial Trust Company, trustee, and the First National Bank. Judgment against Bemiss and another on the supersedeas bond executed by them, and they bring error. Affirmed.

Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for plaintiffs in error. George Bryan, for defendants in error.

KEITH, P. The chancery court of the city of Richmond, by its decree entered on the 17th of March, 1910, directed its clerk to deliver to the First National Bank of Richmond, Va., or to George Bryan, its attorney, Virginia century bonds of the face value of $25,500. From this decree an appeal was allowed upon the petition of the Commercial Trust Company, and a supersedeas bond in the penalty of $1,000 was required, which was executed by Bemiss and Williams, the plaintiffs in error, and bears date the 12th of May, 1910. The condition of this bond was that if the said petitioners "shall perform and satisfy the decree in case the same be affirmed, or said appeal and supersedeas be dismissed, and shall also pay all damages, costs, and fees which may be awarded against or incurred by them, then this obligation to be void; otherwise, to remain in full force and virtue."

The decree appealed from was affirmed and the First National Bank gave notice that on a certain day it would move the law and equity court of the city of Richmond for a judgment against the petitioners, Bemiss and Williams, for the penalty of the bond, claiming that the costs and damages sustained amounted to $1,519.26, of which sum $828.75 was for alleged depreciation in value of the bonds during the period the decree of March 17, 1910, was suspended by the appeal, and $690.51, difference between interest at 6 per cent. on the market value of the bonds and 3 per cent. interest on the face value of said bonds, during the same period.

The petitioners here, defendants in the court below, cravedoyer of said bond and demurred to the notice; the ground of demurrer being that the condition of the bond, to pay "all damages, costs, and fees which may be awarded against or incurred by them," does not cover such costs and damages as are set out in the notice.

The court overruled the demurrer, the petitioners pleaded conditions performed, and, a jury having been waived, the whole matter of law and fact was submitted to the court. The facts agreed were as follows: That the Virginia century bonds, between the 17th day of March, 1910, and the 11th day of March, 1911, depreciated in market value $697.50; that between the dates named the First National Bank loaned money at a rate of interest as high as 6 per cent., but that the average rate was 5½ per cent.; that the money collected from the United States on account of the Mohawk was, upon the recommendation of the receiver, invested in Virginia century bonds in order that the fund should be exempt from taxation; that the bank could have realized 2½ per cent. interest on the cost of said bonds in addition to the 3 per cent. interest which was paid on the face value of said bonds, which, between the dates named, would have been $575, but the money invested in said bonds would have been liable to taxes, which, between the dates named, would have amounted to $402.50, leaving the amount claimed to have been lost by the plaintiff on account of interest $172.50; that either party may rely upon the printed record in the case of Commercial Trust Company, Trustee, v. First National Bank, and the opinion handed down on March 9, 1911 (112 Va. 44, 70 S. E. 532), as fully as if the same had been fully set out; that because of the supersedeas granted in the case the $25,500 of Virginia century bonds referred to in the decree of March 17, 1910, were retained in the custody of the clerk of the court from the 17th day of March, 1910, to the 13th day of March, 1911, at which date they were delivered under and pursuant to the terms and conditions of said decree to the First National Bank, and no other or further payment has been made to the said bank in satisfaction of said decree; that if, at any time subsequent to said 17th day of March, 1910, the First National Bank had made application to the chancery court to have entered an order directing that the aforesaid century bonds be sold and the proceeds held to await the result of this litigation, Eppa Hunton, Jr., of counsel for the Commercial Trust Company, would have made no objection to such a decree for the clients whom he represented, and he believes that no objection would have been made to such a decree by counsel for the other appellants in the suit of Commercial Trust Company v. First National Bank; that on the 20th day of July, 1911, the court entered a judgment against Bemiss and Williams for the sum of $697.50 on account of the depreciation in value of the bonds mentioned in said notice of motion for judgment, and the further sum of $172.50 on account of interest as set forth in said notice, with interest on both sums from the 13th day of March, 1911, to which action of the court Bemiss and Williams excepted. To that judgment a writ of error was awarded, and the case is before us for consideration.

[1] Upon the demurrer the plaintiffs in error rely chiefly upon the case of Cardwell v. Allen, Trustee, 69 Va. 184. The opinion there construed section 13 of chapter 178 of the Code of 1873, which sets forth the condition of an appeal and supersedeas bond to be to "pay all damages, costs and fees which may be awarded against or incurred by the appellants or petitioners," and it was held that this language was not broad enough to cover the rents and profits of real estate in the possession of the appellant. The language of the bond in the present case is identical with that construed in the case just cited; but the statute upon the subject has been amended, and so much of it as is pertinent to the question before us reads as follows: The condition of the bond, if a supersedeas be awarded, shall be "to perform and satisfy the judgment, decree, or order, or the part thereof, proceedings on which are stayed, in case the said judgment, decree, or such part, be affirmed, or the appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, be dismissed, and also to pay all damages, costs, and fees, which may be awarded against or incurred by the appellants or petitioners, in the appellate court, and all actual damages incurred in consequence of the supersedeas."

It is unnecessary to consider what our opinion would be as to the binding force of Cardwell v. Allen, supra, had there been no change in the statute since that case was decided. It is true that the language of the bond in this case is identical with the language of the bond in that case, and it may be conceded that the construction placed upon the statute by the court in Cardwell

v. Allen would not have embraced the damages claimed by the notice in the case before us. The statute, however, has made a radical change, and has provided that the bond shall be for the payment of all damages, costs, and fees, and all actual damages incurred in consequence of the supersedeas, which is broad enough to cover the damages in question; the whole contention in support of the demurrer being, that, as this court had held in Cardwell v. Allen that the condition to pay all damages, costs, and fees was not broad enough to cover the rents and profits of real estate, it is not broad enough to cover the damages claimed in this case. When the change in the statute was made, it was the purpose of the Legislature to enlarge the scope of the supersedeas bond and to extend its protection to cases not theretofore embraced in it, and that statute is, we think, to be read into every statutory supersedeas bond which has been executed since its passage. Had the statute in the Code of 1873, which was construed in the case of Cardwell v. Allen, been such as we now find it to be in section 3470 of the Code of 1904, we cannot for a moment believe that the condition of the bond before us, which is to pay all damages, costs, and fees, would not have been held sufficient to cover the rents of real estate in the hands of the appellant, which were excluded by the judgment of the court in Cardwell v. Allen, and sufficient to embrace all actual damages incurred in consequence of the supersedeas, although the latter phrase had not in terms been set out in the supersedeas bond as it was executed.

We are of opinion that there was no error in the judgment of the law and equity court upon the demurrer.

[2] It is also claimed, on behalf of the plaintiffs in error, that the judgment of the law and equity court was erroneous in allowing the sum of $697.50 on account of depreciation in the value of the bonds between the date of the decree, which was the 17th day of March, 1910, and the 11th day of March, 1911, when they were actually delivered to the defendants in error. The contention of plaintiffs in error rests upon the proposition that inasmuch as it appears that the century bonds were delivered to the defendants in error in kind, and it does not appear that they have ever been sold, they have received what the decree in the case of Commercial Trust Company v. First National Bank gave them, and that no loss upon this account has been sustained.

In this view we cannot concur. When the decree of March, 1910, was rendered, which was subsequently affirmed, the bank was entitled to the immediate possession of the century bonds, to do with as to it seemed best. They were worth at that date in the market a certain sum. Possession of them was wrongfully withheld from the bank for about a year, and when the bank actually received them they had depreciated to the amount for which the court gave judgment. The bank, in March, 1911, received what had diminished in value $697.50, as compared with what it was entitled to receive in March, 1910. We think it comes plainly within the condition of the bond.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there was no error to the prejudice of the plaintiffs in error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

2. INSURANCE (§ 593*) — FIRE POLICIES — FAILURE TO COLLECT—SET-OFF—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where a buyer under a conditional sale of personal property, on its being destroyed by fire before payment of the price, delivered the policies to the seller for collection and credit, the seller's liability for failure to collect a portion of the insurance was an unliquidated demand, depending on negligence, and was properly submitted to the jury, as against the buyer's claim that he was entitled to credit as a matter of law for full amount of the policies.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Lit Bros. against the Exposition Arcade Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. R. Hicks, for plaintiff in error. E. R. Baird, Jr., for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Lit Bros. proceeded by motion in the court of law and chancery of the city of Norfolk against the Exposition Arcade Corporation to recover certain moneys claimed to be due them, and obtained a judgment for the sum of $2,427.95, to which a writ of error was obtained by the defendant corporation.

From the facts in evidence it appears that Lit Bros., a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, in consideration of the sum of $6,279.50 paid and to be paid, sold to the Exposition Arcade Corporation certain personal property, consisting of household furniture, which was delivered to the defendant company, but the title to which was reserved to Lit Bros. until all the payments under the contract of sale had been made. It was further agreed that the property should be insured for an amount not less than $4,000, the policy of insurance to be assigned to Lit Bros. as additional security. This contract bears date in March, 1907, and on the 29th of June, 1907, the property was wholly destroyed by fire. It appears that the Exposition Arcade Corporation had policies of insurance in several companies, amounting to $5,500, which it turned over to Lit Bros., who proceeded to collect from the insurance companies, but realized only $2,462.45, which, added to the sum which was paid in cash, left due by the Exposition Arcade Corporation the sum for which judgment was rendered.

[1] The claim of the plaintiff in error is, first, that where a seller puts property in the possession of a vendee, with reservation of title, it is at the risk of the seller, and the loss is on the vendor when the property is destroyed without fault upon the part of the vendee.

Upon this question there seems to be some conflict of opinion. The cases from Massachusetts (Tabbutt v. American Ins. Co., 185 Mass. 419, 70 N. E. 430, 102 Am. St. Rep. 353, and Swallow v. Emery, 111 Mass. 356) and Alabama (American Soda, etc., Co. v. Blue, 40 South. 218¹) sustain the position of plaintiff in error. But the weight of authority is, we think, to the contrary.

In Williston on Sales, § 304, it is said: "Where goods are delivered to the buyer, but title is retained by the seller until the price is paid, the buyer immediately acquires the right to use the goods as his own, and has, indeed, exactly the same power over them, and right in regard to them, that he would have if he had bought them and mortgaged them back to secure the price. The time for payment in such sales frequently extends over months, and sometimes over years. It is necessarily to be expected by the parties that the goods will deteriorate during this period, and, nevertheless, that the buyer will be bound to pay the price. It seems properly to follow that, if the goods are accidentally destroyed or injured, the buyer must stand the loss; that is, he must pay the price in full at the time agreed. The decisions upon the point are in conflict, but the weight of authority sustains the view here expressed."

In support of the text a number of authorities are cited, among them Chicago Equipment Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 136 U. S. 268, 10 Sup. Ct. 999, 34 L. Ed. 349, where Mr. Justice Harlan uses the following language: "The agreement that the title should remain in the payee until the notes were paid * * * is a short form of chattel mortgage. The transaction is, in legal effect, what it would have been if the maker, who purchased the cars, had given a mortgage back to the payee, securing the notes on the property until they were all fully paid. The agreement by which the vendor retains the title and by which the notes are secured on the cars is collateral to the notes, and does not affect their negotiability. It does not qualify the promise to pay at the time fixed, any more than would be done by an agreement of the same kind, embodied in a separate instrument, in the form of a mortgage. So far as the notes upon their face show, the payee did not retain possession of the cars; but possession was delivered to the maker. The marks on the cars showed that they were to go into the possession of the maker, or of its transferee, to be used. The suggestion that the maker could not have been compelled to pay, if the cars had been destroyed before the maturity of the notes, is without any foundation upon which to rest. The agreement cannot properly be so construed. The cars having been sold and delivered to the maker, the payee had no interest remaining in them, except by way of security for the payment of the notes given for the price. The reservation of the title as security for such payment was not the reservation of anything in favor of the maker, but was for the benefit of the payee and all subsequent holders of the paper. The promise of the maker was unconditional."

In La Valley v. Ravenna, 78 Vt. 152, 62 Atl. 47, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 97, 112 Am. St. Rep. 898, 6 Ann. Cas. 684, the Supreme Court of Vermont held that "there may be a recovery of the unpaid purchase price for property sold and delivered on condition that the title shall not pass until full payment is made, although without the fault of the purchaser the property is destroyed before the price falls due."

Burnley v. Tufts, 66 Miss. 49, 5 South. 627, 14 Am. St. Rep. 579, is to the same effect. See, also, Tufts v. Griffin, 107 N. C. 47, 12 S. E. 68, 10 L. R. A. 526, 22 Am. St. Rep. 863; Tufts v. Wynne, 45 Mo. App. 42.

In American Soda Fountain Co. v. Vaughn, 69 N. J. Law, 582, 55 Atl. 54, it is said: "In a contract of sale, where the title remains in the vendor until the purchase price is paid, and notes are given for unpaid installments of the purchase price, if it appears upon a construction of the contract that the consideration for the notes was the delivery of the goods, with the right to acquire title by payment, it is no defense to an action upon the notes that the subject of the sale was destroyed by fire before the title passed."

Many other cases are cited by Williston in support of the text, but those referred to are deemed sufficient.

[2] The second ground of defense was that Lit Bros. should have been required to credit their demand against the Exposition Arcade Corporation with the face value of the policies of insurance which had been taken out upon this property.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit to the motion for judgment, and filed its particulars of defense, the first paragraph of which is as follows: "The furniture mentioned in the notice was insured for its full value in the name of the plaintiff, in a good, solvent insurance company, and was destroyed by fire without defendant's fault. The policies were delivered to the plaintiff and collected by him. Said plaintiff could have, and should have, collected from said insurance companies the amount of $6,000. Plaintiff failed to collect said insurance, and such failure has damaged defendant to the said amount, which damages defendant offers to set off against the claim of plaintiff; the plaintiff being a nonresident of Virginia and having no estate in Virginia. This statement of grounds of defense is to be considered a special plea in the nature of a plea of set-off."

Now, that is defendant's statement of its case. It comes before the court with a plea of set-off, and the court told the jury that "the defendant is only entitled to have credited on the amount due by it to the plaintiff for the unpaid purchase price of the furniture bought by it such sums as the plaintiff actually collected from the policies of insurance held by it, unless it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff ought, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, to have collected a larger amount from said policies." The defendant excepted to this, and asked the court to instruct the jury that "if from the evidence they believe that the plaintiff settled, without the consent of the defendant, the insurance claims described in the evidence at less than their face value, then the jury must allow the defendant an offset against plaintiff's claim to the amount of the difference between the face value of the insurance claims and the amount actually collected by the plaintiff on account of said insurance."

The court gave the instruction asked for by the plaintiff, and refused that which was asked for by the defendant. The defendant also asked the court to instruct the jury, that "the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that he collected on account of said insurance the amount collectible thereon," which the court also refused to give.

In Waterman on Set-Off, at page 89, § 73, it is said: "As the defendant, when he interposes a set-off, stands in the light of a plaintiff in a cross-action, the burden of proof is on him to establish his set-off."

And dealing specifically with unliquidated demands, pleaded as set-offs, it is said at page 345, § 292: "The damages to be recovered on a policy of insurance are always uncertain. The amount depends on the proof at the trial. The plaintiff may declare for a total loss, yet be able to prove only a partial loss, the extent of which will be greater or less according to the circumstances of each particular case. A policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity. The assurer undertakes to indemnify the assured for the damages he may sustain by losses in consequence of the perils insured against by the policy. It is like a bond to save harmless. In most cases nothing can be more unliquidated than the amount of such indemnity. It depends upon a great variety of facts and circumstances, to be disclosed and digested at the trial."

We think, therefore, that there was no error in the ruling of the court, which left it to the jury to say whether or not the plaintiff ought, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, to have collected a greater amount from the policies.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Hustings Court of City of Richmond.

Condemnation proceedings by the City of Richmond against J. P. Carson and another. There was a judgment confirming the report of the commissioners, and J. P. Carson appeals. Reversed in part.

J. P. Carson and W. P. De Saussure, for appellant. H. R. Pollard and Christian, Gordan & Christian, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a proceeding instituted by the city of Richmond to condemn certain lands for its purposes. One of the lots, a part of which was condemned, was subject to a ground rent for 99 years, with the right of renewal to the lessee for successive terms, forever. At the time of the institution of the proceeding the plaintiff in error, J. P. Carson, was the owner by assignment of the rights of the landlord under the lease, and the Old Dominion Steamship Company had acquired the rights of the lessee. Both Carson and the steamship company were parties to the proceeding. Commissioners were appointed as provided by section 1105f, Va. Code 1904, and ascertained and reported that a just compensation for the land taken was $3,625, and that no damage would result to the residue of the property or to another person by reason of the taking. They further reported that, of the compensation reported, Carson, the owner of the ground rent to which the lot is subject, is entitled to the sum of $811.40 (which sum, capitalized at 5 per cent., is equal to $40.57, by which the annual ground rent of $650 on the whole property must be credited), and that the steamship company is entitled to $2,813.60, the residue of the said sum of $3,625.

No exception was made to the said report as to the compensation allowed for the land taken (its fee-simple value, as we understand the report), but Carson excepted to the report as to the manner in which the commissioners undertook to apportion or distribute that sum. His exception was overruled by the court, and the report of the commissioners confirmed, and the compensation allowed, which had been paid into court, was directed to be paid to the parties in accordance with the report of the commissioners.

The first and second assignments of error may be considered together. They are as follows:

"First. The effort of the commissioners of appraisal to reduce the rent reserved in the lease from Wm. Allison and wife to Lewis Ludlam, under which the Old Dominion Steamship Company holds the possession of the land, is illegal, ultra vires, and should not have been confirmed by the court.

"Second. The hustings court, being without jurisdiction in this proceeding to reform the said lease or vary the covenants, erred in confirming the said commissioners' report and in ordering 'that the yearly rental of $650, payable in quarter-yearly installments, * * * be reduced by the sum of $40.57 annually.'"

[1] It is well settled in this state that, in proceedings like this, the power conferred must be strictly construed, and the manner of executing it carefully observed and followed. Fisher v. Smith, 32 Va. 611, 612; Painter v. St. Clair, 98 Va. 85, 34 S. E. 959; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 40 S. E. 633, 914.

[2] Section 1105f of Va. Code 1904 provides when and how any company chartered in this state, which is authorized to condemn lands, or any interest or estate therein, may acquire the same for its purposes; and by subsection 25 of that section its provisions, as far as they can be applied, govern cities in exercising the right to condemn property for their purposes. That section prescribes the duties to be performed by the commissioners, the form of oath they are to take, and the form of report they are to make. From these are to be ascertained the extent of their powers.

By subsections 8 and 15 it is provided that the commissioners, after viewing the property, or the interest or estate which is sought to be condemned, and the adjacent property, and hearing evidence, shall ascertain what will be a compensation for the said property and land, or for such interest or estate therein as is proposed to be taken, and assess the damages, if any, to the adjacent or other property of such tenant or owner, or to the property of any other person, beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of the company's works.

By subsections 7 and 16 it is provided that before executing the duties of his office each commissioner shall take an oath to the effect that he will faithfully and impartially ascertain what will be "a just compensation for such land (or such interest or estate in the land) of the freehold whereof — is tenant, and for such other property as is proposed to be taken by the — Company for its purposes, and award the damages, if any, resulting to the adjacent and other property of said tenant or owner, and to the property of any other person, beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of the company's works."

By subsections 8 and 17 the form of the report the commissioners are required to make is prescribed. Their report must state by what court and for what purpose they were appointed, that they met on the day designated in the order, or to which they were regularly adjourned, upon the land to be condemned, the limits of which were described to them, and which they are required to describe in their report; that they were duly sworn, and that upon such evidence as was before them they "are of opinion and do ascertain that for the said part (or for the estate or interest in the part) and for the other property so taken — will be a just compensation, and the damages to the adjacent and other property of said tenant or owner, and to the property of other persons, who will be damaged in their property by reason of the construction and operation of the works of said company, beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of such works are: * * *

In order to enable the court to dispose properly of money paid into court, subsection 14 provides that "it may have inquiries by a commissioner to ascertain what persons are entitled thereto, and in what proportions, and may make an order of publication requiring all interested to appear before the commissioner, that their respective claims may be passed upon. After such reference to a commissioner, and such publication, the court shall make such disposition of the money so paid into court as may seem to it right."

From these and other provisions of section 1105f it is clear, we think, that the commissioners appointed to ascertain and report the compensation for the land, or interest or estate therein, taken, and the additional damages, if any, provided for, have no power, where there is a controversy or doubt as to who is entitled to such compensation or damages, or in what proportions, to pass upon or determine who is entitled to the same. Neither the statute authorizing the appointment of the commissioners, the order appointing them, the oath they take, nor the report they are required to make, impose any such duty or confer any such power upon them. On the contrary, provision is expressly made (subsection 14) for determining, in case of controversy or doubt, the parties to whom and in what proportions such compensation and damages are to be paid.

One of the objects of subsection 14 was that the condemning body might not be obstructed in the prosecution of its work by controversies in respect to the title to or interest in the land sought to be taken, but to transfer such controversies from the land to the fund paid into court. Richmond, etc., R. R. Co. v. Seaboard, etc., Co., 103 Va. 399, 49 S. E. 512; Swann v. Washington, etc., R. R. Co., 108 Va. 282, 287, 61 S. E. 750. When a report has been made, the sums ascertained by it may be paid into court by the condemning party, and it may enter and construct its work upon the land described in the report, although the proceedings are still pending. Subsection 11.

For the duties of ascertaining a just compensation for the land to be condemned and the incidental damages resulting from the taking and the construction and operation of the works constructed and operated thereon—duties expressly imposed by the statute—the commissioners are peculiarly fitted. Richmond, etc., Co. v. Seaboard, etc., Co., supra, and authorities cited. But for determining controversies between persons interested in, or claimants to, the land taken, or to the compensation and damages reported, the proper decision of which depends frequently upon intricate questions of law, such commissioners as a rule are ill qualified. It is true that in some jurisdictions all these duties are imposed upon the commissioners or juries, who ascertain the compensation and assess the damages. This seems to be the case in the state of Maryland, as shown by the case of the Mayor and City of Baltimore v. Latrobe and Others, 101 Md. 621, 61 Atl. 208, 4 Ann. Cas. 1005, so much relied on by the counsel of the defendant in error. The statutes in that state seem to materially differ from ours. But while under our statutes the commissioners to ascertain the compensation, etc., for the land condemned have no such power, it is clear, we think, that the court having jurisdiction of the condemnation proceedings has full power under the provisions of subsection 14 of section 1105f to ascertain the rights and interests of the claimants to the fund, and in the language of that section "to make such disposition of the money so paid into court as may seem to it right."

It follows, from what has been said, that we are of opinion that so much of the report of the commissioners as attempted to make disposition of the money ascertained by them to be a just compensation for the land taken was in excess of their powers and ought to have been stricken out as surplusage, and the report in other respects only confirmed. Swann v. Washington, etc., R. R. Co., supra, and cases cited.

At a day subsequent to the confirmation of the report of the commissioners the hustings court, without any hearing on its part, or having inquiries made as to who was entitled to the fund, as provided by subsection 14 of section 1105f, entered an order distributing the fund paid into court in accordance with the report of the said commissioners. The rights of the parties claiming the fund in court have never been considered or ascertained in the manner prescribed by the statute.

The court is of opinion that the order of the hustings court, confirming the commissioners' report, and all proceedings in the case subsequent thereto and based thereon, are erroneous and must be reversed; and this court, without passing upon any other question involved in the case, will enter such order as the hustings court ought to have entered, striking out as surplusage so much of the commissioners' report as attempted to dispose of the compensation allowed for the land taken, and confirming the said report in other respects, and will remand the cause to the hustings court, with directions to proceed, in the manner provided by subsection 14 of section 1105f of the Code, to ascertain the rights of the claimants to the fund paid into court, and to dispose of it accordingly. Reversed in part.

HARRISON, J. This action to recover the value of certain work and materials furnished by the plaintiffs, as plumbers, is before us for the second time. Lambert v. Phillips & Son, 106 Va. 632, 64 S. E. 945.

At the former hearing, the law applicable to the facts of the case was fully and clearly stated, and the case remanded for a new trial in accordance with the views then expressed.

With respect to the second trial, the record of which is now before us for review, it is only necessary to say that upon careful consideration of the same we find no error in the trial to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error. The evidence before the jury touching the right of the defendants in error to recover was conflicting, and the case was fairly submitted in accordance with the law as already laid down by this court. Under such circumstances, upon well-settled principles, the verdict of the jury cannot be disturbed, and the judgment complained of must therefore be affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Norfolk.

Action by Preston S. Cotten against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Willcox and Morris, Garnett & Cotten, for appellant. Williams & Tunstall, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This record shows that in August, 1908, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company entered into a contract in writing with the Henderson Jarrett Company, Incorporated, of Norfolk, dealers in lumber, at Norfolk, Va., by which it was agreed that the lumber company would deliver to the railroad company, at Scranton, Pa., 100 cars of "pine collar timber," not peeled, to be not less than 18 feet long and 30 per cent. thereof to be 10 inches in diameter, 30 per cent. 12 inches, 30 per cent. 14 inches, and 10 per cent. 16 inches, at the price of 13¼ cents per lineal foot. The contract further provided that, should the material furnished fail to comply with the specifications, the railroad might return the same at the expense, including freight charges, cost of handling, etc., of the shipper. This pine collar timber was commonly known and designated as "mine props." The lumber company proceeded to fill the order, completing the same by October 27, 1908. As the lumber was delivered, the railroad company distributed the same to its various mines in the outlying district around Scranton, where the greater part thereof was promptly used. When the parties came to a final settlement of the balance due the lumber company under the contract, differences arose as to the size of the props and the method of calculating the balance due. The railroad company insisted that the lumber company had not delivered as many props of the larger sizes as the contract called for, and further contended that in ascertaining the diameter of the logs a deduction of one inch should be made for the bark, notwithstanding the provision of the contract that the material to be furnished should be unpeeled, and, further, that when a log measured under the bark 15, 13, or 11 inches, it was to be put in the next lower class, since the contract did not call for props of that size. In other words, if a log actually measured 14 inches, including the bark, 1 inch was deducted for the bark, thus reducing the diameter to 13 inches, and then the log was to be put in the 12-inch class, because the contract did not contemplate a log 13 inches in diameter. This method of measurement made a very large difference in the diameter of the logs, and was repudiated by the lumber company as arbitrary and in utter disregard of the contract.

Various attempts were made to bring about a settlement of these differences, and in the spring of 1909 a final conference was had, which resulted, as was supposed, in a satisfactory adjustment. At this conference it appears to have been agreed that there should be added 1 inch to all the measurements, representing the difference between an over-bark and an under-bark measurement; that, when this had been done, the logs which by proper measurement fell into the intermediate grades, not named in the contract, should be divided equally, and one-half assigned to the next highest grade and one-half to the next lowest grade; and, this having been done, that the value should be reckoned according to a scale agreed upon. The parties reached totally different results in the calculation by each of the balance due under this compromise adjustment.

The evidence for the plaintiff shows very clearly and satisfactorily that by proper calculations, such as were contemplated by the terms of the adjustment, there was a large balance due to the lumber company. The result of the calculation made by the railroad company was a trifling balance due, which it tendered the plaintiff in full discharge of its obligation. This tender was rejected, upon the ground that it had been arrived at in total disregard of the terms of adjustment which had been adopted. Thereupon Preston S. Cotten, the assignee of the lumber company, brought this suit to recover of the defendant railroad company the sum of $8,098.04, the balance originally claimed and demanded by the lumber company as its due.

The case was heard by the judge of the circuit court of the city of Norfolk without a jury, who gave the plaintiff a judgment for $4,159.60, to which the present writ of error was awarded on the petition of the defendant railroad company.

[1, 2] The case having been heard by the judge without a jury, and the evidence being certified, it is to be heard here as on a demurrer by the defendant to the evidence. The judgment of the trial court has the same effect as the verdict of a jury, and this court will not disturb its finding, unless it is plainly against the evidence, or without evidence. Martin v. Railroad Co., 101 Va. 406, 44 S. E. 695; Parsons v. Maury, 101 Va. 516, 44 S. E. 758; Gray v. Rumrill, 101 Va. 507, 44 S. E. 697.

We have examined carefully the evidence, which is too voluminous to be discussed in detail, and find that it abundantly sustains the finding and judgment of the circuit court. Viewed from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, the judgment is not only amply sustained, but is fully justified.

[3] Several objections were taken by the defendant to the action of the court in admitting and rejecting certain evidence. In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to consider these exceptions, for the reason that, if they were well taken, it could not affect the result. The evidence, other than that involved in these objections, is amply sufficient to sustain the judgment, and therefore the testimony objected to could not possibly have had any influence on the mind of the court prejudicial to the objecting party. Gerst v. Jones & Co., 73 Va. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 773.

The judgment complained of must be affirmed.

2. PLEADING (§ 245*)—AMENDMENT.

Where a demurrer had been sustained to a bill, the court did not err in refusing an amendment stating facts which were known, or might have been known, to plaintiffs prior to the argument of the demurrer.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Action by N. W. Bowe and others, against Elizabeth S. Scott and others. From a decree sustaining demurrers to the bill, and overruling plaintiffs' motion to file an amended bill, and dissolving an injunction previously awarded, and dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. E. Byrd and David Meade White, for appellants. Page & Leary, Braxton & Eggleston, Leake & Buford, and H. R. Pollard, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. The principal question presented by this appeal involves the right of individuals (owning real estate in the city of Richmond, but whose lots do not abut on the section of the public alley obstructed, and who have not suffered any peculiar damage therefrom) to have declared null and void a city ordinance authorizing the closing, for the period of 30 years, of a public alley reaching from Shafer street to Harrison street, to the extent to which it bisects the respective lots of the appellants, Elizabeth S. Scott and E. T. D. Myers, Jr.; also to enjoin the defendants from closing any portion of the alley, or from exercising any rights under "the void ordinance."

From a decree sustaining demurrers to the original bill, overruling the motion of the plaintiffs to file an amended bill, dissolving the injunction theretofore awarded, and dismissing the bill, this appeal was granted.

[1] Speaking generally, the obstruction of a public highway is a public nuisance, and the trend of authority is that an individual cannot maintain a bill to enjoin such nuisance, unless he can show that he has suffered or will suffer therefrom special and peculiar injury or damage to himself, as distinguished from injury or damage to the general public. Moreover, such special and peculiar injury or damage must be direct, and not purely consequential, and must be different in kind, and not merely in degree, from that sustained by the community at large.

The foregoing statement of the rule denotes the line of cleavage between remedies for public nuisances which may be maintained by an individual and such as must be asserted for or on behalf of the public.

The rule is thus stated in 29 Cyc. 1210: "It is absolutely essential to the right of an individual to relief against a public nuisance that he should show that he has suffered or will suffer some special injury other than that in which all the general public share alike, and the difference between the injury to him and the injury to the general public must be one of kind, and not merely of degree." 4 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1349; 5 Pom. Eq. Rem. § 542, where numerous cases are cited.

The research of counsel has drawn our attention to decisions which show that the statement of the law as given in Cyc. prevails in England and generally throughout the United States. It is also the established doctrine in Virginia. Beveridge v. Lacey, 24 Va. 63; Com'th v. Webb, 27 Va. 729; James River & K. Co. v. Anderson, 39 Va. 278; Richmond Trust Co. v. Murphy, 98 Va. 109, 34 S. E. 982; Fisher v. S. A. L. Ry., 102 Va. 369, 46 S. E. 381, 1 Ann. Cas. 622; Brown v. Baldwin, 112 Va. 536, 72 S. E. 143.

In James River & K. Co. v. Anderson, supra, at page 278, Tucker, P., observes: "The property of the plaintiff, Anderson, lies in another square to the eastward, and that of Mills two squares off. As well might a lot owner at Rocketts complain of the narrowing of the main street on Shockoe Hill, and bring his private action or bill for an injunction. Such remote injuries common to the whole population are to be remedied by the action of the constituted corporate authorities, or by prosecution for a nuisance. If Anderson and Mills can implead the defendants for narrowing a street not contiguous to their property, every man in the community might do so. To prevent this evil, the law forbids an action by a private individual for a common nuisance, unless he can show a special injury." At page 307, Judge Tucker, on the question of jurisdiction, remarks: "In whatever light I have been enabled to view this case, I am perfectly satisfied that the injunction never should have been granted, and that upon the hearing it should have been altogether dissolved."

The learned chancellor, in a clear and conclusive opinion, shows that, though the injury to the plaintiffs, as stated in the bill, may be greater than that sustained by other persons living more remote from the scene of the obstruction, such injury is nevertheless greater in degree only, and not in kind.

Therefore, under the authorities, the bill does not state a case of such special injury as would entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction.

[2] After the court had announced its decision sustaining the demurrer to the bill upon a ground involving its dismissal, plaintiffs' counsel stated that they would offer within very few days an amended bill. The chancellor found that the matters of amendment (which were of a nature somewhat similar to those contained in the original bill) were either known to the plaintiffs, or might well have been known to them, prior to the argument of the demurrer, and held that the motion to file the amended bill came too late.

In this ruling we think there was no error. Judge Grinnan, in that connection, justly remarks: "When the proceedings in a cause have reached the stage that they have reached in this suit, a motion to file an amended bill is received with reluctance, and not granted but for some good reason. If such an innovation as is here desired were to be granted, it would open a precedent whereby suits might be greatly and unnecessarily prolonged, to the inconvenience, delay, and expense of litigants. Instead of a plaintiff being at pains to state his whole case in his bill, as he ought to do, if possible, he would be at liberty to present his case to the court by piecemeal; and the announcement of the court's decision would serve no other purpose than to give notice that the bill needed additional allegations. While the courts are liberal in allowing amendments, the indulgence has never gone to this extent. * * * Courts have discretion in these matters; but this discretion is in no sense an arbitrary or capricious one. It is a discretion that is at all times hedged about and governed by those rules that have long been established and recognized as binding upon the courts."

The action of the court in overruling the motion for leave to file the amended bill is well sustained by authority. 1 Bar. Chy. Pr. 324, 327; Alsop v. Catlett, 97 Va. 364, 34 S. E. 48; Vashon v. Barrett, 99 Va. 346, 38 S. E. 200; Jackson v. Valley Tie Co., 108 Va. 714, 722, 62 S. E. 964.

Concurring, as we do, in the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrer to the bill, it becomes unnecessary, and would, indeed, be improper, to express any opinion with respect to the validity of the ordinance, or the right of the public to redress the alleged invasion of their prerogative by prosecution, or other appropriate remedy, for a common nuisance.

The decree appealed from is without error, and must be affirmed.

SMITH, County Treasurer, v. BELL et al.[†]
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 83*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

Under Const. art. 2, § 21 (Code 1904, p. ccxiii), requiring as a prerequisite to the right to vote, that the voter shall pay all state poll taxes assessed or assessable against him, a person assessable with poll taxes, who pays such taxes without their actual assessment against him, as required by law, is entitled to vote.

2. ELECTIONS (§ 83*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

Under Const. art. 2, § 21 (Code 1904, p. ccxiii), requiring the payment of state poll taxes as a prerequisite to the right to vote, and section 38 (page ccxvi), requiring county and city treasurers to file lists of persons who pay such taxes before each regular election, a treasurer properly included on such list the names of persons paying their taxes to him personally after they had been returned delinquent and he had paid his collections to the auditor, notwithstanding Code 1904, § 605, requiring payment of taxes appearing on the delinquent list to the collector or auditor, and providing that they cannot be collected by the treasurer, since the payment, having reached the proper officer, was as valid as if made to him in the first instance, and the constitutional right of suffrage cannot be subordinated to statutory enactments relative to the collection of taxes.

Error to Circuit Court, Princess Anne County.

Petition for a mandamus by R. J. Bell and others against A. C. Smith, County Treasurer. To review an order granting the mandamus, defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. R. Hicks and Loyall, Taylor & White, for plaintiff in error. N. T. Green and J. L. Jeffries, for defendants in error.

WHITTLE, J. Article 2 of the Virginia Constitution (Code 1904, p. ccxi) deals with the elective franchise. Section 38 of that article (Code 1904, p. ccxvi) provides that after January 1, 1904, the treasurer of each county and city shall, at least five months before each regular election, file with the clerk of the circuit court of his county, or the corporation court of his city, a list of all persons in his county or city who have paid, not later than six months prior to such election, the state poll taxes required by the Constitution.

In compliance with that requirement, the plaintiff in error, A. C. Smith, as treasurer of Princess Anne county, on May 6, 1911, filed with the clerk of the circuit court of the county a list of all persons who had paid to him their capitation taxes for the years 1908, 1909, and 1910, and who were consequently, prima facie at least, entitled to vote at the general election to be held on November 7, 1911.

On September 2, 1911, the defendants in error filed a petition in the circuit court of Princess Anne county, praying for a mandamus to require the plaintiff in error to return and file with the clerk a new list of voters who had personally paid their poll taxes to him for the years 1908, 1909, and 1910, and that he specially omit from said list the names of certain persons who had never been assessed with poll taxes as required by law, and certain other persons included therein, who, though they had been assessed with poll taxes, were returned delinquent for the years 1908 and 1909.

The case was heard upon the pleadings and evidence, and to an order of the circuit court granting the prayer of the petition this writ of error was allowed.

It is not denied that, with respect to both classes of persons who were deprived of their right to vote at the November, 1911, election by the order complained of, many of them were either assessed or assessable with poll taxes under the Constitution, and had paid their taxes to the treasurer, who accounted for the same to the auditor of public accounts. The question, therefore, for our determination, is whether these citizens are to be disfranchised solely because, in case of one class, they paid their poll taxes to the treasurer without having been previously assessed by the commissioner of the revenue and without his certificate of assessment (Acts 1910, p. 584), and in case of the other class because they paid their taxes to the treasurer after they had been returned delinquent (Va. Code, 1904, §§ 605, 606, 607, 608).

Section 21 of article 2 of the Constitution (Code 1904, p. ccxiii) provides that "any person registered under either of the last two sections shall have the right to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people, subject to the following conditions: That he, unless exempted by section 22, shall, as a prerequisite to the right to vote after the first day of January, 1904, personally pay, at least six months prior to the election, all state poll taxes assessed or assessable against him, under this Constitution, during the three years next preceding that in which he offers to vote. * * * " Tazewell v. Herman, 108 Va. 416, 60 S. E. 767, 61 S. E. 752; Tilton v. Herman, 109 Va. 503, 64 S. E. 351.

[1, 2] It is plain that section 21 contemplates the payment of poll taxes, not only by persons who have been assessed with such taxes, but also by persons who are assessable therewith. Nevertheless, the decision of the circuit court denies such right to the latter class, and to that extent nullifies the provision and disfranchises citizens who have fully complied with its terms. The order, moreover, strikes from the voting list the names of other citizens, who were assessed by the commissioner of the revenue, and were registered voters of the county, and had paid their poll taxes to the treasurer, who paid his collections to the auditor, merely because such payment was made after the taxes had been returned delinquent.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Section 608 of the Code provides that taxes appearing on the delinquent list (returned under section 605) may be paid either to the clerk or to the auditor, but that such taxes cannot be collected by the treasurer.

It may well be that these citizens, by selecting the treasurer as the medium for transmitting their taxes to the auditor, assumed the risk of his discharging that duty; yet, after the money reached the hand of the proper officer, the payment was as valid as if it had been made to him in the first instance. The state undoubtedly possesses plenary power to devise adequate means for assessing, levying, and collecting its revenues, subject only to such limitations as may be imposed by the Constitution; but the confusion in this case arises from the attempt to subordinate the right of suffrage granted to the citizen, in certain conditions, by the Constitution, to statutory enactments of the character indicated. Such legislation is essential, but it may not be so interpreted and enforced as to abridge the elective franchise as guaranteed by the Constitution.

For these reasons, the order of the circuit court must be reversed, with costs, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

1. TRIAL (§ 152*)—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE—PARTY HAVING BURDEN OF PROOF.

Error to Corporation Court of Norfolk.

Action by the Ferries Company against George Bonos. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. R. Baird, Jr., S. M. Brandt, and W. H. Moreland, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Hicks, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. The Ferries Company brought an action of unlawful detainer against Bonos to recover possession of a certain parcel of land which is described in the writ. The defendant appeared and pleaded not guilty, and after the evidence for the plaintiff and the defendant had been introduced before the jury the plaintiff demurred to the evidence, the court rendered a judgment for the premises in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has brought the case before us by writ of error.

The first error assigned is that upon the plea of not guilty the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, and therefore it was error to compel the defendant to join in the demurrer; second, that under the provisions of the Virginia statute in such case made and provided the defendant was not required to join in the demurrer until the ground of demurrer was stated in writing; and, third, that in giving judgment for the plaintiff for the property in question the court erred, it never having been used for ferry purposes, and, there being no evidence of any enlargement creating a necessity therefor, it did not pass under the lease from the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk to R. E. Jordan, under whom defendant in error claims, he acquiring nothing more as to this property than the right to subject it to ferry uses upon proof that the growth and increase of the ferry business made it necessary for their operation, and that it would be acquired at the joint expense of the city and county.

[1] In Johnson's Adm'r v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 91 Va. 171, 21 S. E. 238, there is a satisfactory statement of the rule governing demurrers to evidence. In that case the authorities were considered, and the law stated to be that "by the demurrer to evidence the party demurring is considered as admitting the truth of his adversary's evidence, and all just inferences which can be properly drawn therefrom by a jury, and as waiving all of his own evidence which conflicts with that of his adversary, and all inferences from his own evidence (although not in conflict with his adversary's) which do not necessarily result therefrom."

In terms or in substance this statement has been reaffirmed in many subsequent cases. The fact that the demurrant has the burden of proof to carry does not, we think, affect the question. It imposes upon him an additional burden. It renders a successful resort to the demurrer to the evidence more difficult; but we are at a loss to perceive how the demurree can suffer any prejudice by reason of that fact.

When Mr. Burks in his pamphlet on "De-murrer to Evidence," page 5, which is cited in the petition for a writ of error, states that "either party may demur to the evidence of the other, but this method of defense is not available to the party who has the burden of proof on any issue," we take it that he means that under such circumstances a demurrer is not capable of being used to advantage by him upon whom rests the burden of proof. But while a party who under such circumstances demurs to the evidence undertakes an onerous task, there is no arbitrary rule which denies him relief; but the court must still inquire whether, after disregarding all of the demurrant's evidence which is in conflict with that of the demurree, there remains enough to entitle him to a judgment.

[2] In this case the defendant pleaded not guilty, the plaintiff demurred, and stated in writing that "the matter aforesaid, so introduced and shown in evidence to the jury by the defendant, is not sufficient in law to maintain the said issue on the part of the defendant, and that it, the said plaintiff, is not bound by the law of the land to answer the same. Wherefore, for want of sufficient matter in that behalf to the said jury shown in evidence, the said plaintiff prays judgment, and that the jury aforesaid may be discharged from giving any verdict upon said issue."

The degree of particularity with which the ground of demurrer should be stated in order to meet the requirements of our statute must depend to some extent upon the character of the case. The real point in controversy here is as to the interpretation to be placed upon the lease under which the property is claimed. It is certain that the defendant was fully advised of the contention upon the part of the plaintiff which he was required to meet, and that he can have suffered no prejudice from the want of a more specific statement of the ground of demurrer.

Passing, then, from the formal objections, we find that the case upon its merits is not to be distinguished from that of Consolvo & Cheshire v. Ferries Co., 112 Va. 318, 71 S. E. 634. In that case the court considered the identical instrument which lies at the root of this controversy, the lease from the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk to R. E. Jordan, and Judge Harrison, speaking for the court, uses the following language: "The facts in this case impel the conclusion that the use of the property in controversy belongs jointly to the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk, and that its use passed from them to R. E. Jordan under their joint lease to him of March 31, 1909, and by assignment from R. E. Jordan to the Ferries Company, the plaintiff in this case; that its present use by the Ferries Company is a necessity for the operation of the Norfolk county ferries and the public convenience; and, further, that the adverse claim, under the demise from Norfolk county, asserted by the defendants, Consolvo & Cheshire, is wholly inadequate to defeat the superior rights of the plaintiff."

[3] We refer to the opinion in that case in extenso, and are of opinion that it fully sustains the judgment under consideration, which affects land used or subject to be used for ferry purposes. The phrase "subject to be used" was certainly meant to enlarge the scope of that which would have been embraced by the word "used." If the land in question was used, or was subject to be used—that is to say, liable to be used—for ferry purposes, then it passed under the lease, whether it had been actually so used or not.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, which is affirmed.

Affirmed.

HAWSE v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF PIEDMONT, W. VA.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 18, 1912.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 497*)—OWNERSHIP—EVIDENCE.

While possession of a note regular on its face is prima facie evidence of ownership and that it has been taken in good faith for value, when that presumption is rebutted, the burden falls on the holder to show that he is the owner in good faith for value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1675-1687; Dec. Dig. § 497.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 466*)—TESTIMONY AFFECTING NOTE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action by a bank against one of several joint indorsers on a note, testimony was admissible for defendant to show that his liability was released because of the action of the bank in releasing its president, who was a joint indorser with him.

3. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTION—IGNORING DEFENSES.

In an action against one of several joint indorsers on a note, an instruction that judgment could be given against one indorser alone for the entire principal, that evidence tending to show any less or different liability of defendant than that appearing on the face of the note must be disregarded, etc., was erroneous, as ignoring a defense that defendant was released because plaintiff bank released its president, who was a joint indorser.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the First National Bank of Piedmont, W. Va., against A. L. Hawse. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Emmett Seaton and Meredith & Cocke, for plaintiff in error. Thomason & Minor, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by the First National Bank of Piedmont, W. Va., against A. L. Hawse, as one of several joint indorsers on a negotiable note held by it. The note sued on was the fifth renewal of a note which the bank had discounted for the makers and indorsers thereof in April, 1906. The original note had four indorsers, one of whom was M. A. Patrick, the president of the bank; but the note sued on had only three indorsers, the name of M. A. Patrick having been dropped.

[1] The principal defense relied on was that the plaintiff bank had lost its right to recover of the defendant by releasing M. A. Patrick, one of the indorsers jointly liable with him, and that the release of Patrick by the bank was not only in violation of the defendant's legal right to have the liability of all those bound with him continued until the note was paid, but that it was in violation of a distinct agreement by the bank, repeated whenever the note was renewed, that it would not be used before the names of all the other parties thereto who were liable with the defendant had been procured.

The evidence on behalf of the defendant, which was chiefly in support of this defense, shows that at the inception of the transaction the original note was the joint obligation of the two makers and the four indorsers thereon. M. A. Patrick, who was called by the defendant as an adverse witness, testifies that he was the president of the plaintiff bank throughout the time that this note and its several renewals was held by the bank. He admits that he was jointly liable thereon with the defendant, that he secured each renewal of the note, and that, whenever he sent the new note to the defendant to be indorsed by him, it was accompanied with the assurance that the names of the other parties would be procured before the note was used. This witness further admits that as president of the bank it was his duty to attend to the matter of securing these renewals, and that in each instance he acted for and on behalf of the bank, as its president and agent, and with full authority to represent the bank in the matter. Throughout the trial, this and other evidence, tending to show that Patrick had been released from the note with the full knowledge of the bank, and that his release therefrom had been ratified by the bank, was objected to as inadmissible, because, as claimed, the note sued on was complete on its face, and such evidence tended to alter or vary the terms of a valid written contract.

There is no question that the possession of a note, regular upon its face, is prima facie evidence of ownership and that it has been taken in good faith for value; but that is a presumption that may be rebutted, and when it is rebutted the burden is upon the holder to show that he is the owner in good faith for value.

The evidence in this case tends strongly to rebut that presumption in favor of the plaintiff, and yet it offered no evidence and rested its case solely on the note.

[2] The first assignment of error is to the action of the court in sustaining the motion of the plaintiff to strike out such parol evidence adduced by the defendant as tended to alter or vary the terms of the contract between the parties as expressed by the note in suit, or which tended to show a less or different liability upon the defendant than that shown by the note itself.

It is manifest from the record that this action of the court was taken upon the theory that the evidence to which we have adverted was inadmissible, as tending to vary the contract, and that it was this evidence which was intended to be excluded; otherwise, the motion was vague and indefinite, and the action of the court well calculated to confuse and mislead the jury. The evidence introduced by the defendant to show that his liability on the note was at an end, because of the action of the bank in releasing its president, who was joint indorser with him, was not for the purpose of altering the contract sued on, and could have had no such effect. The purpose of the evidence was to show that the condition precedent to the defendant's liability, agreed upon between him and the agent of the bank, had not been performed. For this purpose it is well settled that the evidence excluded was admissible. Woodward, Baldwin & Co. v. Foster, 59 Va. 200; Ward v. Churn, 59 Va. 801, 98 Am. Dec. 749; Catt v. Oliver, 98 Va. 580, 36 S. E. 980.

In the case last cited this court says: "No rule of law is better settled, or of greater importance, than that a written contract cannot be contradicted or varied by evidence of an oral agreement between the parties made before or at the time of such contract. The object of the evidence introduced in this case was not, however, for the purpose of contradicting or varying the writings in question, but to show that the conditions upon which they were to become operative never occurred. That this may be done within certain limitations is well settled."

In such cases, as was said in Nash v. Fugate, 73 Va. 595, 609 (34 Am. Rep. 780), "the oral evidence tends to prove independent facts, which, if established, avoid the effect of the written agreement by facts dehors the instrument, but do not tend to contradict or vary it."

The Supreme Court of the United States held, in the case of Burke v. Dulaney, 153 U. S. 228, 14 Sup. Ct. 816, 38 L. Ed. 698, that in an action by the payee of a negotiable note against the maker evidence was admissible to show by parol an agreement between the parties, made at the time of making the note, that it should not become operative as a note until the maker could examine the property for which it was to be given and determine whether he would purchase it.

In section 315 of Joyce on Defense to Commercial Paper, it is said: "Condition that Other Signatures be Procured.—Where a note is signed by a person upon the condition that it is not to take effect until the signature of another has been procured, it may be shown in defense to an action on the paper by a payee or holder with notice of such fact that there has been a breach of the condition upon which defendant affixed his signature to the paper. So where a person signs a note as surety and leaves it with the principal payor, on condition that the signature of another be obtained before delivering the same, it may be shown that the instrument was delivered in violation of such condition, as the payor will be regarded as the agent of the surety in such a case."

In the light of the authorities cited, it is clear that the circuit court erred in excluding the evidence adduced by the defendant to show that the bank could not recover from him because it had violated its agreement to procure all of the signatures of the parties jointly liable thereon before using the note, and had released from liability its president, M. A. Patrick, who was jointly liable, as indorser, with the defendant.

[3] The second assignment of error is to the action of the court in giving to the jury the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that upon any negotiable note, whether payable in Virginia or not, an action may be maintained and a judgment given against any one of the endorsers thereon alone for the entire principal of such note and charges of protest, with legal interest thereon from the date of such protest. If the jury believe from the evidence that Maner Jenkins, a notary public, at the request of the cashier of plaintiff bank, presented said note at said First National Bank of Piedmont, W. Va., on the day it became due and payable, viz., the 1st day of March, 1909, and demanded payment thereof, and that payment was refused, and that said notary public thereupon protested the same for nonpayment, and on the same day deposited in the post office at Piedmont, W. Va., notice of such presentment, nonpayment, dishonor, and protest, addressed to A. L. Hawse, at Richmond, Va., they must find for the plaintiff, and must disregard all evidence tending to show any less or different liability upon the said Hawse than that appearing upon the face of said note."

What has been said in dealing with the first assignment of error is equally applicable to this instruction, and need not be repeated in this connection. The instruction was plainly erroneous. It practically excluded from the jury's consideration all of the evidence introduced by the defendant, and in effect told them that the only evidence to be considered by them was the note itself.

The evidence in the case, as already seen, tends strongly to show that M. A. Patrick, who was jointly liable with the defendant, was released from the note in suit by the bank, or at least with its knowledge and acquiescence. The question raised by this evidence should have been submitted, under proper instructions, to the jury, in order that they might determine from such evidence whether or not the defendant had thereby sustained his defense, and established his right to be released from liability for the note sued on.

The third assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence. As the case must be remanded for a new trial, we will not discuss the evidence further than has been found necessary in disposing of the first and second assignments.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

SMITH et al. v. MULLEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

DEEDS (§ 101*) — DESCRIPTION — PRACTICAL CONSTRUCTION.

Complainant's grantor purchased certain land from decedent, under whom defendant claimed, which the contract of sale described only as "40 acres of land, more or less, said land being part of Clifton [the name of a farm] and adjoining the lands of Alexander Pratt and Belvidere." The land was not surveyed, nor the boundaries fixed; but the parties went on it and, in the presence of witnesses, designated the lines and corners of the part intended to be sold, both expressing themselves as satisfied with the lines and corners then indicated, and with the body of land embraced within such limits. During the vendee's ownership, fences were built on the lines as indicated, which have been since maintained on those lines and regarded as showing the true boundaries. In a suit to settle the vendor's estate, a commissioner was appointed to convey the land, and his deed described it as 40 acres lying in the county of King George, and formerly a part of Clifton, adjoining and bounded by other lands of the vendor and certain others. It was afterwards ascertained that the tract so set off contained only 31.66 acres, and, the same having been conveyed to plaintiff, he sued to recover the balance. Held that, the land having been practically located, and neither the contract nor the commissioner's deed having contained a sufficiently definite description to enable a surveyor to locate it, plaintiff was bound by the practical location, and could not recover the deficiency in quantity.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Fredericksburg.

Suit by James B. Mullen and others against Galen R. Smith and others. Decree for complainants, and defendants appeal. Reversed and dismissed.

Alvin T. Embrey, for appellants. Wm. D. Carter, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. It appears from the record that prior to 1891 William Merrill owned a farm in King George county, known as "Clifton," containing about 400 acres; that on the 16th day of February, 1891, he entered into a contract in writing with Letcher Washington, by which he agreed to sell the latter 40 acres, more or less, of this farm. The only description contained in the contract of the land sold is: "Forty acres of land, more or less, said land being part of Clifton and adjoining the lands of Alexander Pratt and Belvidere." The contract does not clearly show what the aggregate purchase price was, but it is conceded that it was $200. No survey of the land sold to Washington was made, but the evidence shows that the parties went upon the ground at the time of the sale and agreed upon the lines and corners.

Merrill, the vendor, died about 1896, and a suit in equity was instituted in the circuit court of King George county to settle up his estate. At that time Letcher Washington had made payments on his purchase sufficient to reduce the balance due from him on the land to $109.34, which sum he paid to the administrator of William Merrill, and filed his petition in the pending chancery suit, setting up his purchase from Merrill under the contract of February 16, 1891, alleging the payment of the purchase money, and asking that a commissioner might be appointed to make him a deed. By decree of October 10, 1896, J. E. Mason, commissioner appointed for the purpose, was directed to "convey the said 40 acres of land with special warranty to the said Letcher Washington." By this same decree the sale of the Clifton farm, which had been sold by order of the court, was confirmed to the purchaser, Galen R. Smith, "after deducting the 40 acres purchased from Wm. Merrill, during his lifetime, by Letcher Washington." By deed of November 10, 1896, Mason, commissioner, conveyed to the purchaser "Clifton" farm, "containing by estimation, after deducting the aforesaid purchase of Letcher Washington, 300 acres, be the same more or less." Commissioner Mason did not make the deed as directed to Letcher Washington, and by deed of November 1, 1898, C. H. Ashton, substituted commissioner, conveyed to Washington "the said tract of land of 40 acres lying and situate in the county of King George, and formerly a part of what is known as Clifton farm, and which adjoins and is bounded by other land of the said Washington, the land of J. H. Carpenter and of J. M. Branigan, the Belvidere farm, and the residue of the Clifton farm."

In March, 1899, a final decree was entered in the cause, settling up the Merrill estate, and it was dismissed from the docket.

By deed dated June 10, 1904, Letcher Washington conveyed this land to the appellee James B. Mullen, describing it as a certain tract or lot of land conveyed to him by C. H. Ashton, commissioner, and giving practically the same description given in the deed from the commissioner to him. By deed of February 22, 1901, the appellant Galen R. Smith conveyed by metes and bounds, courses and distances, to the appellant J. H. Carpenter, 19.68 acres, it being part of the Clifton farm purchased by the grantor from the court. This conveyance is bounded by the Washington purchase on the upper side and the rear. In April, 1907, some 16 years after Washington's purchase, Mullen, his grantee, had the land surveyed for the first time, and found that, instead of 40 acres, the Washington tract only contained 31.66 acres, a difference of 8.34 acres. Thereupon Mullen, the appellee, instituted this chancery suit in the circuit court of King George county, alleging that he was entitled to 40 acres of land by virtue of his purchase from Washington, and asking that the court decide and determine the definite location of such 40 acres of land, and that the deed from Ashton, commissioner, to Washington, and the deed from Mason, commissioner, to the appellant Smith, be reformed so as to make them fix definitely the boundary of his said land.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The judge of the circuit court of King George county being so situated as to make it improper for him to hear and decide the cause, it was, by order entered May 5, 1908, removed to the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg, to be there heard and determined.

Since the institution of this suit, the appellee James B. Mullen has by deed dated December 16, 1909, conveyed the land purchased by him from Letcher Washington to Charles T. Purks, who has filed a petition herein setting up his rights as the grantee of Mullen, and asking that these rights be protected.

By decree of May 9, 1911, the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg held that the appellee James B. Mullen was entitled to the relief prayed for by him, and directed a surveyor, as special commissioner appointed for the purpose, to go upon the land, and, in accordance with the plat and survey made and filed by James B. Mullen with his bill, to run the lines so as to include in the Washington or Mullen tract 40 acres. The result of this order was to carve out of the tract of 19.68 acres owned by J. H. Carpenter 8.34 acres, in the shape of a triangle, which was added to the Mullen tract of 31.66 acres, thereby completing the 40 acres claimed by Mullen. The report of the surveyor and commissioner carrying out these directions of the court was, over the objection of the appellants, confirmed by decree of July 11, 1911. From these two decrees this appeal has been taken.

In his bill the plaintiff Mullen admits that no survey of the land sold to Washington was ever made. It is not controverted that Washington's purchase was an undefined portion of a 400-acre tract, with nothing in the contract to distinguish it from any other portion of the "Clifton" farm, except that it joined Alexander Pratt and "Belvidere," two other large farms adjoining "Clifton." The decree of the circuit court of King George county directing a deed to be made to Washington, and the deed made in pursuance of that decree, are as indefinite in description of the land as the contract in pursuance of which they were made. It would be impossible to locate the land intended to be sold by the description thereof in either the contract, the decree, or the deed. There is no evidence by which either the circuit court of King George or the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg could have told what lines to run in order to cut off Washington's 40 acres. The action of the corporation court was purely arbitrary.

It could as easily have decreed that Mullen's back line be moved west to include 40 acres, as to decree, as it did, that his side line and his back line be pulled out in a northerly direction until 40 acres were embraced, without anything to show that Merrill and Washington, the original vendor and vendee, ever contemplated any such figure of land or location of lines. It is clear that the contract set up in the bill and attempted to be proved is so vague and indefinite in its description of the land sold that it cannot be enforced by a court of equity. The agreement sought to be enforced must not only be clearly proved, but it must be certain and definite in all its parts. Its terms must be sufficiently precise to obviate any reasonable misunderstanding of their import, and if they be vague and uncertain a court of equity will decline to interfere to enforce it. Railroad Co. v. Lewis, 76 Va. 883; Tidewater Ry. Co. v. Hurt, 109 Va. 204, 63 S. E. 421.

In Westfall v. Cottrills, 24 W. Va. 763, a contract to sell and convey "40 acres off the Spring Fork end of my tract of 147 acres on Beech fork, in Calhoun county," was held to be too vague and indefinite to be specifically enforced.

In Blankenship v. Spencer, 31 W. Va. 510, 7 S. E. 433, "67½ acres, being the lower end of a larger tract," was held to be an insufficient description of the land sold for it to be enforced.

In the case of Butcher v. Creel's Heirs, 50 Va. 201, C. conveyed to B. 5 acres of land, including a mill and sawmill, "reserving to himself the right to build or erect a sawmill on the opposite side of the said river, or at the further end of the dam of the aforesaid saw and grist mill." It was held that there was no such certainty in the description of the land intended to be excepted out of the conveyance as to withdraw it from the operation of the deed.

In Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Co. v. Crane's Nest C. & C. Co., 102 Va. 405, 48 S. E. 393, where it appeared that the contract described no definite boundary, but called for "a certain piece of land lying on Sandy Ridge, in Wise county, Va., say 40 or 50 acres, more or less," out of a larger boundary, it was conceded that the contract was void for uncertainty in its description of the land referred to. See, also, Barnes v. Hustead, 219 Pa. 287, 68 Atl. 839; Hamilton v. Harvey, 121 Ill. 469, 13 N. E. 210, 2 Am. St. Rep. 119; Robeson v. Lewis, 64 N. C. 784; Rampke v. Beuhler, 208 Ill. 384, 67 N. E. 796.

In the cases cited, the contracts were held unenforceable because the description of the subject-matter was too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to be enforced. The contract, decree, and deed under which Mullen and Purks claim in the case before us, is not more certain, definite, and specific in its identification of the land intended to be sold than in the cases cited.

The evidence shows that at the time of the sale by William Merrill to Letcher Washington, in February, 1891, the parties went upon the land and in the presence of witnesses designated the lines and corners of the land intended to be bought and sold, and that both expressed themselves as satisfied with the lines and corners then indicated, and with the body of land embraced within those limits; that during Washington's ownership of the land fences were built upon the lines thus indicated by the parties, and have been ever since maintained upon those lines, and regarded as showing the true boundary of the land sold by Merrill to Washington. The parties by this practical location, assented to by both, fixed their lines, which were left indefinite in the written contract, and although, as shown by the recent survey made at the instance of Washington's grantee, the boundary contains less than the parties may have supposed, it is all that was definitely described as constituting the subject-matter of the contract, and Washington and his alienees cannot at this late day question the result of such practical location, but must abide by it as the only definite description of the land sold under the contract, the decree, and the deed relied on.

For these reasons, the decrees complained of must be reversed, and this court will enter such decree as the lower court ought to have entered, dismissing the original and amended bills filed by the appellee James B. Mullen.

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 59*)—"OWNER."

One who contracts to purchase land, pays part of the price, and takes possession under his contract, is an "owner" within Civ. Code 1902, § 3008, which gives a mechanic's lien for labor performed or materials furnished for a building under contract with, or consent of, the owner.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Thomas H. Ridgeway against N. G. Broadway, survivor of Broadway Brothers, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. Levi and Charlton Du Rant, both of Manning, for appellant. Davis & Weinberg, of Manning, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action to establish and foreclose a mechanic's lien for $124 for labor done and materials furnished by plaintiffs in the building of some barns, stables, sheds, and fences on a plantation while it was owned by Broadway Bros. The plantation originally belonged to P. B. Harvin, who, in the early part of 1909, contracted to sell it, for $10,000, to Broadway Bros., who paid $1,050 on the purchase price in cash and gave their note for the balance, due November 1, 1909, and took possession under their contract. They rented it to plaintiff for the year 1909, and during the year plaintiff alleges that, at their request, he did the work and furnished the materials for the value of which he is now suing and seeking to impress a lien upon the property. Some time before November 1, 1909, the date of the maturity of their note for the balance of the purchase money, Broadway Bros. sold the property to the defendants Walters for $12,000, and on that day, by agreement of all concerned, Harvin conveyed the plantation to Walters, who gave Harvin a first mortgage for the part of the purchase money left unpaid on that day, and he also gave N. G. Broadway, the survivor of Broadway Bros., a second mortgage for $4,000, which included what they had paid on the purchase price to Harvin and their profit on the sale to Walters. Subsequently Broadway assigned his mortgage to the defendant Davis.

The sole question presented by the appeal is whether, under the facts stated, Broadway Bros. were the "owners" of the plantation, when the improvements were made, in the sense in which that word is used in section 3008, vol. 1, Code 1902, which reads as follows: "Any person to whom a debt is due for labor performed or furnished, or for materials furnished and actually used in the erection, alteration, or repair of any building or structure upon any real estate, by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of, the owner, of such building or structure, or any person having authority from, or rightfully acting for, such owner, in procuring or furnishing such labor or materials, shall have a lien upon such building or structure, and upon the interest of the owner thereof in the lot of land upon which the same is situated, to secure the payment of the debt so due to him, and the costs which may arise in enforcing such lien under this chapter, except as is provided in the following sections."

The law is well settled that one who buys land, pays a part of the purchase price, and takes possession under his contract of purchase, is the owner of the land in equity. He may mortgage it, convey it to another, or devise it, and, if he dies intestate, it descends to his heirs. The vendor holds the legal title as trustee for the vendee, his heirs and assigns, and is bound to convey it upon performance or tender of performance of the contract of sale. Landrum v. Hatcher, 11 Rich. 54, 70 Am. Dec. 237; Roddy v. Elam, 12 Rich. Eq. 343; Whitmire v. Boyd, 53 S. C. 315, 31 S. E. 306.

We have no doubt that the Legislature intended the word "owner" to include the owner of the equitable as well as the owner of the legal title. 27 Cyc. 29; 20 A. & E. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 803.

1. RAILROADS (§ 844*)—HIGHWAY CROSSINGS—STATUTORY SIGNALS—FAILURE TO GIVE—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint against a railroad company, stating that plaintiff's decedent was crossing the company's tracks at a public crossing when he was struck by defendant's engine through defendant's negligence in failing to give any signal by ringing the bell or sounding the whistle in any way whatsoever of the approach of the engine, etc., sufficiently charged violation of

Civ. Code 1902, § 2132, which requires a bell to be rung or a whistle to be sounded at least 500 yards from the place where the railroad crosses any public highway, street, or traveled place, especially in the absence of a motion to make more definite and certain.

2. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—WANTONNESS—EVIDENCE.

Failure of enginemen to give the highway crossing signals required by Civ. Code 1902, § 2132, warrants submission to the jury of the issue of recklessness and wantonness in an action for death of a traveler struck by the locomotive at a crossing.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dorchester County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Ann C. Easterling, administratrix of J. B. Easterling, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mordecai & Gadsden and Rutledge & Hagood, both of Charleston, and Legare Walker, of Summerville, for appellants. Logan & Grace, of Charleston, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The exceptions raise only two questions: (1) Was this action brought under section 2132, vol. 1, Code 1902? (2) Did the court err in refusing to direct the verdict for defendants?

[1] Section 2132, so far as applicable to this case, reads: "A bell of at least thirty pounds weight and a steam whistle shall be placed on each locomotive engine, and such bell shall be rung, or such whistle sounded, by the engineer or fireman, at a distance of at least five hundred yards from the place where the railroad crosses any public highway or street or travelled place, and be kept ringing or whistling until the engine has crossed such highway or street or travelled place."

The complaint charges, in paragraph 4, that Easterling "was crossing a public crossing and traveled place," when he was struck and killed by an engine and train of cars operated by the defendant railroad company. In paragraph 5 it is alleged that his death was caused by the negligence, recklessness, and wantonness of the defendants in "failing and omitting to give any signal by ringing the bell or sounding the whistle, or in any other way whatsoever of the approach of said locomotive and train of cars to said public crossing or traveled place." These allegations are clearly sufficient to bring the case under the statute. The answer of defendants and the course of the trial clearly show that defendants were fully apprised of the fact that plaintiff intended to rely upon the statute. But if the allegations were so indefinite as to leave the matter in doubt, their remedy was by motion to make the complaint more definite and certain. Lee v. Railroad Co., 84 S. C. 140, 65 S. E. 1031.

[2, 3] There was abundant testimony to carry the case to the jury and to sustain the verdict. There was positive testimony that the crossing signals were not given. This was sufficient to compel submission to the jury of the issue of recklessness and wantonness (Mack v. Railway, 52 S. C. 323, 29 S. E. 905, 40 L. R. A. 679, 68 Am. St. Rep. 913; Osteen v. Railway, 76 S. C. 368, 57 S. E. 196), and therefore to prevent a non-suit or the direction of a verdict on the ground that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the testimony was that intestate was guilty of contributory negligence, because that is no defense to a reckless or wanton injury. Nor can it be said that the only inference to be drawn from the testimony is that intestate was "guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law, and that such gross or willful negligence or unlawful act contributed to the injury," so as to defeat a recovery under the provision of section 2139, Code 1902.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action to recover possession of a tract of land, which is claimed by plaintiffs as devisees under the will of their father, W. E. Altman, who died in 1890. The defendants claim from the same source, under a deed dated May 4, 1891, made to their father, C. C. Cummings, by the sheriff of Hampton county, in pursuance of a sale of the land as the property of W. E. Altman, under an execution issued upon a transcript of a judgment rendered by a trial justice against W. E. Altman in favor of W. S. Tillinghast. Cummings took possession about the time of his purchase and retained possession, until his death, in 1896. Since then the defendants have been in possession.

1. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON (§ 7*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On the trial of this case, which was a suit upon an open account, the question for determination was what amount, if any, was due the plaintiff after allowing the defendant proper credits upon the account for certain articles of merchandise which had been returned, and for the amounts collected, or which, in the exercise of due diligence, should have been collected, by the plaintiff upon an open account against a debtor of the defendant, which the latter had transferred to the plaintiff as collateral security; and it was error for the court, upon the trial of the case, to permit one of the defendants, over objections duly made, to testify that "he [the manager of the plaintiff corporation] stated that he [the manager] had his accounts insured, and that this suit he had brought was just a matter of form, which he had to go through with before he could collect his insurance; that his insurance covered a range of $1,000. I never heard of credit insurance before. There may be such a thing. It is new to me." This evidence was entirely irrelevant, and probably prejudicial to the plaintiff.

This is a motion to set aside a judgment, rendered in the absence of the defendant and her attorney, and to reinstate the case. The evidence before the judge was sufficient to support a finding that the defendant was lacking in diligence, and there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to vacate the judgment and reinstate the case.

NEW TRIAL (§ 116*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—TIME FOR FILING MOTION.

Under the express provision of section 6089 of the Civil Code of 1910, all applications for a new trial, except in extraordinary cases, must be made during the term at which the trial was had; and when the term continues longer than 30 days, the application shall be filed within 30 days from the trial. Where the party applying for a new trial did not file his application or motion within 30 days from the trial, the court did not err in dismissing the motion, although within less than 30 days counsel for the party prevailing at the trial entered a written acknowledgment of service, waiving a copy and all further service of the same; such acknowledgment of service not having the effect of curing the failure to comply with the requirements of the statute as to the time of filing the motion.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 637*)—RECORD—TIME FOR CERTIFICATE TO BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where, in a bill of exceptions, it is recited that the same was tendered within the time prescribed by law, the writ of error will not be dismissed because of the failure of the presiding judge to certify the same within the statutory period, unless it be made to appear that his failure to do so was caused by some act of the plaintiff in error or his counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2784, 2829; Dec. Dig. § 637.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 398*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TRANSFER CAUSE—PAUPER AFFIDAVIT.

In a citation by a legatee against an executor for a settlement before the ordinary, a personal judgment is intended. But if, instead of a personal judgment against the executor, a judgment against the assets of the estate in his hands is entered, and the executor enters an appeal to the superior court from such judgment by a pauper affidavit, in which he deposes that as executor he is unable to pay the costs or give the security required by law, such appeal will not be dismissed on the ground that it should have been made by the executor as an individual.

3. WILLS (§ 714*)—CONSTRUCTION—DEVISES TO CREDITORS.

A provision in a will as follows: "I desire that my present crop be appropriated to payment of the debt due J. T. Stephens, as he has been kind to me, and balance to my other creditors"—is not a legacy to the named creditor of an amount equal to his debt against the testator. It is the expression of the desire of the testator that, in the payment of his debts from a specific fund, the indebtedness of the named creditor shall be first extinguished.

4. WILLS (§ 755*)—CONSTRUCTION—"DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY"—"GENERAL LEGACY"—"SPECIFIC LEGACY."

A "demonstrative legacy" is one of a certain amount or quantity, the particular fund or personal property being pointed out from which it is to be paid or taken; it differing from a "general legacy" in that it does not abate upon insufficiency of assets, and from a "specific legacy" in that there is recourse for its payment from the general estate in the event of ademption.

Error from Superior Court, Campbell County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Petition by J. T. Stephens against James R. Thompson, as executor of the will of Samuel Thompson, for a rule nisi requiring an accounting and settlement of the petitioner's legacy. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill.

EVANS, P. J. [1] 1. On the call of the case in this court a motion was made to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the ground that it was tendered more than 30 days after the rendition of the judgment and the adjournment of court. The bill of exceptions recites that it was presented within the period allowed by law, and there is nothing in the record to negative the fact that, although the bill was certified more than 30 days after the judgment complained of, it was not presented within the statutory period. Under the ruling in Proctor v. Piedmont Portland Cement Co., 134 Ga. 391, 67 S. E. 942, the motion cannot prevail.

[2] 2. The case arose in this way: J. T. Stephens filed a petition to the court of ordinary, alleging that Samuel Thompson died testate, and his will was duly probated in solemn form; that James R. Thompson qualified as executor of the will, and has received large sums of money from the sale of real estate of his testator; and that petitioner is a legatee under the will, and is entitled to the sum of $250, or other large sum; and he prays a rule nisi against the executor for an accounting and settlement of his legacy. The executor answered the petition, denying that the plaintiff was a legatee in his testator's will. The ordinary adjudged that the plaintiff was a distributee of the estate of Thompson and entitled to receive $298.11, "which James R. Thompson, executor of Samuel Thompson, is due to J. T. Stephens. And it is ordered that, on the payment by the said James R. Thompson to J. T. Stephens of said amount of $298.11, he be relieved from said obligation by said Stephens, and on his failure to pay said sum of $298.11 within four days from this date that execution issue in favor of J. T. Stephens against James R. Thompson, executor of Samuel Thompson, deceased, to be made of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of said Samuel Thompson, to cover the said sum of $298.11, with all costs of these proceedings." The defendant entered an appeal to the superior court in forma pauperis, reciting that he is advised and believes that as such executor he has good cause of appeal, and that owing to the poverty of the estate of Samuel Thompson the defendant, as executor, is unable to pay the costs or give the security required by law in case of appeal. A motion was made in the superior court to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the judgment was personal against the executor, and that his affidavit in lieu of paying the costs or giving the bond was predicated, not upon his own poverty, but upon that of the estate which he represented. The court refused to dismiss the appeal.

The petition for settlement in the court of ordinary was against the executor, and the judgment rendered was a judgment, not against the executor de bonis propriis, but de bonis testatoris. In a citation proceeding in the court of ordinary for a settlement by a legatee against an executor, a personal judgment is intended; and if such a judgment is rendered, an appeal cannot be taken by the executor without paying costs and giving security, or making oath of his inability so to do. Hickman v. Hickman, 74 Ga. 401. But no personal judgment was rendered in this case. The judgment was rendered against the assets of the testator in his hands. If the executor had entered a personal appeal, he would have been met with the objection that there was no judgment against him, and therefore he could not appeal. As the judgment stood against the assets of his testator in his hands, the adverse party in the judgment is the estate of his testator, and the only appeal which could be entered was by the party adversely affected by the judgment. It may be true that the Code section (Civil Code, § 5009), which prescribes that an executor, when sued as such, or defending solely the title of the estate, may enter an appeal without paying costs and giving bond, does not apply. But Civil Code, § 5010, does provide for an appeal from a proceeding in the court of ordinary, by any party who will make and file an affidavit in forma pauperis as there described. The plaintiff, having entered up a judgment against the estate of the testator, should not be allowed to have an appeal in forma pauperis by the executor dismissed, and thus deny the adverse party to the judgment the privilege of an appeal. See Barfield v. Hartley, 108 Ga. 435, 33 S. E. 1010.

[3] 3. By consent the case was tried by the judge without the intervention of a jury, and the controlling question was the construction of the will of Samuel Thompson. It was the contention of the plaintiff, Stephens, that he was a legatee under the will. The executor denied that he took anything under the will as a legatee. The testator devised and bequeathed his property to his wife and children. The third item of his will contained this clause: "I desire that my present crop be appropriated to the payment of the debt due J. T. Stephens, as he has been kind to me, and balance to my other creditors." This is the clause of the will in which the plaintiff, Stephens, insists that the testator bequeathed to him as a legacy an amount equal to his debt.

[4] The Code declares: "A specific legacy is one which operates on property particularly designated. A gift of money to be paid from a specified fund is nevertheless a general legacy." Civil Code, § 3902. A demonstrative legacy is one of a certain amount or quantity; the particular fund or personal property being pointed out from which it is to be paid or taken. It differs from a general legacy in that it does not, in the first instance, abate upon insufficiency of assets, and from a specific legacy in that there is recourse for its payment from the general estate in the event of ademption. Gardner on Wills, 554; Hutchinson v. Fuller, 75 Ga. 88. The provision in the will was neither a specific nor a demonstrative legacy. The will was executed in the middle of the year, and this clause indicates the testator's purpose to have his debts paid from the crop of the current year, with the direction that his creditor, Stephens, shall be given a preference in priority of payment over his general creditors. The testator's language is clear that his present crop is appropriated to the payment of all of his debts; and it might be contended that all of his creditors were made legatees, to the extent of his indebtedness to them, with as much force as to say that the one who is named, and to whom the testator sought to give preference in payment, is a legatee. There is nothing in the context that requires a different construction; and we think the court erred in awarding judgment in favor of Mr. Stephens on the footing that he was a legatee.

Judgment reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill. All the Justices concur.

HEGWOOD v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 784*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

It is only where a case is solely dependent upon circumstantial evidence that the court is required to instruct the jury as to the law of such evidence. Accordingly, where the charge in the indictment is supported by both circumstantial and direct evidence, it is not error for the court to omit to give in charge the law of circumstantial evidence. Nobles v. State, 127 Ga. 212 (5), 56 S. E. 125.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1883-1888, 1922, 1960; Dec. Dig. § 784.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 784*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where, in a case dependent upon both positive and circumstantial evidence, the court gave in charge Pen. Code, § 1013, that, "whether dependent upon positive or circumstantial evidence, the true question in criminal cases is, not whether it is possible that the conclusion at which the testimony points may be false, but whether there be sufficient testimony to satisfy the mind and conscience beyond a reasonable doubt," such instruction was not erroneous because the court, in the absence of a request, failed to define to the jury the meaning of positive and circumstantial evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1883-1888, 1922, 1960; Dec. Dig. § 784.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 309*) — INSTRUCTIONS—DEGREES OF OFFENSE.

After giving the jury the definition of voluntary manslaughter as contained in the Penal Code, the court gave the following charge: "So you will observe that if the deceased * * * made an actual assault upon the defendant, or if the deceased attempted to commit a serious personal injury upon the defendant, or if there were other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion, the grade of the homicide, if there was a homicide, may be reduced to voluntary manslaughter." It was not cause for a new trial that the word "may" instead of "should" was used in the concluding paragraph of this charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-656; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

4. OTHER ASSIGNMENTS WITHOUT MERIT.

The other assignments of error upon the charge of the court are so clearly without merit as not to require further consideration.

BEACH v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 345*) — IMPEACHMENT — INDICTMENT.

While a witness may be discredited by proper proof that he has been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude (Powell v. State, 122 Ga. 571, 50 S. E. 369), it is not competent to discredit him by showing that he has been simply indicted for such an offense (Slappey v. Sumner, 136 Ga. 692, 71 S. E. 1075); and a mere arrest being a less formal and solemn charge, proof of it is so much the more inadmissible for such purpose (7 Enc. Ev. 308, and cases cited in note 24).

(a) Accordingly, on a trial for murder, it was error to permit a witness for the accused to testify on cross-examination, and over appropriate objection of the accused, as follows: "I have been arrested for lots of things—for fishing out of season; once for assault with intent to murder. Common little warrants from the magistrate don't count. They only count that come up here. The common warrants were for fishing out of season. * * * I was not up for shooting in the charge for assault with intent to murder against me. They claimed I hit the man with a bottle. No one saw it. One fellow said I did it, and he could not prove it. No witnesses saw it. About three or four fellows waylaid him, fellows from town."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1126-1128; Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 417*)—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF THIRD PERSON.

On the trial of one indicted for murder, the declarations of another person that he alone committed the offense are not admissible in evidence in favor of the accused. Robison v. State, 114 Ga. 445, 40 S. E. 253 (2).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 950-967; Dec. Dig. § 417.*]

3. WITNESSES (§§ 321, 380*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*) — IMPEACHMENT OF OWN WITNESS—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS.

Though a party may, under Civil Code, § 5879, impeach his own witness if he can show to the court that he has been entrapped by the witness by a previous contradictory statement, the rule does not apply where the testimony of a witness is not prejudicial to the party calling him. Nathan v. State, 131 Ga. 48, 61 S. E. 994 (3), and authorities cited.

(a) Accordingly, where a witness for the state, on a trial for murder, testified that he was present when the deceased was shot and killed, and that "I did not shoot him. I don't know exactly who shot him. The pistol shot came from where Jesse [the accused] and some other fellows were standing. A good many were standing there. I cannot say from whom the pistol shot came"—it was error, upon the statement of the solicitor general that he had been entrapped by the witness, to allow him to question the witness as to alleged contradictory statements made to the solicitor for the purpose of laying the foundation for impeaching him, and to substantially prove by another witness for the state that the witness whom it was sought to impeach had previously stated to the solicitor general that the shot that killed the deceased came from the accused.

(b) Such error was not cured by an instruction of the court to the jury that the testimony of the impeaching witness as to what was said by the witness so attacked was not to be considered as proving facts that the solicitor general thought the assailed witness would testify to, "but merely to show, if it does show, that the solicitor general was imposed upon or entrapped by the witness [sought to be impeached]; otherwise, he would not have put him upon the stand. That is the purpose of it."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1094, 1099, 1100, 1210-1219; Dec. Dig. §§ 321, 380.* Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129-3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—HOMICIDE (§ 308*) — INSTRUCTIONS — ASSUMPTION OF FACT.

On a trial for murder, where the contention of the accused was that he did not commit the homicide and that he was in no way concerned in it, it was not accurate to instruct the jury as follows: "Where a homicide was shown to have been committed, and no circumstances of extenuation or palliation were disclosed at the time of proof of the homicide, then a presumption arises that the killing was murder, and the burden would be upon the defendant to show that the offense committed under those circumstances was some less degree of crime or none at all." No presumption arises against the accused under the circumstances indicated, unless it be shown that he committed the homicide. The error in the instruction was not sufficiently cured by the fact that it was immediately followed by this language: "When you reach the conclusion that murder has been committed, the question then remains whether the defendant is the one who committed the murder."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1992-1995, 3158; Dec. Dig. § 823.* Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 642-647; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 11*) — EXISTENCE—SHARING PROFITS AND LOSSES.

Where the owner of a ginhouse and machinery turns over to another its management upon an agreement that the owner is not to share any losses resulting from the operation of the plant, but is to be paid for its use a sum equal to one-half of any net profits which may be received, no partnership relation is created, even as to third persons.

Error from City Court of Baxley; W. C. Lankford, Judge.

Action by W. L. Stone against Hall & Ham.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

W. W. Bennett and V. E. Padgett, both of Baxley, for plaintiffs in error. Parker & Highsmith, of Baxley, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The plaintiff delivered a lot of seed cotton to be ginned at a ginnery which he claimed was being operated by the defendants as partners. While stored in the gin the cotton was destroyed by fire, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict for its value, in an action sounding in tort, against both defendants as partners. The defendants are here upon a bill of exceptions complaining of the overruling of their motion for a new trial. The motion contains many grounds, but, under our view of the law, there are two controlling questions: (1) Were the defendants partners? (2) Was the plaintiff entitled, under the evidence, to recover?

[1] 1. The evidence in reference to the existence or nonexistence of a partnership between the defendants is not conflicting, and the facts may be gathered from the following testimony of the defendant Hall: "I had nothing at all to do with the running of that ginnery. I owned the gin. Ham run it. I had no connection with the management of this gin. I had nothing to do with employing the hands or paying them. If Mr. Ham made anything, he was to give me one-half of what he made out of it. Mr. Ham was to pay the debts for the running of it. If he didn't make anything, I didn't get anything. I wasn't to pay anything at all. I was to pay no expenses of the gin at all." In brief, Hall owned a gin and Ham undertook to operate it. If profit was made, Hall got half, but he was to sustain no part of any loss which the operation of the ginnery might entail. Under these facts, did the trial judge correctly apply the law in holding that Hall and Ham were partners as to the plaintiff?

The Code provides (Civil Code 1910, § 3158): "A joint interest in the partnership property, or a joint interest in the profits and losses of the business, constitutes a partnership as to third persons. A common interest in profits alone does not." By the plain letter of this statute there would seem to be no partnership relation between the defendants, for it is undisputed that Hall was not to share in the losses. But it is said that as Ham contributed to the enterprise all the labor, and supplied whatever expenses were necessary, he became jointly interested with Hall, the owner of the property, to such an extent as to make them partners as to third persons. It is, however, settled by decisions of the Supreme Court that the ordinary arrangement between a landlord and a cropper does not create the partnership relation, even as to third persons, though the cropper is to furnish all the labor, and receive half the net profits after paying the expense of making the crop. Gurr v. Martin, 73 Ga. 528; De Loach v. Delk, 119 Ga. 884, 47 S. E. 204. This is the exact situation here, and these decisions are in principle controlling. In Dawson National Bank v. Ward, 120 Ga. 861, 48 S. E. 313, it appeared that Ward owned a warehouse and placed Gurr in charge to manage it under an agreement to divide the profits. They were sued as partners, and the court held: "A contract whereby one conducting a cotton warehouse business in his own name and on his own account agrees with another that the latter shall attend personally to the business, and receive as compensation for his services a given proportion of the net profits, does not create a partnership. The proportion of profits given to him who attends to the business without having an interest in the same is merely the measure of wages for the service rendered." See, also, the recent case of Cowart v. Fender, 137 Ga. 586, 73 S. E. 822. The defendant in error relies upon Brandon v. Conner, 117 Ga. 759, 45 S. E. 371, 63 L. R. A. 260, but in that case it appeared that each of the persons contributed property to the common enterprise, and this distinction is pointed out in Dawson National Bank v. Ward, supra. The decision in the Brandon Case, supra, is apparently somewhat of a departure from the letter of the statute, and the subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court indicate an unwillingness to extend that decision so as to cover a case like the present. The real meaning and intent of the contract between Hall and Ham was that Ham should have the use of Hall's gin, and pay Hall, as compensation for such use, a sum to be measured by one-half of whatever profits flowed from the enterprise. So construing it, it is clear to our minds that they were not partners, and, as there was nothing in the evidence to indicate that Hall had done or said anything to estop him to deny the partnership relation, a verdict should have been directed in his favor upon his plea of no partnership.

[2] 2. We are of opinion, however, that the verdict was warranted against Ham. "In all cases of bailment, after proof of loss, the burden is on the bailee to show proper diligence." Civil Code 1910, § 3469. "All bailees are required to exercise care and diligence in protecting and keeping safely the thing bailed. Different degrees of diligence are required, according to the nature of the bailments." Civil Code 1910, § 3470. Fire was discovered in the gin about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and, was apparently extinguished. Indeed, the plaintiff himself during the course of the afternoon brought several hundred pounds of cotton, and stored them in the ginhouse. Stone himself testified: "The last time I went in there that afternoon before Mr. Ham closed up was just before night. I was vitally interested in that fire and cotton. I looked pretty well for fire. I looked everywhere I thought there could be any fire. I tried to see that it was out. Any man with that much money at stake would have done the same thing." Ham remained in and about the house until about 10 o'clock at night, when he went home without leaving any one at the gin to watch for fire. The testimony indicates that before going he made the most careful examination for fire, and reached the conclusion that it had been extinguished. The ginhouse was burned about midnight, and the plaintiff's cotton destroyed. Under the evidence the jury might well have found that Ham had rebutted the presumption of negligence arising against him from proof of the loss of the cotton; but we are not prepared to say that they were bound to do so. The degree of diligence varies with the nature of the bailment, and questions of negligence and diligence are peculiarly for the jury. Cotton is inflammable, and the well-known fact that a hidden spark may smoulder for hours, and sometimes even for days, before developing into a flame, authorized the jury to find that Ham was lacking in the degree of diligence which the nature of the bailment required in leaving the house without a watchman, even though he in good faith believed the fire had been extinguished. While it does not affirmatively appear that the destruction of the house was the result of a continuation of the fire which began in the afternoon, the jury were authorized to infer that this was the case. We would not set aside the verdict upon the ground that it is unsupported by any evidence. See Net-zow Mfg. Co. v. Sou. Ry. Co., 7 Ga. App. 163, 66 S. E. 399; Atlantic Compress Co. v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 135 Ga. 140, 68 S. E. 1028.

3. With the exception of the ruling of the trial judge upon the question of partnership, we find no material error in the record. The law of hiring, as embraced in section 3476 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910, has no application to the case.

WILLIAMS v. STATE. (No. 4,085.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 5, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 84*) — JURISDICTION—TRANSFER OF CAUSES.

In answer to a certified question from the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court has instructed that so much of the act of August 18, 1911 (Acts 1911, p. 229), amending the act creating the city court of Blakely, as provides that the judge of the superior court shall transfer to the city court for trial a true bill for a misdemeanor which has been returned by the grand jury in a case which originated in the city court, but in which, under the provisions of the amendatory act, a demand for an indictment was entered by the defendant, is unconstitutional and void. There was, therefore, no error in the present case in refusing to transfer to the city court for trial the indictment which had been returned by the grand jury against the plaintiff in error.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence fully authorized the verdict, and the motion for a new trial, based solely upon the general grounds, was properly overruled.

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

W. W. Wright, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Laing, Sol. Gen., of Dawson, and R. R. Arnold, of Atlanta, for the State.

POTTLE, J. By the act approved August 18, 1911, amending the act creating the city court of Blakely, it was provided that, upon the original call of any criminal case in that court, the defendant shall have a right to demand an indictment by the grand jury, and that such demand shall be allowed and the case referred to the grand jury for investigation, unless the defendant shall fail to give bond within five days, in which event the city court may proceed to try the case notwithstanding the demand for indictment. It was further provided in the act that, "if the grand jury return a true bill for a misdemeanor in the matter, the judge of the superior court shall transfer the same to the city court for trial." Acts 1911, p. 229.

The plaintiff in error was arraigned in the city court, and upon the original call of the case entered a demand for indictment by the grand jury. The demand was duly allowed, and a true bill was thereafter returned by the grand jury, charging the defendant with the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. Upon arraignment in the superior court under the indictment, the accused demanded that the case should be transferred to the city court for trial, basing his demand upon the above-recited provision of the act of 1911. The judge of the superior court declined to transfer the indictment to the city court, and his refusal to do so is made the basis of one of the assignments of error in the reviewing court. The accused was convicted, and his motion for new trial was overruled.

[2] The only assignment of error in the motion for new trial is that the verdict was without evidence to support it; but, in view of the fact that one of the witnesses for the state testified positively that on December 2, 1911, he and another person bought a half pint of rye whisky from the accused, there is manifestly no merit in this assignment of error.

[1] Really the only point which counsel for the plaintiff in error insisted upon was that the trial judge erred in refusing to transfer the indictment to the city court for trial. This assignment of error involved a consideration of the constitutionality of the provision in the local amendatory act requiring the judge of the superior court to transfer the indictment to the city court for trial, and this question was certified by the Court of Appeals to the Supreme Court for instruction, as we are required to do under the terms of the constitutional amendment creating this court. The Supreme Court has accordingly instructed the Court of Appeals that so much of the act of August 18, 1911, amending the act creating the city court of Blakely, as requires the judge of the superior court to transfer to the city court for trial all indictments in cases where accusations have been filed in the city court and demands for indictment have been made and allowed, is unconstitutional and void, in that it seeks to deprive the superior court of jurisdiction with which it is vested by the Constitution of the state. It is well settled that the superior court may transfer to the city court any indictment charging a misdemeanor, but a law which seeks to make this act on the part of the court mandatory is unconstitutional and void. There was, therefore, no error in refusing to transfer the indictment in the present case, nor will the judgment of the court below, overruling the motion for a new trial, be disturbed.

EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—SALES—WARRANTY.

Where an instrument in the form of a note and mortgage is executed to secure payment of the purchase price of a mule, and in the instrument the purchaser stipulates to pay for the mule if it should die, and that, in consideration of credit extended, risk of death is assumed, and the mule is bought on the "judgment" of the purchaser, the latter is not, upon the death of the mule, entitled to prove an express warranty of soundness by the seller, and defeat the purchase price on account of a breach of such warranty.

Error from City Court of Cartersville; A. M. Foute, Judge.

Action by Jones & Oglesby against John L. Cochran. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Finley & Henson, of Cartersville, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Norris, of Cartersville, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. An instrument was executed in the form of a note and mortgage to secure payment of the purchase price of two mules. The instrument obligated the purchaser to pay $25 per month until the whole amount should be paid. It contained the further stipulation: "I or we insure the good condition and safe-keeping of said property, and will pay if it be lost, damaged, or destroyed, and, if live stock, will pay though it may die. I or we assume said risk in consideration of the credit extended, and purchase the property on my or our own judgment." One of the mules died. The mortgage was foreclosed, and the purchaser pleaded in defense that the seller had expressly warranted the soundness of the mule, and that the mule had died from a disease which it had at the time of the sale. The issue was submitted to the jury, and they found against the defendant. His motion for a new trial contains several grounds, but they will not be specially noticed, since we are clearly of the opinion that the terms of the written contract precluded the defense relied on.

Where a note is given for the purchase price of an article, and the terms of the sale are not set forth in the note, parol proof of an express warranty and a breach thereof does not violate the rule forbidding the variation of or addition to a written contract by parol evidence. In such a case the contract of sale is in parol, and the note is simply evidence of the indebtedness. Pryor v. Ludden & Bates Co., 134 Ga. 288, 67 S. E. 654, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267. But where the note purports to contain the contract of sale, and sets forth the warranty made, or that the seller did not warrant the soundness or suitability of the thing sold, the parties have reduced their contract to writing, and it cannot be varied by parol. McNeel v. Smith, 106 Ga. 215, 32 S. E. 119, and cit. If the statement in the written instrument, that the purchaser would pay though the mule should die, had stood alone, the words, "from a cause not existing at the date of the sale," might be superadded, as expressing the intention of the parties. Whigham v. Hall, 8 Ga. App. 509, 70 S. E. 23. But when the purchaser, in consideration of credit extended, added to the stipulation to pay if the mule died the statement that he purchased the property on his own judgment, no other construction of the terms of the sale is admissible than that he did not rely on any statements or warranties by the seller, but acted on his own judgment, based upon his own examination, and upon his own knowledge and experience. A finding in favor of the plaintiff was demanded, the plaintiff in error was not entitled to an abatement of the purchase price, the right result was reached, and, if any errors were committed, they were harmless.

(No. 4,175.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXPLOSIVES (§ 12*)—BLASTING—NEGLIGENCE.

While excavating a ditch, the defendant's agent placed a charge of dynamite for the purpose of removing rock imbedded in the soil. The ditch was adjacent to a public highway near which the plaintiff was operating a store. Near the store, and within range of vision of the defendant's agent, the plaintiff's mare was hitched. The dynamite was discharged, and as a consequence thereof a rock weighing 45 pounds was thrown a distance of 300 feet, and injured the plaintiff's mare. Held, that if the defendant's agent knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, of the dangerous proximity of the plaintiff's mare, it was negligent for him to discharge the dynamite at all while the mare was there, without regard to whether the defendant was negligent in reference to the quantity of dynamite used, or in the manner in which the load was discharged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. EXPLOSIVES (§ 12*)—NEGLIGENCE—BLASTING.

There being evidence that, if properly placed and discharged, a load sufficiently large to accomplish the purpose designed by the defendant would not have projected a rock weighing 45 pounds a distance of 300 feet, the maxim "res ipsa loquitur" was applicable, and the jury were authorized to infer that the defendant was negligent, either in reference to the quantity of explosive used, or in the manner in which it was placed and discharged. Payne v. Rome Coca-Cola Co., 10 Ga. App. 762, 73 S. E. 1087.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 825*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARACTER OF ACCUSED.

The trial judge instructed the jury on the subject of evidence relating to the good character of the accused as follows: "There has been proof of good character of the defendant submitted in evidence. You consider that testimony along with the other testimony in the case, and endeavor to arrive at the truth of the transaction." Held, this instruction was not erroneous. The question is fully controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Brazil v. State, 117 Ga. 32, 43 S. E. 460. Certainly, in the absence of a written request for a more specific charge as to the weight and effect which the jury would be authorized to give to evidence of good character, the instruction was sufficient on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2005; Dec. Dig. § 825.*]

2. LARCENY (§ 64*) — CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY—APPEAL—REVIEW.

The jury were authorized to infer guilt, from the possession of property which had been recently stolen, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation by the accused of his possession. In the present case the explanation which the accused gave of his recent possession seems to have been reasonable; but this question was exclusively for the determination of the jury, and this court is not authorized to grant a new trial because the jury refused to accept as satisfactory the explanation given of the possession of the property. While the evidence is exceedingly weak, yet, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation, the recent possession of the stolen property, and the inference arising therefrom, furnish sufficient evidence to support the verdict, and, as no material error of law was committed on the trial, the judgment must be affirmed.

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 107*)—PATENT RIGHTS—REGULATION OF SALE.

A promissory note, given for the right to sell a patented article in specified territory, is not, under the provisions of sections 4293 and 4294 of the Civil Code of 1910, void because there is not expressed in the face of the note "the consideration of the same, stating the thing or article for which the same was given." The purpose of the law contained in these sections of the Code was to place a purchaser of a note expressing on its face such a consideration in the same position as the payee with reference to its enforcement. If the consideration is not so expressed, the right to enforce the note is governed by the same rules as are applicable to a note founded upon any other valid consideration. Parr v. Erickson, 115 Ga. 873, 42 S. E. 240; Lee v. Hightower, 3 Ga. App. 226, 59 S. E. 597; Simmons v. Council, 5 Ga. App. 386, 389, 63 S. E. 238.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 107*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ORAL GUARANTY.

It is no defense to an action brought by the payee upon a promissory note, the consideration of which, though not expressed on its face, was the right to sell a patented clothesline in a certain county, that the wire bought by the purchaser to make the clothesline rusted, and the seller orally guaranteed that such wire, if used, would not rust, but would be suitable for the purpose intended.

KIDD et al. v. VIRGINIA SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CORPORATION et al.

1. CONTEMPT (§ 60*) — CRIMINAL OR QUASI CRIMINAL CONTEMPT—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

The rules of evidence applicable in criminal cases apply to a proceeding to punish for a criminal or quasi criminal contempt for the violation of a decree of court, and the offense must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; and one cannot be punished summarily for contempt, without being brought clearly within Code 1904, § 3768, defining cases in which courts may punish for contempt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 182-187; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. CONTEMPT (§ 23*)—VIOLATION OF DECREE.

A decree appointing a receiver of a bank, in a suit in which a depositor of a branch bank and her husband were not parties, contained no prohibition against the wife or husband. The manager of the branch was notified of the appointment and instructed to close the branch. The husband of the depositor, suspecting that something was wrong with the bank, sought out the manager, who told him that the bank was in trouble. The husband discovered that the manager had money enough to cash his wife's certificate, and obtained the cash therefor without any promise to refund the money. The wife had no knowledge of the transaction. Held, that the husband and wife were not guilty of contempt for violating the decree; it not appearing that the decree was personally served on defendants, or that they had actual notice of its rendition.

3. CONTEMPT (§ 79*)—PUNISHMENT.

The court, in a proceeding to punish for contempt, based on obtaining payment of a certificate of deposit after the appointment of a receiver of the bank, has no jurisdiction, where the evidence does not show defendant guilty of contempt, to require the refund of the money and imprison him until payment; imprisonment for debt being abolished by Code 1849, c. 188, § 2.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Alexandria.

E. L. Kidd and others were convicted of contempt of court for violating a decree of court in a suit instituted by the directors of the Virginia Safe Deposit & Trust Corporation against the corporation, and E. L. Kidd and wife appeal. Reversed as to appellants.

Coleman, Easley & Coleman, for appellants. J. K. M. Norton and S. G. Brent, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. This appeal is from the decree of July 21, 1911, directing appellants, E. L. Kidd and F. H. Kidd, his wife, and R. Lee Camden, who is not a party to this appeal, to restore and pay over to the receivers $2,193.33, with interest from December 29, 1910, and costs. The decree furthermore provides that, unless said payment be made within 30 days from its date, the parties shall be attached and imprisoned until the same be satisfied, unless sooner released by order of the court or judge.

The suit in which the foregoing decree was entered was instituted by the directors, who were also stockholders, of the Virginia Safe Deposit & Trust Corporation, against the corporation, alleging, among other things, that owing to the illness of the president of the corporation they were unable to carry on the business, though the assets were ample to meet all obligations, and praying for the appointment of a receiver or receivers, and that the assets be collected, and the affairs of the corporation wound up, under the orders of the court. The chief office of the corporation was in the city of Alexandria, but there were numerous branches in various parts of the state (one at Lovings-ton, Nelson county), where deposits of money were received and the corporation conducted business as a banking and bonding company.

On December 28, 1910, the court passed a decree appointing John S. Barbour and J. K. M. Norton receivers to take charge of the assets; and all officers, agents, and employees of the corporation and its branches were ordered to turn over to the receivers all property of the corporation in their possession or under their control.

The right of the plaintiffs to maintain this suit is strenuously controverted by the appellants, but in our view of the situation it is unnecessary to express any opinion on that branch of the case.

On June 10, 1911, the receivers filed a report, reciting that they had recently ascertained that after their appointment, and with full knowledge thereof by R. Lee Camden, manager of the Lovings-ton branch, and by appellants, he had paid to E. L. Kidd, as agent for his wife, F. H. Kidd, on two certificates of deposit, $2,193.33. This report was made the ground for a proceeding against these parties for contempt. Rules were accordingly awarded against them, answers filed, and evidence taken, upon which the decree under review was entered.

[1] The object of this proceeding is to punish the appellants for an alleged contempt, and it is criminal or quasi criminal in its nature, and the rules of evidence applicable in criminal cases prevail. Mere preponderance of evidence is not sufficient to convict, but the offense charged must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. See note to Wells v. Commonwealth, 62 Va. (Va. Rep. Ann.) 893. So that the parties must be brought clearly within the terms of the statute (Va. Code 1904, § 3768) before they can be punished summarily for contempt.

[2] Tested by the foregoing standard, the salient facts are these: On December 29, 1910, Camden received a telegram, signed C. J. Rixey, President, and J. K. M. Norton and John S. Barbour, Receivers (repeated over the telephone from the railway station), advising him that receivers had been appointed for the parent bank the previous evening, and instructing him to close the doors of his branch, to receive no further deposits, and to transmit all funds on hand to the receivers. E. L. Kidd caught two words of the telephone message to Camden, namely, "Barbour, Receiver." These he testified had no significance to him, yet he afterwards overheard a conversation between Camden and Roberts with reference to the payment of two small checks, which arrested his attention and led him to suspect that something was wrong with the bank; but there was nothing in the conversation to induce the belief that suit had been brought or receivers appointed. He then sought Camden, who told him he thought the bank was in trouble. Kidd immediately asked the manager if he had money enough to cash his wife's certificates and would pay them. Receiving an affirmative reply to both questions, he went to his house, and, without mentioning the subject to his wife, got the certificates, returned to the bank, which was still open, and collected his wife's money. No promise was exacted and none given to refund this money. With respect to Mrs. Kidd, she neither knew nor had any reason to suspect that the bank was in trouble at the time her certificates were paid. At that time the record presents this situation: The appellants were not parties to the suit, and had no knowledge of its existence or the appointment of the receivers; and the decree appointing the receivers contained no direction, mandate, or prohibition to or against them, or either of them. The appellants, therefore, were not guilty of disobedience or resistance of the decree of the court.

In 9 Cyc. 12, it is said: "In order to punish a person for contempt of court for violation of an order, judgment, or decree, it must appear that such order, judgment, or decree has been personally served on the one charged, or that he has had actual notice of the making of such order or rendition of such judgment or decree." 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 54, 55; Pettibone v. U. S., 148 U. S. 197, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419.

In Taliaferro v. Horde, 22 Va. 242, it was held: "An attachment for contempt in disobedience of a decree * * * will only lie for what is decreed, and not for what may be decreed."

[3] We are of opinion that the evidence was not sufficient to find the appellants guilty of the contempt with which they were charged, and inasmuch as imprisonment for debt passed from our statute books with the abolition of the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum in 1849 (Va. Code 1849, § 2, p. 716), it was error to require them in this proceeding to refund the money in controversy.

The revisors, in referring to the measures to be substituted for the writ of ca. sa., express the opinion that the rights of creditors will be better protected, "at the same time that we get rid of the system of imprisonment for debt, which is regarded by so many as inconsistent with the liberal and enlightened spirit of the age." Report of Revisors, p. 843.

Our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that the decree of July 21, 1911, so far as it affects the appellants, is erroneous, and must be reversed, and the contempt proceeding as to them dismissed.

Reversed in part.

2. TRUSTS (§ 77*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY.

Where it is sought to establish a resulting trust by the payment of purchase money, the trust must arise at the time of the execution of the conveyance by a payment in advance of the purchase money, before or at the time of the purchase, as a subsequent payment cannot by relation attach a trust to the original purchase; the trust arising out of the fact that the money of the real and not of the nominal purchaser formed at the time the consideration of the purchase and was converted into land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 109; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 79*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY.

Where a resulting trust in land is sought to be established by a payment of a part of the consideration, the evidence must clearly show the exact portion of the whole price that was so paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 111, 112; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

4. TRUSTS (§ 89*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—PURCHASE OF LAND—CONTRIBUTION TO PRICE.

Where the only contribution made by complainant to the purchase of certain lands by E. and conveyed to defendant corporation was the proceeds of two notes made by E., indorsed by complainant and discounted by a bank, and it was shown that such money was borrowed for E.'s personal accommodation, and that defendant had no knowledge of any claim of complainant, or of business relations between complainant and E., until the suit was brought, the evidence was insufficient to charge the land with a resulting trust for complainant's benefit to the extent of the amount of such notes.

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 428*)—OFFICERS—KNOWLEDGE—PERSONAL TRANSACTIONS.

Where the president of defendant corporation sold certain of his own property to it, and in such transaction acted for himself, and not for the corporation, and there was no showing that he was authorized to buy or sell real property for or to the corporation, it was not charged with knowledge that complainant had contributed to the purchase of the land, so as to charge it with a resulting trust for complainant's benefit to the extent of his contribution.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Suit by A. T. Lee against R. H. Elliott & Company, Incorporated. Decree for defendant, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

John N. Sebrell, Jr., and J. Edward Cole, for appellant. Jeffries, Wolcott, Wolcott & Lankford, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The record shows that for several years prior to 1905 R. H. Elliott and J. W. Hammond were partners under the firm name of R. H. Elliott & Co., in the business of oyster packing in the city of Norfolk. It further appears that on January 13, 1904, the Norfolk Willoughby Bay Company conveyed to R. H. Elliott and A. T. Lee a tract of 6 acres of land, the purchase price of which was $6,250, and that on April 10, 1905, Edward Spalding, trustee, conveyed to R. H. Elliott 33 acres of oyster ground in Little Bay, Norfolk county, and on February 1, 1906, the Norfolk Willoughby Bay Company conveyed to R. H. Elliott 18 lots adjoining the 6 acres which had been conveyed by it to R. H. Elliott and A. T. Lee jointly. In 1904 or 1905 it was determined to convert the firm of R. H. Elliott & Co. into a corporation for the purpose of carrying on the oyster packing and oyster planting business. This was done, the name of the corporation being R. H. Elliott & Co., Incorporated. In 1907 the stock of the company was increased, and about that time A. T. Lee conveyed, unconditionally and without reservation, his undivided half interest in the 6-acre tract to R. H. Elliott, who in turn conveyed to the newly incorporated company the 6-acre tract, the 18 lots, and the 33 acres of oyster ground, the title to each of which was in him, for the price of $12,000, which was paid to him as follows: Three thousand dollars in the stock of the company, $5,000 in cash, and a note of the company payable to Elliott for $1,800; the balance of the $12,000 being represented by the indebtedness of R. H. Elliott to the company.

On the 5th day of September, 1907, the company borrowed from Miss Cutter $5,000, secured by deed of trust on the 6-acre tract and the 33 acres of oyster ground. In addition to the expenditure of the money raised by the sale of its increased stock, the company borrowed from Miss Fitzgerald and Hammond, two of its stockholders, $4,000 for its purposes.

R. H. Elliott was the president and general manager of the corporation, and was allowed much latitude in the conduct of its affairs. About two years after the transactions mentioned it was found that the company was doing a losing business, its assets being dissipated, and that further effort to carry on the business would result in additional financial trouble. Thereupon the company determined to sell its property, pay its debts, and distribute any balance among its stockholders, and to this end advertised the property for sale.

When the property was advertised for sale, A. T. Lee filed the bill in this cause, alleging that he and R. H. Elliott had purchased the three pieces of property involved in this controversy jointly, and that one-half the consideration for all of the property had been paid by the complainant, and the title thereto conveyed to R. H. Elliott merely for convenience; that these facts created a resulting trust in favor of the complainant in all of the property, to the extent of an undivided one-half interest therein, and to an equitable lien upon all of the property for certain sums advanced by him upon the purchase price thereof. In response to the prayer of the bill an injunction was awarded, restraining the defendant company from selling the property until the cause was prepared and heard upon its merits, when a decree was entered dismissing the bill. From that decree this appeal has been taken.

The questions presented by the appeal are: (1) Do the facts and circumstances alleged in the bill and established by the evidence sustain the plaintiff's claim of a resulting trust in his favor? and (2) did the defendant corporation have notice thereof, when it purchased the property from R. H. Elliott?

[1, 2] It is well settled that, though a resulting trust may be established by parol evidence, it must be clear and explicit, and such as to leave no doubt of the character of the transaction. Where the trust does not arise on the face of the deed, but is raised upon the payment of the purchase money, which creates a trust which is to override the deed, the proof must be very clear, and mere parol evidence ought to be received with great caution. A resulting trust must arise at the time of the execution of the conveyance. Payment in advance of the purchase money, before or at the time of the purchase, is indispensable. A subsequent payment will not, by relation, attach a trust to the original purchase; for the trust arises out of the circumstance that the moneys of the real, and not the nominal, purchaser formed at the time the consideration of that purchase, and became converted into land. Miller v. Blose, 71 Va. 744; Jesser v. Armentrout, 100 Va. 686, 42 S. E. 681; Coons v. Coons, 106 Va. 572, 56 S. E. 576.

[3] In 3 Pomeroy's Eq. (3d Ed.) § 1040, the learned author says: "It is settled by a complete unanimity of decision that such evidence must be clear, strong, unequivocal, unmistakable, and must establish the fact of the payment by the alleged beneficiary beyond a doubt. Where the payment of only a part is claimed, the evidence must show, in the same clear manner, the exact portion of the whole price which was paid."

[4] In the case under consideration, the evidence wholly fails to measure up to the standard prescribed by the authorities cited. The only money which the bill alleges was paid by the complainant, and the only money the evidence attempts to show that he paid for any purpose, was the proceeds of two notes for $3,000 each, made by R. H. Elliott and indorsed by the complainant, which were discounted by the National Bank of Commerce. These notes it is shown were made up of sundry smaller loans negotiated at different times and finally consolidated into the two notes mentioned. The bill alleges that the purpose of negotiating these notes was "to raise money to take up the floating indebtedness and assist the business of the corporation," and that complainant was "informed that the proceeds of said notes went to the credit of R. H. Elliott & Co., Incorporated, with the distinct understanding with R. H. Elliott, then president of the corporation, that as soon as the mortgage could be arranged this sum of $6,000, representing part of the purchase price of the above real estate and the oyster grounds, should be taken up and paid for, and an accounting made with complainant for his interest in the property."

This is a vague and uncertain allegation to form the basis of the resulting trust claimed in his favor by the complainant. The evidence adduced in support of the alleged resulting trust is wholly inadequate to sustain the claim. The deposition of the complainant is obscure and uncertain, and shows the impossibility of ascertaining with any degree of accuracy how the proceeds of the money borrowed from the bank by R. H. Elliott, with the complainant as his indorser, was applied, or what part of it went into the land in which he claims a resulting trust. The complainant admits that no part of it went into the purchase price of the 18 lots, and there is nothing to show that any part of it went into the purchase price of the oyster grounds, nor is it made to appear how much, if any part thereof, was used to pay off the indebtedness against the 6-acre tract.

The only other witness introduced by the complainant was R. H. Elliott, whose evidence shows that the two notes of $3,000 each, discounted by the bank, was a personal indebtedness of his own, with the complainant as his indorser; it being the consolidation of various sums borrowed by him on complainant's indorsement, some of it borrowed prior to the existence of the defendant corporation, and part of it afterwards. He states that the proceeds of these notes was used by him, either to purchase stock in the defendant corporation, or was used by him in the affairs of that corporation, and that, whenever the same was used in the business of the defendant corporation, it was entered on their books to his credit, and was withdrawn from time to time and charged to his account; that none of said notes or checks have ever been payable to R. H. Elliott & Co., Incorporated, but have always been personal matters between himself and the complainant, A. T. Lee.

[5] The conclusion from this evidence is irresistible that this $6,000, represented by the two notes, of $3,000 each, indorsed by the complainant, was borrowed for the personal accommodation of the maker, R. H. Elliott, and that this effort to set up a resulting trust in the lands of the defendant corporation in favor of the complainant must fail for want of proof at all adequate to sustain the claim. The evidence satisfactorily shows that the defendant corporation had no knowledge of the claim of the complainant or of the business relations and transactions between himself and R. H. Elliott until after this suit was brought. Knowledge is sought to be imputed to the corporation because Elliott was its president. In the transactions herein involved, Elliott was not acting in the regular course of his business as the president of the company. There is no evidence that he was authorized to buy or sell real estate for or to the corporation. On the contrary, he was dealing for himself in selling his property to the company, and under such circumstances his knowledge cannot be imputed to the company.

In 10 Cyc. p. 1063, the law is stated as follows: Knowledge by an officer or agent, while acting for himself and adversely to the corporation, is not imputable to the corporation, for the reason that the officer or agent is interested in concealing it from his principal; and consequently the law will not presume that he has communicated it. Where an officer is acting for himself in a transaction with the corporation, he is regarded as a stranger to the corporation, dealing as if he had no official relation with it. When, therefore, an officer, director, or agent of a corporation deals with the corporation for himself, in his private capacity, any uncommunicated knowledge which he may have in respect of the transaction will not be imputed to the latter by reason of his possession of it.

It is contended that the books of the company showed that the complainant was connected with the matter. It clearly appears that the name of the complainant never at any time appeared on the books of the company, and the testimony shows conclusively that the books contained nothing to suggest that he had any interest whatever in the lands or business affairs of the company.

Upon the whole case, there is no error in the decree complained of, and it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

STATE v. TYGARTS VALLEY BREWING CO.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 10, 1912.)(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 224)—ILLEGAL SALE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

On an indictment for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors without a state license therefor, it is not incumbent on the state to prove that defendant had no license to sell. If a sale be proven, it is presumed to have been made without license, and, to justify it, defendant must produce his license.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 148*)—LICENSES—SALES AT BREWERY.

License to carry on a brewery in a place where no license to sell intoxicating liquors can be lawfully granted does not authorize a sale of beer at wholesale at the brewery.

Brannon, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Taylor County.

The Tygarts Valley Brewing Company was convicted of an illegal sale of beer without a license, and brings error. Affirmed.

F. T. Martin, for plaintiff in error. William G. Conley, Atty. Gen., and J. O. Henson, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, J. The Tygarts Valley Brewing Company was convicted of making an unlawful sale of beer, in wholesale quantity, without a state license therefor, in September, 1909, in the city of Grafton, Taylor county, and brings error.

[1] The state established a prima facie case by proving that defendant made a sale of eight gallons of beer at its brewery in the city of Grafton. It was then incumbent upon defendant to prove that the sale was lawful by proving that it had a license which authorized the sale. This is an exception to the general rule of evidence which requires the state to prove every material allegation of the indictment, and is founded on the inconvenience of proving a negative. If defendant wishes to justify the sale, it is easy for him to produce his license, if he has it. It is a matter peculiarly within his own knowledge. The exception to the rule rests on the convenience with which defendant can produce his evidence, and the inconvenience of requiring the state to prove that defendant did not have a license. 1 Greenl. Evl. (16th Ed.) § 29; 4 Wigmore, Evl. § 2512, and note 4; 2 Woollen & Thornton on Intoxicating Liquors, § 947.

The charter of the city of Grafton confers upon its council the power to grant or refuse license to sell intoxicating liquors in the city; and, if it grants a city license to sell intoxicating liquors, the county court is also obliged, by the statute, to grant a state license for the sale thereof within the city. But the authority of the city council to grant the license is subject to the following qualification: The sense of the voters must be taken at every alternate city election respecting the granting of license; and, unless a majority of the votes for and against the same be cast in favor of license, the council shall not grant license. Section 28, c. 44, Acts 1899. At the city election next preceding the indictment a majority of the votes were cast against license. Hence the city council had no power to grant license to sell intoxicating liquor within the license year beginning July 1, 1909, the year in which the sale in this case was made. The council not having granted license to sell intoxicating liquors, and, in fact, having no power to do so, if it had so desired, the county court could not grant a state license to sell within the city. Section 10, c. 82, Acts 1907 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 32, § 10), amending and re-enacting section 10, c. 82, Code 1906.

But defendant had a license from both the city council and the county court of Taylor county to carry on the business of a brewer in the city of Grafton, and the case presents this question: Did such brewer's license confer upon defendant the right to sell beer, in wholesale quantities, at its brewery? The answer to the question depends upon the construction of section 74, c. 32, Code 1906, as modified by chapter 82, Acts 1907 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 32, § 74). As so modified, that section reads as follows, viz.: "The license for carrying on a distillery shall authorize the holder thereof to sell the product of such distillery at wholesale at the distillery, but shall not authorize any such holder to sell such product at retail at any place; and the shipment or delivery of any such product from any place of storage other than the distillery shall be deemed a sale without license at the place of such shipment, or delivery, unless a license to sell at wholesale at that place has been obtained under this chapter and shall be in force; but a license to carry on a brewery shall authorize the holder thereof to solicit and receive orders for, sell, offer and expose for sale the product of such brewery at wholesale only, in any and all of the counties and cities, towns and villages of this state without additional tax: Provided, the county court first authorizes such a sale by a certificate duly entered of record which shall designate the places of said sales; except in those counties where the county court or other license tribunal does not grant license to sell intoxicating liquors, and except also in cities, towns and villages where the council or other license tribunal does not grant license to sell intoxicating liquors; no city, town or village shall impose on the holder of a state license to carry on a brewery any municipal license tax, unless he maintains a store house or place of business therein, and such municipal license tax shall not exceed two and one-half cents per barrel on the sales made at such store house or place of business; this, notwithstanding the provisions of chapter forty-seven of the code or of the charter of any city, town or village." The change made in the law by the act passed in 1907, is indicated by the words in italics. These words were first inserted in the act of 1907.

Prior to the passage of chapter 36, Acts of 1905, amending and re-enacting the whole chapter 32, on the subject of licenses, a license to carry on a brewery did not confer the right to sell the product, even at the brewery, without an additional license therefor. State v. Schmulbach Brewing Co., 56 W. Va. 333, 49 S. E. 249. And section 74 of that act amended the law, as it had been interpreted by that decision, so as to confer the right to sell at wholesale, at the brewery, by virtue of the license to brew. The modification of the law was evidently intended to relieve a brewer from the necessity of obtaining two licenses, one to manufacture and another to sell his product at wholesale at the place of manufacture, and to confer the right to sell, not only at the place of manufacture, but also in all the wet counties and towns of the state, without an additional license therefor. But this act was construed in City of Charleston v. Brewing Co., 61 W. Va. 34, 56 S. E. 198, not to relieve the brewer from the payment of a city license tax, notwithstanding it maintained in the city no other wholesale business place than its brewery; and the Legislature shortly thereafter again amended the statute to read as above quoted.

[2] Section 74, c. 32, Code 1906, as modified by chapter 32, Acts 1907, gives a licensed brewer the right to sell at wholesale, not only at the brewery, but in all other counties, without additional license, or license tax, except in counties and cities where licenses to sell are not expressly granted. The exception defeats defendant's right to sell at the brewery in this particular case, for the reason that neither the county court of Taylor county nor the city council of Grafton had the power to grant license to sell intoxicating liquors in the city within the license year beginning July 1, 1909. The last amendment of section 74 was clearly intended to relieve a brewer from the payment of more than one license tax, that of a brewer, unless he maintains a storehouse in a city. It also continued the right, previously given by the act of 1905, to sell in all the wet counties and towns of the state. But the right to sell in counties, other than the one in which the brewery is located, is so qualified by the act of 1907 that he must first obtain permission of the county court, by certificate entered of record, designating the place of sale.

The statute does not expressly authorize a brewer to sell at his brewery; but it does so by necessary implication, subject to the restriction presently to be pointed out. It first expressly authorizes a licensed distiller to sell his product at wholesale at the distillery, without regard to whether it is located in wet or dry territory, and then proceeds as follows: "But a license to carry on a brewery shall authorize the holder thereof to solicit and receive orders for, sell, offer and expose for sale the products of such brewery at wholesale only, in any and all of the counties and cities, towns and villages of this state without additional tax." Clearly, the legislative purpose was, not to give a brewer an equal right with the distiller in respect to selling his product at the place of manufacture, because the right of the latter seems not to be restricted, but to make his license to embrace a wider range of territory. A brewer's license authorizes him, without additional license or license tax, to sell at wholesale in all the wet counties, wherein the county courts give him permission and designate the places of sale; provided that, if a storehouse for selling the product is maintained in a city, town, or village, he may be required to pay a municipal license tax.

But it was not intended that a brewer's license should confer the right to sell at the brewery, if it happened to be located in a place where no license to sell could be lawfully granted. Neither the county court of Taylor county nor the city council had the power to grant license to sell intoxicating liquors in Grafton, where defendant's brewery was located, at the time when the sale in question was made. The city had been made dry territory by a vote of the citizens at the last preceding city election. If a license to sell could not be granted, it necessarily follows that a brewer's license could not confer the right to sell. That would be to accomplish by indirection what could not be done directly. Counties, cities, towns, and villages, wherein the county courts and municipal authorities do not grant license to sell, are expressly excepted from the territory in which a brewer is given a right to sell by virtue of his brewer's license. The excepted territory necessarily includes the place of the brewery, if it happens to be in a dry county or municipality. To construe the statute otherwise would, in this case, defeat the expressed will of the voters of the city of Grafton, the amended charter of which makes it optional with them whether liquor shall be sold in the city or not; and when they have declared that it shall not be sold in the city, their will on the subject is the law for the time being. Hence defendant's license to carry on the business of a brewer in Grafton did not authorize it to sell beer at its brewery.

Defendant's instruction No. 1, was properly refused. While it may be true, generally, that a brewer's license authorizes him to sell his product at the brewery at wholesale, it is not so in this case for the reasons above stated.

The judgment will be affirmed.

MICHAELSON v. CITY OF CHARLESTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 113*) — PLEADING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for tort causing personal injury, it is not necessary that the declaration aver that the plaintiff was not chargeable with contributory negligence; it being matter of defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 186-193; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 816*) — DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS—ACTION—PLEADING.

In an action against a city for personal injury caused by an obstruction of a sidewalk, it is not necessary that the declaration aver that it was the duty of the city to keep the sidewalk in good condition for public use and free of obstruction, as the law imposes that duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1711-1716, 1718, 1720, 1723; Dec. Dig. § 816.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 6*)—MATTERS OF LAW.

It is not necessary to allege matter of law in a pleading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 759*) — STREETS AND SIDEWALKS—LIABILITIES.

Mere use by the public of a sidewalk or street will not make it a street or sidewalk, so as to charge a municipal corporation with liability for damage arising from its defective condition or obstructions on it.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by Mary E. Michaelson against the City of Charleston. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Upshur Higginbotham, for plaintiff in error. Frank C. Burdette, U. S. Albertson, and J. B. Menager, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, P. Mary E. Michaelson sued the city of Charleston, and recovered judgment on a verdict for $800 damages for personal injury from a fall on Smith street while walking on a rainy, dark December night, owing to some brick lying on the sidewalk. A pile of brick, 20 or 30 feet long, 4 to 5 feet high, was on the edge of the pavement, leaving only a walking space of a yard between it and the brick wall of a house; and in this space, practically extending across it, in the middle of the pavement, were some dozen heavy brick in a pile, or scattered over the pavement, and the plaintiff in the dark stumbled over them, fell, and in trying to save herself clutched at the pile of brick, and shook more down from its top, falling on her arm. Whose brick, who piled them, is not shown.

[1-3] The first assignment of error is that the court overruled the demurrer to the declaration. The brief of the city's counsel points out that the declaration does not set out fully enough that the plaintiff was not negligent. Do we have to say again, and give authority to show, that the declaration need not negative contributory negligence and that it is a matter of defense? Sheff v. Huntington, 16 W. Va. 307. We should not respond to this suggestion. The brief points out that the declaration does not set out fully enough the city's duty as to the street. The law imposes a duty on a city to keep safe sidewalks free of obstruction, and it is not necessary to allege such duty, as it is never necessary in pleading to allege matter of law. Thomas v. Electric Co., 54 W. Va. 395, 46 S. E. 217.

Another point made by counsel is that a witness, Dr. Mayer, who examined the injured wrist of the plaintiff, stated that it was discolored and swollen and she needed medical attention. There can be nothing in this point. Dr. Mayer was a physician, though then retired; but any one, though not a physician, could give such evidence.

The brief makes the point that Mrs. Michaelson did not avail herself of proper medical treatment in proper time. There can be nothing in this. The murderer cannot say that bad medical treatment contributed to death. To relieve from murder, the wound must be not mortal, and death must come from independent cause. Livingston's Case, 55 Va. 592; Clark's Case, 90 Va. 360, 18 S. E. 440; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 638, 1 and 2. So with a tort-feasor. It can hardly be said that a city can say, when a person receives an injury from a defective street, that the person had not good medical aid, and thus exempt itself from liability. But there is no evidence to show that want of medical treatment caused or aggravated the injury. If there were, it is a jury matter. We need not have adverted to this feature of the case.

[4] The only question of import arises on the evidence as to whether the city is liable for the condition of the sidewalk. Mrs. Michaelson as a witness was asked whether the pavement on which she was walking when she fell was open to public travel, and answered: "Yes; when we could get through. Yes, sir; it was open to the public when we could go through there." She was asked if it was used by the public, and answered:

"Certainly; Smith and Capitol Streets are as public streets as there is known. All the people come that way to the hotels." Another witness, Cart, was asked if there was a public sidewalk there, and answered: "Yes, sir." It is beyond question that to hold a city liable for defect in its streets or sidewalks, it must be proven that it is a street or sidewalk constructed or recognized as such by the city authority. We have various decisions holding, with Chapman v. Milton, 31 W. Va. 384, 7 S. E. 22, that "to hold a city liable for defect the plaintiff must allege and prove that the street or sidewalk upon which the injury occurred was, at the time and place where the injury was sustained, controlled and treated by the town authorities as a public street or sidewalk, and opened as such." In Talbott v. King, 32 W. Va. 6, 9 S. E. 48, it is held: "Mere user of a road will not make it a public road, under section 31, c. 43, Code of 1887. The user must be accompanied by an order of the county court recognizing it in some way as a road, or the road must be worked by a surveyor as such." So in Dicken v. Liverpool, 41 W. Va. 511, 23 S. E. 582, and Hast v. Railroad Co., 52 W. Va. 396, 44 S. E. 155. This oral evidence of mere user was not admissible. To prove the establishment or recognition of a street by council, its record must be produced. Johnson v. City, 16 W. Va. 402, 37 Am. Rep. 779; Childrey v. Huntington, 84 W. Va. 457, 12 S. E. 536, 11 L. R. A. 813. It is true that the Talbott Case above, and Ball v. Cox, 29 W. Va. 407, 1 S. E. 673, say that, if a road is worked under the direction of a public road surveyor, it is a public road. That is the lowest class of evidence admitted. If it had been introduced, likely that evidence of user would not have been error. A witness cannot declare a street a public street, and thus make it such. Evidence of mere use by the public will not charge the public with the street or sidewalk, as we endeavored to show in Hast v. Railroad. The public cannot be made liable for a road by the public use alone, without consent of the public authorities. There was no evidence of establishment or recognition by council of the street; no evidence that a street commissioner ever worked it; no evidence of any control of it by city authority. We find no error in the case save this (Parrish v. Huntington, 57 W. Va. 286, 50 S. E. 416), and are reluctant to reverse; but we cannot avoid it. For this reason, we must say that the court should have sustained the motion to strike out the plaintiff's evidence, the only evidence in the case, and the motion to set aside the verdict.

We find no error in plaintiff's instruction 1, the only one complained of in the city's brief.

Reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, grant new trial, and remand.

PETTY v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)— OPERATION—TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGES— ACTIONS.

The court erred in granting a nonsuit in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)— OPERATION—TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGES— CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

Even if the condition printed upon a telegraphic blank, stating that a telegraph company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within 60 days after the message is filed with the company for transmission, be valid and binding, still if the suit for the recovery of the penalty provided for in sections 2812, 2813, of the Civil Code, is brought within 60 days after the message is filed with the company for transmission, no other or further presentation of the claim is necessary.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by Mrs. A. M. Petty against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

H. F. Strohecker, of Macon, for plaintiff in error. Querry, Hall & Roberts, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Mrs. A. M. Petty brought suit against the Western Union Telegraph Company, under the provisions of sections 2812 and 2813 of the Civil Code, to recover the penalty of $25. The evidence introduced on the trial was as follows:

The plaintiff is the wife of A. M. Petty. On March 8, 1910, she resided at No. 122 Washington avenue, within the corporate limits of Macon, Ga. On that date she was at home all day, and received no telegraphic message from A. M. Petty. She received no message by telegraph from her husband while he was absent about that time, and none has been delivered to her since as coming from him. On March 8, 1910, he was at Conyers, Ga. He went into the Western Union Telegraph Company's office there about 10 o'clock in the morning, wrote out a message to his wife at Macon, Ga., and gave it to the telegraph agent to send to her. He paid the agent 80 cents, the amount charged by him, and asked him to hurry the message. When he returned home, he called up the Macon office of the defendant on the telephone and asked about the message. (The court ruled out any conversation he had with the office by telephone.) He did not go to the office personally after he came home. He had frequently been in this office. He has never brought any suit for the penalty. The telegraphic message, produced under notice, was written upon a printed form. The front thereof read as follows:

"The Western Union Telegraph Company.

"4 Co. JN AM P 11—10 11 Paid

"Mch. 8th, 1910.

"Send the following message, subject to the terms on back hereof, which are hereby agreed to:

"To Mrs. A. M. Petty,

"122 Washington Avenue, Macon, Ga.

"Delayed on business. Will hear from me later. Advise Johnson Bros.

"A. M. Petty.

"Original."

On the back, among many others, was the following stipulation: "This company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission."

The defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the following grounds: (a) There was no proof that defendant had an office in the city of Macon at the time the message was sent. (b) There was no proof that the plaintiff lived within one mile of the office of defendant. (c) No written demand was filed with the company within 60 days after the message was filed with the company for transmission. The court sustained the motion, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] We are of the opinion that the court erred in granting a nonsuit. Section 2812 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "Every electric telegraph company, with a line of wires wholly or partly in this state, and engaged in telegraphing for the public, shall, during the usual hours, receive dispatches or messages, whether from other telegraphic lines or from individuals, and, on payment or tender of the usual charge according to the regulations of such company, shall transmit and deliver the same with impartiality and good faith and with due diligence, under penalty of twenty-five dollars, which penalty may be recovered by suit in a court having jurisdiction thereof, by either the sender of the dispatch or message or the person to whom sent or directed, whichever may sue first." And section 2813 is in the following language: "Such companies shall deliver all dispatches or messages to the persons to whom the same are addressed or to their agents, on payment of any charges due for the same: Provided, such persons or agents reside within one mile of the telegraphic station, or within the city or town in which such station is located." Although it is not expressly stated in the evidence that the telegraphic station of the defendant company was located in the city of Macon, at the time the message was sent, the jury might have inferred, from the fact that the agent of the defendant company at Conyers, Ga., the point from which the message was sent, received a message directed to Macon, Ga., that the station was then located within that city. Under the provisions of the statute which we have quoted, it was the duty of the company to deliver the message with due diligence under a penalty of $25; and in case of failure to so deliver the message, where the person to whom the same is sent resides in the city in which the telegraphic station is located, the company becomes liable for the failure in the amount of the penalty.

[2] Even if the condition printed upon a telegraphic blank, stating that the company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within 60 days after the message is filed with the company for transmission, be valid and binding, we do not think that the failure of the plaintiff to present a claim in writing within 60 days after the message was filed with the company's agent for transmission will defeat the action in this case. The suit to recover the penalty was brought and served within 60 days, and we think that this was sufficient demand upon the company for the payment of the penalty.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WADLEY v. DOOLY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 159*)—DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 26*)—UNAUTHORIZED ACTS OF AGENT—DISMISSAL AS TO CODEFENDANT.

An agent is personally responsible for his own tortious act. Civil Code, § 3613.

(a) The action was for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the alleged negligence of the driver of an automobile in running it against and over her. The owner and the driver of the machine were joined as defendants, and the petition averred that all the alleged acts of negligence on the part of the driver were done by him as the servant and agent of the owner in operating the machine. Elsewhere in the petition it was set forth that the driver was "over the age of 14 years, and as such responsible for and liable to be sued for any tort committed by him," and that by reason of the allegations of the petition the defendants had damaged the plaintiff in a given sum. Process was prayed against both defendants, both were served, and both answered. On the trial, upon the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, a nonsuit was granted as to the owner of the machine. The other defendant (the driver) then moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that no suit was filed against him individually, there being no allegation against him other than as agent for the owner of the machine; that the action was not against the defendants as joint tort-feasors; and that as the evidence did not authorize the verdict against the owner, who was sued as principal, no verdict could be rendered against his mere servant and agent. This motion was overruled. The plaintiff was then allowed, over objection, to amend the petition by alleging that all acts of the driver of the machine, averred in the original petition to have been done by him as agent, were also done "in his individual capacity, and the injuries complained of were also the result of [his] negligence, and he is liable therefor." Held, that there was no error in refusing the nonsuit, nor in allowing the amendment, even if the original petition did not set forth a cause of action against the driver. See Southern Ry. Co. v. Grizzle, 124 Ga. 735, 53 S. E. 244, 110 Am. St. Rep. 191; Baker v. Davis, 127 Ga. 649 (1), 57 S. E. 62.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 599-612; Dec. Dig. § 159; * Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 46, 48-49; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "The plaintiff cannot recover if she could by ordinary care have avoided the injury, or if the defendant has made it appear to your satisfaction that he exercised all ordinary and reasonable care." The last clause of this instruction was not aptly put, as the jury may have inferred therefrom that the burden was upon the defendant to make it appear to the satisfaction of the jury that he exercised all ordinary and reasonable care. When considered, however, in the connection in which it was given, and in view of the fact that the court specifically charged the jury that the burden of proof in the case was upon the plaintiff to prove to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of the evidence every material allegation in the petition, it is not probable that the jury were misled by the instruction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 706-713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 739*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The lengthy request to charge, set out in the tenth ground of the motion for new trial, was properly refused, as there was no evidence whatever that the plaintiff saw the automobile before it struck her. The assignment of error was upon the refusal to give the entire request, and, even if the balance of it was good, the assignment was nevertheless without merit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3034-3036; Dec. Dig. § 739.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 141*)—ACTIONS FOR NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court did not err in charging that "the rule which requires one to avoid the consequences of another's negligence * * * does not apply until such person sees the danger or has reason to apprehend it." Central R. Co. v. Attaway, 90 Ga. 656, 661, 16 S. E. 956, 958; W. & A. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 Ga. 708, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 382-399; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 141*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In view of the evidence submitted upon the trial, the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, in accordance with a timely written request, that "if you believe from the evidence that both the defendant and plaintiff were negligent, and that the plaintiff was equally negligent with the defendant, then I charge you the plaintiff cannot recover."

Pickett v. Central Ry. Co., 138 Ga. —, 74 S. E. 1027, and cases cited.

6. TRIAL (§ 251*)—ISSUES—INSTRUCTIONS.

The action being for damages from personal injuries, based on negligence alone, and, under the pleadings and evidence, no question of willfulness, wantonness, malice, oppression, or conscious indifference to consequences being involved, it was error to charge that: "In every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or the intention, and in that event the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass, or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff." Southern Ry. Co. v. Bankston, 131 Ga. 604, 62 S. E. 1027; Southern Ry. Co. v. Davis, 132 Ga. 812 (3), 65 S. E. 131; Southern Ry. v. Phillips, 136 Ga. 282, 71 S. E. 414.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

7. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

As the suit was to recover damages for physical injuries, causing nervous shock, physical pain, permanent impairment of ability to work and labor in the plaintiff's profession, loss of time, impairment of health, and expenses in the way of physician's bills, it was inapt to instruct the jury that "in some torts the entire injury is to the peace, happiness, or feelings of the plaintiff; in such cases no measure of damages can be prescribed, except the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors." Southern Ry. Co. v. Davis, supra. While damages on account of pain and suffering are to be measured by the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, the instruction above quoted was not strictly applicable to the case as tried, as a recovery was sought for damages, not alone for pain and suffering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—STREETS—USE FOR TRAVEL—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court did not err in refusing a request to give the following in charge: "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff in this case got off the street car, and did not see the approaching automobile, and did not look to see it, but that she was standing in the street with her back to the curbing, facing the street car from which she had alighted, and without looking she suddenly turned from her position towards the curbing and in the direction in which the automobile was coming, and that such action on her part was negligence, and that this negligence was the real and proximate cause of her injury, then I charge you that she cannot recover, even though you may believe from the evidence that the defendant was negligent in the manner alleged." The negligence alleged in the petition against the defendant was in substance as follows: Defendant was driving a very heavy and powerful automobile at a high rate of speed along the public street upon which plaintiff alighted from a street car. In passing the car, which had stopped to allow the plaintiff to alight therefrom, the defendant did not slow up after the car had stopped. Defendant had full opportunity to see the car and that it had stopped for such purpose. He blew no horn, nor gave any other signal of his approach, "but recklessly rushed by said car in said automobile, without regard to the safety of persons alighting therefrom or crossing therefrom to the sidewalk." Plaintiff was in plain view of the defendant, and he was either "negligently not looking out, or was recklessly careless in not avoiding plaintiff, and in driving too close to her." If the defendant was negligent in the manner alleged, then, if the plaintiff was negligent as stated in the request to charge, such negligence on her part could not be "the real and proximate cause of her injury."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1518; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

9. REFUSAL TO CHARGE—NO ERROR.

In view of the whole charge, the refusal of the requests to charge, other than those hereinbefore dealt with, was not cause for a new trial.

CARTER et al. v. DAVIDSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 336*)—PARTIES—AMENDMENT.

"If it appears from the record that one who should have been joined as a defendant in error to the bill of exceptions has not been named as such therein, he may be made a party by amendment, provided he is willing to waive service and consent that the case be heard on its merits."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1868-1876; Dec. Dig. § 336.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION OF COURT.

The following charge is objectionable, on the ground that it contains an expression of opinion by the court: "Appraisers were appointed, who, I presume, viewed the property, took into consideration what they thought was best, and set apart as twelve months' support for these children certain property enumerated in these proceedings." (Fish, C. J., and Atkinson, J., dissenting as to the ruling.)

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 436-438; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 194*)—YEAR'S SUPPORT—AMOUNT—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "The law says that in doing that, whatever you do, in passing upon the sufficiency of their support and maintenance, you shall keep in view two things: First, you allow the support according to the circumstances of the family prior to the death of the father; then in doing that, in arriving at what you will do, or what you will allow, you shall keep in view the solvency or insolvency of the estate."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 713-723; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

It being a question, under the law and evidence in the case, whether the entire property of the decedent, or whether one or both of two lots of land, should be set aside for certain minor children, it was error for the court to charge the jury in the following language: "You may set apart the entire property, both pieces of real estate, say that they shall have both pieces—that is, the house and lot in Belton and the tract of land in Banks county"—without qualifying this by adding, if the jury should think that this was a proper allowance under the evidence in the case and the instructions of the court, or some similar qualification, which would have left the amount of the allowance for determination exclusively by the jury under the law as given them in charge by the court.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

Assignments of error in the bill of exceptions, not argued in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, will be regarded as abandoned in this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Application by L. P. Davidson for a year's support for the minor children of Charles J. Pool, deceased. Mrs. A. J. Carter and others object. Judgment for the applicant, and the objectors bring error. Reversed.

Howard Thompson and Wm. M. Johnson, both of Gainesville, for plaintiffs in error. C. R. Faulkner, of Belton, and H. H. Dean, of Gainesville, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. L. P. Davidson made application for a year's support for the minor children of Charles J. Pool, deceased. Appraisers were appointed, and to their return setting apart the year's support certain creditors of the decedent filed a caveat, on the ground that the amount of property so set apart, the condition of the estate of the decedent being considered, was excessively large and disproportionate to the value of the estate, as the same would be rendered insolvent if the year's support set apart by the appraisers was allowed. The objections were heard in the court of ordinary. An appeal was entered by the caveators to the judgment there rendered. After trial and verdict in the superior court, the caveators made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

[1] 1. A motion was made to dismiss the bill of exceptions, upon the ground that the administrator was not a party defendant to the bill of exceptions. In response to this motion the plaintiffs in error filed their motion to have the administrator made a party in this court, and accompanied this motion with an acknowledgement of service and consent that the case be heard at once, signed by the administrator himself. We are of the opinion that under these facts the administrator should be made a party, and the motion to dismiss overruled. Sears v. Jeffords, 119 Ga. 821, 47 S. E. 186.

[2] 2. The plaintiffs in error excepted to the following charge of the court: "Appraisers were appointed, who, I presume, viewed the property, took into consideration what they thought was best, and set apart as 12 months' support for these children certain property enumerated in these proceedings." This charge was erroneous. It invaded the province of the jury. The court was without authority under our law to intimate to the jury his opinion that the appraisers had "viewed the property and taken into consideration what they thought was best." Where the law upon a given state of facts raises a presumption, the court may so state to the jury; but he should not have expressed his own belief as to what the appraisers in this case had done. The expression "I presume" contains an expression of the court's belief in reference to the acts and doings of the appraisers in the premises, and such an expression or intimation of opinion is under the inhibition of our law.

[3] 3. It is provided in the law applicable to proceedings of this kind that "it shall be the duty of the appraisers * * * to set apart and assign to such widow and children, or children only, either in property or money, a sufficiency from the estate for their support and maintenance for the space of twelve months from the date of administration on the estate, to be estimated according to the circumstances and standing of the family previously to the death of the testator or intestate, and keeping in view also the solvency of the estate." This law was substantially embodied in the following charge of the court: "The law says that in doing that, whatever you do in passing upon the sufficiency of their support and maintenance, you shall keep in view two things: First, you allow the support according to the circumstances of the family prior to the death of the father; then in doing that, in arriving at what you will do, or what you will allow, you shall keep in view the solvency or insolvency of the estate." And the fact that the court, in cautioning the jury to consider the condition of the estate, instructed them that they should keep in view the solvency or insolvency of the estate, did not render the charge obnoxious to the provisions of the law which we have quoted above. The real meaning of the expression "keep in view the solvency of the estate," as it is found in the statute, means nothing more than that the appraisers should keep in view the condition of the estate as to solvency or insolvency.

[4] 4. Complaint is made of the following charge of the court: "First, put a valuation upon the support and maintenance necessary for the minor children under the law; then you might place, if you want to do it, a valuation upon the entire piece of real estate, if you see proper to do it. You might say, then, if you want to do it, that you find it will take so much money to support and maintain these children under the law for and during the 12 months contemplated by law, and we find one piece of real estate, denominating it, describing it, worth so much, put the value on it, whatever the evidence authorizes you to put, and that piece of property shall be set apart at a certain valuation; that the other piece of property be sold, and from the proceeds of the sale of that piece of property that so much money may go to these minor children to complete the amount that you may decide they are entitled to under the law and evidence; or you may set apart the entire property, both pieces of real estate, say that they shall have both pieces—that is, the house and lot in Belton and the tract of land in Banks county." The instructions contained in this excerpt are not only somewhat vague and lacking in clearness, but the concluding part of it, "or you may set apart the entire property, both pieces of real estate, say that they shall have both pieces—that is, the house and lot in Belton and the tract of land in Banks county"—is objectionable on the ground that it invades the province of the jury, in that it contains an intimation of opinion by the court that under the evidence the jury might "set apart the entire property, both pieces of real estate," without referring to the question as to whether or not, under the evidence, this would be a sufficiency for the support and maintenance of the minor children for the space of 12 months, and a proper and reasonable allowance, in view of the condition of the estate as to solvency or insolvency.

[5] 5. The exception to the refusal of the court to dismiss the appeal from the judgment of the court of ordinary was not argued in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, and is therefore regarded as being abandoned.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON, J., who dissent.

BROOKS et al. v. RAWLINGS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)PLEADING (§ 416)—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS—RULING ON DEMURRER.

Where a demurrer was filed to an equitable petition seeking the reformation of a deed to land because of an alleged fraud in its procurement, which demurrer was overruled, but no exception was taken to this judgment, and the plaintiff offered evidence substantially proving the case as laid in the petition, it was reversible error for the court, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, to grant a nonsuit.

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Action by Isabella J. Brooks and others against Charles G. Rawlings. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Isabella J. Brooks, Ella Nora Brooks, and Leon Brooks filed their petition against Charles G. Rawlings, and alleged as follows: They were owners, as tenants in common, of two tracts of land. They owed money to various persons, including the defendant, and were being sued by some of their creditors. They appealed to the defendant for a loan sufficient to pay off their debts. He agreed to make the loan, but informed the plaintiffs that it would be necessary for them to execute and deliver to him an absolute deed to the lands before he would be authorized to take possession, rent the land, collect the rents, and apply the proceeds arising from the sale of such rents to the payment of the money which he was going to advance to them to pay off and discharge their several debts hereinbefore referred to. He declared he would not be able to rent the lands without such absolute deed. He proposed to hold said lands until the rents had fully paid the loan, and then would surrender possession of the land to them. He also agreed that they should have the right to pay him at any time, with 8 per cent. interest. He proposed to prepare the necessary papers to evidence and carry out the above stated contract between them. He professed great friendship for the plaintiffs on account of his friendship for their father, and said that he would treat them fairly and properly in the matter. They accepted his proposition and agreed to the foregoing terms. They were unlearned in legal matters, acted without the advice of counsel or others skilled in such matters, and left to Rawlings the preparation of the necessary papers to carry out their contract. They believed he was their friend, and did not believe he was seeking any advantage of them. On February 21, 1908, he had them execute and deliver to him an absolute deed to said lands, and they permitted their tenants to attorn to Rawlings. At this time they had already rented the lands for 1908 for eight bales of cotton. In the fall of 1908 Rawlings collected these rents, of the value of $400. He received the rents for 1909, of the value of $500, and will receive the rents for 1910, of the same value. At the time they made their deed the lands were worth $3,000—much more than the money borrowed from Rawlings. Their deed purports to be upon a consideration of $1,861; but Rawlings paid out for them only $972.92, besides some interest. After getting said deed from them, and after having gotten possession of the land, Rawlings began to assert that he bought said lands from them, and he now asserts that he is the absolute owner thereof. He procured said deed from them fraudulently, by taking advantage of their ignorance and of the confidence reposed in him by them, and by pretending that it was necessary for him to have an absolute deed and possession of said lands in order that he might be able to rent them out, receive the rents, and apply the same to the payment of the money which he would advance to pay off their debts. It was his intention and scheme to get an absolute deed from them, and have them surrender possession of the land to him, that he might wrongfully and fraudulently assert that he was the absolute owner of said property. As soon as they discovered that he claimed to be the owner of said lands, they offered to pay him back all the money he had paid out for them on their debts to him and to other creditors, and redeem said lands. They asked Rawlings to come to an accounting with them for the rents he had received. This he refused to do, asserting that he was the owner of said lands, and that they had no title to or interest therein. They offered to tender to Rawlings whatever amount might be due him on an accounting. The deed to Rawlings does not speak the real contract. Said deed was only made for the purpose of securing him for the money advanced to them, and to permit him to collect the rents and apply the same to the discharge of their indebtedness, etc. They prayed that the deed be declared to be simply a security deed, and that the same be so reformed as to speak the true contract and agreement between them and Rawlings, that an accounting be had between them, that the amount of money advanced by Rawlings for them be ascertained, that the amount of rents received by him be fixed, and that they be permitted to redeem said lands.

The defendant demurred to this petition. The demurrer was overruled, but no exception was taken to this judgment. The defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the petition, and also the right of the plaintiffs to make a tender. Plaintiffs introduced testimony which supported their petition substantially as laid. At the conclusion thereof the defendant moved for a nonsuit. The court sustained the motion, and the plaintiffs excepted.

Hines & Jordan, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Hardwick & Wright, of Sandersville, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). To the judgment of the court overruling the demurrer to the petition in this case no exception was taken. It was, therefore, a conclusive determination that a right of action existed in favor of the plaintiffs, and they, subsequently to the overruling of the demurrer, having substantially proved their case as laid, were entitled to recover. The grant of a nonsuit was therefore reversible error. In the case of Sims v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 123 Ga. 643, 644, 645, 51 S. E. 573, it is said: "The right of the plaintiff to recover upon proof of the allegations made in his petition was adjudicated favorably to him by the judgment overruling the demurrer. 'Until duly set aside, that decision is conclusive, and the question thereby settled is to be regarded as res adjudicata.' Hollis v. Nelms, 115 Ga. 7, 41 S. E. 263. In this judgment the defendant company acquiesced, neither filing exceptions pendente lite nor bringing it under review by a direct bill of exceptions to this court. On the trial of the case, therefore, the only question for determination was the amount of the damages suffered by the plaintiff, in the event he sustained by proof the allegations of fact on which he based his right of recovery. Richmond Hosiery Mills v. W. U. Tel. Co., 123 Ga. 216, 51 S. E. 290. The defendant company was precluded from calling into question the right of the plaintiff to recover upon such proof being made. Ga. Northern Ry. Co. v. Hutchins, 119 Ga. 504, 46 S. E. 659. As was remarked by Mr. Justice Cobb in Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 891, 892, 43 S. E. 288: 'If the defendant calls in question the sufficiency of the petition by demurrer, as he has a right to do, and the court renders an erroneous decision holding that the petition sets forth a cause of action, when in truth it does not, and the defendant acquiesces in this decision, of course no one will contend that, after the time allowed by law has expired for bringing under review this erroneous decision, the defendant can be heard to say that the petition sets forth no cause of action.' When a case is in limine, the trial judge may of his own motion interpose to prevent a miscarriage of justice, provided 'there is no estoppel of which either party may take advantage.' 116 Ga. 874, 43 S. E. 280. But it is not within the power of the trial judge to give to either party the benefit of a contention which he is himself estopped to urge." Under the ruling in the case just cited, we think the court erred in granting the nonsuit in the present case.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 155*)—LANDLORD AND TENANT (§§ 22, 118*)—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—RECOVERY OF RENT.

Where an agent, without authority to execute a sealed instrument, signs a contract of lease under seal for his principal, the latter is not bound. Until the principal becomes bound, the contract, signed by the agent for him, lacks the element of mutuality between the principal and the lessee, and the latter may withdraw from it, and the lessee's holding is to be considered as a tenancy at will. In an action brought after the expiration of the term stipulated in the contract, for a sum alleged to be due on the contract, for a period during which it is not alleged that the lessee was in possession of the premises, the principal of the agent is not entitled to recover.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. T. Lynch against T. O. Poole and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. B. Blackburn, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Slaton & Phillips, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The action was to recover an amount of money alleged to be due for the rent of premises by virtue of a contract of lease between the plaintiff's agent and the defendants. The contract of lease stated that it was entered into between John J. Woodside, agent for J. T. Lynch, party of the first part, and T. O. Poole and Atlanta Brewing & Ice Company, as surety, parties of the second part, and recited that the parties of the second part have this day rented from John J. Woodside, agent, certain premises for the term of three years, ending November 30, 1908, for which they agree to pay John J. Woodside, agent, $75 per month in advance. The contract contained several covenants between the parties. It recited that it was executed under the seals of the parties, and was signed as follows: "T. O. Poole. [Seal.] Atlanta Brewing & Ice Company. [Seal.] Ira E. Steiner, Secty. and Treasurer. [Seal.] John J. Woodside, Agt. [Seal.]" The petition alleged that the defendants entered into possession of the premises under this contract of lease, and paid the petitioner the rent stipulated to be paid, in manner and form as prescribed, up to February 1, 1908, since which time they have not paid anything; that petitioner "did not receive possession of said premises from the defendants until November 30, 1908, at which time the lease contract declared upon was terminated; and on that date the defendants were indebted to petitioner in the sum of $750, under the terms of the contract herein referred to, as rent for the use of said premises from the 1st day of February, 1908, to the 30th day of November, 1908; that Woodside was the agent of petitioner, and, though the agent's authority was not disclosed in the contract under seal executed by him, petitioner ratified the contract and received rents accruing thereunder from its date to February 1, 1908, and the defendants are estopped in law from seeking any protection growing from the absence of such authority." The petition was dismissed on general demurrer.

The contract between the parties being a sealed instrument, executed by the petitioner's agent without authority under seal, it was contended by the defendants in their demurrer that it was not binding on the petitioner, and, being unilateral, it was not binding on the defendants, and therefore its only effect would be to create a tenancy at will between the parties. The rule is elementary that a power of attorney to execute a sealed instrument must be of the same solemnity, and possess the same general requisites, of the instrument to be executed. In most jurisdictions, contracts not required by law to be executed under the seal of the parties, in order to be valid and binding, if executed under seal, are nevertheless to be treated as simple contracts, and the seal is considered as surplusage. But such a rule does not obtain in this state; and if an instrument executed by an agent be under seal, the agent's authority to make it must likewise be under seal, although it may evidence a contract not required to be under seal to give it validity. Pollard v. Gibbs, 55 Ga. 45. As it is admitted that the agent was without authority under seal to execute the lease contract, it was not binding on his principal. Being unilateral, it is not binding on the defendants, and they would not be liable for its breach. Until the principal becomes bound, the contract signed by the agent lacks the element of mutuality between the principal and the lessee, and the latter may withdraw from it, and the lessee's holding would be considered as a tenancy at will, and he would not be subject to suit on the contract brought after the expiration of the term. Potts-Thompson Liquor Co. v. Potts, 135 Ga. 457, 69 S. E. 734.

To escape this consequence the petitioner alleges that he ratified the contract by receiving the rents accruing under the contract. The general rule is that a contract may be ratified by words or conduct, but it does not apply to a contract under seal. Such contracts cannot be ratified, except by a writing under seal. McCalla v. American Freehold, etc., Co., 90 Ga. 113, 15 S. E. 687. The petitioner also invokes the doctrine of estoppel in aid of his contract. The doctrine of estoppel in pais is predicated upon a change of position to the hurt of one of the parties, acting on the representations or conduct of the other. If the petition had alleged that the defendants retained possession of, and occupied, the premises for the time for which rent is claimed, the defendants, having received the full benefit of the contract for the contract time, would be estopped from denying the authority of the agent to make the contract. Harrison v. Wilson Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 6, 45 S. E. 730. But the petition contains no such allegation. The action is based on the contract alone. It is sought to make the defendants liable on their supposed contractual obligation, under the contract. As the contract is not binding on them, they are not liable thereon.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

NEELY & CO. v. STEVENS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§§ 117, 167*)—EXISTENCE OF AGENCY—AUTHORITY UNDER SEAL—RATIFICATION.

The authority of an agent to execute a sealed instrument must itself be under seal, although the instrument may evidence a contract not required by law to be under seal; and ratification of such instrument, to be binding upon the principal, must also be under seal. Overman v. Atkinson, 102 Ga. 750, 29 S. E. 758, and citations; Lynch v. Poole, 75 S. E. 158, this day decided, and citations.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 155*)—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—MUTUALITY.

By the terms of a contract under seal N. & Co. purchased from S., who signed the contract and agreed to deliver, at a certain price, 50 bales of cotton within a given time and at a stated place. The contract was executed on behalf of N. & Co. by W., without authority under seal. S. delivered 25 bales to N. & Co. in accordance with the contract, and received from them the stipulated price therefor, but refused to deliver the balance. N. & Co. brought an action against S. for a breach of the contract, in which damages were laid in the amount of the difference between the contract price of the cotton not delivered and its market value at the time and place of delivery. On the trial it appeared that there was no ratification by N. & Co., under seal, of the execution of the contract by W., nor did it appear what the market value of the 25 bales was at the time it was delivered, accepted, and paid for, whether it was more or less than the contract price. Held, as N. & Co. were not originally bound under the contract, because of want of authority under seal in their agent to execute it under seal, and as they never ratified it under seal, the contract was unilateral, and was as to S. nothing more than an offer to make a contract (Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 167, 46 S. E. 67; Huggins v. Southeastern Cement Co., 121 Ga. 311, 48 S. E. 933); and the plaintiff was therefore not entitled to recover.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—ILLEGAL SALE—EVIDENCE.

While there was no direct evidence of a sale of intoxicating liquor, there were circumstances proved from which the jury had a right to infer that such a sale was made by the accused, either for cash or on credit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 300-322; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Newnan; W. A. Post, Judge.

Levi Cage was convicted of an illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. G. Post, of Newnan, for plaintiff in error. W. L. Stallings, Sol., of Newnan, for the State.

POTTLE, J. The accused was seen by the state's witness coming through a cotton patch on a dark night, carrying a lantern. He reached a somewhat secluded spot, where one Arnold and three other negroes were sitting on the ground. The accused pulled out of his pocket three pints of whisky, and handed one pint to each of the negroes, except Arnold. As he was pulling out the fourth pint, the state's witness stepped up and remarked, "I will take that one." Thereupon the four men who were sitting on the ground fled. The accused remained a few minutes and ran off. The state's witness ran after him, but could not catch him. It does not appear whether they took the liquor with them, but it may be safely assumed that they did, in absence of proof to the contrary. No money was seen to pass, but when the witness walked up the accused had $1 in his hand. A negro church association was in session at Grantville, and a large crowd was there. The transaction above described took place about 300 yards from the church. When arrested the accused had $1.30 on his person. He claimed that the whisky belonged to Arnold, and that he brought it to Arnold at the latter's request, for which service Arnold was to give him one of the pints. He further claimed that the dollar which he had in his hand had been given him by a woman with whom he lived, to be used in purchasing provisions.

Evidently the jury did not credit this rather lame explanation of the transaction. Just why, if the whisky belonged to Arnold, the accused should have given everybody except Arnold a pint of it and retained the fourth for himself, is not made clearly to appear. It may be that the accused was acting as agent for Arnold in making a sale. If so, he is equally guilty. If the whisky was his, as the jury had a right to believe, then there were circumstances authorizing a legitimate inference that a sale was intended. A sale may be shown by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, and it is not necessary that any particular price should be agreed on. Smith v. State, 9 Ga. App. 230, 70 S. E. 969. A sale on credit is as much a violation of the law as a sale for cash. Finch v. State, 6 Ga. App. 338, 64 S. E. 1007. The secretive method employed, the dark night, the unusual place, the dollar in the hand, the flight of the four negroes, were all circumstances pointing very strongly to a criminal transaction, and the jury had a right to infer that a sale, rather than a gift, was intended.

Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). The evidence against the defendant depends entirely upon circumstances, and to my mind they are too slight and inconclusive to authorize conviction. I do not think that circumstances of similarly frail character could have induced a verdict of guilty, had the defendant been accused of a more heinous crime. No man can stand more strongly than I for the principle that the jury is the final arbiter as to the facts, and that their finding upon facts should be absolutely binding upon the courts; but the security of human liberty and the safety of the innocent, as well as the punishment of the guilty, depend upon the salutary rule that no one shall be convicted of crime solely upon circumstantial evidence, unless the only reasonable hypothesis which can rationally be deduced from the circumstances proved is inconsistent with innocence. Where a conviction rests upon circumstantial evidence alone, and the inference that the defendant is innocent is just as reasonable as that he is guilty, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal, and yet the prerogative of the jury to find the facts is not in the least interfered with or abridged. In such an instance (and I think in the case at bar) the jury are as much the exclusive judges of the facts as in any other case; but as the law will not permit a jury to supply, in any case, facts that are not proved, so it is equally inexorable in refusing to allow a hypothesis or inference of guilt to be preferred to a supposition or hypothesis of innocence which is undeniably equally reasonable and equally well supported by the very testimony upon which the jury was obliged to base its finding. The crux of the matter, in a case in which guilt depends entirely upon circumstances which tend to prove by suggestion what there is a failure to show by direct proof, and where two equally reasonable theories, one of guilt and the other of innocence, are presented, and the jury find the defendant guilty, is that the error of the jury consists in disregarding the rule of law applicable to those criminal cases in which proof of guilt is wholly dependent upon circumstantial evidence. It has never been an abridgment of the right of the jury to pass upon the facts when a verdict, either in a civil or a criminal case, was set aside as contrary to law because there was no sufficient evidence to authorize the finding. It is likewise no interference with the prerogative of the jury to set aside their finding where it is palpably plain (after viewing all the facts in the record in their strongest light) that the jury disregarded a cardinal rule of law imposed for their guidance in weighing the evidence and giving it proper effect.

There are some circumstances in the record besides those stated in the opinion of the majority of the court; but I shall not refer to them, because they may not have been credited by the jury, and I think it can safely be assumed that Arnold was a violator of the prohibition law. It can be suspected that he was the violator upon the occasion in question. The defendant, if an agent of Arnold in making an unlawful sale, would be equally as guilty as he. In this latter statement of the opinion of the majority of the court I concur. I participated in the decisions in Smith v. State, 9 Ga. App. 230, 70 S. E. 969, and Finch v. State, 6 Ga. App. 338, 64 S. E. 1007, and fully agreed to the rulings announced in each case; but the facts in those cases bear no resemblance to those in the present record. In the Smith Case it was plain that the purchaser intended to pay and did pay for the whisky he got, and, as long as Smith never offered to return the money, it was equally plain that his insistence that he was not going to sell the whisky was a mere ruse. Other evidence in the record showed that it was generally known in the community that whisky could be bought at Smith's house. Smith's Case was not one of circumstantial evidence. The state's witness made out the case by direct proof, except the possible doubt as to the seller's intention to take the money, and this was removed by the fact that the accused never offered to return the money that the purchaser left in his presence on his table, and which he must reasonably be presumed to have appropriated to himself as payment for the whisky. In the Finch Case we held merely that, where the contract between the parties provided for future payment for whisky, the law was as much violated as if it were a cash transaction, for the reason that in either event it was a sale forbidden by law, and, if a sale be shown, the terms of purchase are immaterial.

To my mind the mere fact that a negro delivers three pints of whisky to three persons, when there is no evidence that he received any money for it, does not any more reasonably establish the proposition that he was selling the whisky or was the agent of an undisclosed seller than that he brought the persons to whom he delivered the whisky their own whisky that they had purchased from some one else, and was a mere errand boy, or that as agent of these purchasers he had bought the whisky for them. It does not appear that the location was at all secret. If there is any place that is public during a negro church association, it would be the crossing of the road and the railroad described in the evidence as being within 300 yards of the church where the association was going on. The adjacent grounds were not in the woods, but were a cotton patch, and it was a "moonshiny" night. The marshal of Grantville swears that the railroad crossing in question is a very public crossing, and in sight of the church, at which there was a very large number of negroes. It is possible, of course, that the defendant may be guilty. The fact that he delivered three pints of whisky is suspicious. The fact that he happened to have as much as a dollar in the month of September is also another very suspicious circumstance, indicating that perhaps he got it from the sale of liquor. But the law does not authorize conviction upon suspicion, and in the evidence there is nothing to contradict the defendant's explanation that he had gone to a cotton patch and gotten the liquor for Arnold, where Arnold left it, upon Arnold's promise that he would give him a pint of it for his trouble. The state's witnesses all testified positively that no money was paid at the time of the delivery, and that they did not hear anything said that indicated a sale. It is uncontradicted that the dollar was given to the accused by an old negro woman to buy some domestic supplies.

It appears to me that, in the absence of any direct evidence that there was a sale, the bare circumstance of one person's handing to another a bottle of whisky (even if it had not been explained) was not sufficient to authorize the conclusion that the person handing the whisky to the other was selling it to him, and, unless the theory of a sale is the most reasonable conclusion that can be drawn from the occurrence, the finding of the jury was unauthorized. To hold that the circumstance of one's handing another a bottle of whisky is prima facie sufficient to authorize conviction of a violation of the law would, in some instances, penalize a gift of wine or other intoxicating liquor, where its use might be necessary as medicine, or required for sacramental purposes. I admit that the circumstance, colored by its surroundings, might authorize the conclusion that the delivery was made for the purpose of a sale, and not as a gift; but generally this would not be the case, because, where either a guilty or innocent intent may attach to an act, the law always prefers to ascribe an innocent intention. In a case where one delivers an intoxicant to another in a place evidently provided for the common and usual dispensing of such articles, I think it could very well be assumed that a sale was intended; but where it appears merely that the defendant handed three other parties a pint of liquor, and it is undisputed that no money was paid, and the explanation is given, and not denied, that he rendered this service in expectation of getting a pint for himself, I do not think the case is strong enough to say that the defendant is guilty beyond any reasonable doubt.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

RAILROADS (§ 326*)—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY.

As a matter of law, for a grown man in full possession of his faculties to attempt in the nighttime to climb over the bumpers between two cars attached to a long freight train, without ascertaining whether an engine is attached to the train of cars, or is so near to them on the track as to be immediately coupled to them, is such gross negligence as will preclude a recovery for injuries received on account of an engine being suddenly backed up against the cars and causing the person attempting to cross to be thrown down upon the track. In such a case the facts that the train was obstructing a public crossing in a city in violation of a municipal ordinance, and that the train had no lights to indicate that it was likely to move, or that no watchman was present to warn pedestrians not to attempt to cross, or that no bell or whistle was sounded to indicate preparation to move, afford the person injured no cause for complaint. The proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was, not the alleged negligent acts and omissions of the defendant, but his own rash act. The case is in principle controlled by the decisions of the Supreme Court in Andrews v. Central R. Co., 86 Ga. 192, 12 S. E. 213, 10 L. R. A. 58, Mont-

Error from City Court of Blakely; L. M. Rambo, Judge.

Action by J. R. Legere against the Blakely Gin Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. W. Wright, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error. Glessner & Park, of Blakely, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error brought trover against the Blakely Gin Company to recover a bale of cotton. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and this is the error assigned. When the case was called in this court a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that there was no exception to any final judgment, "but only to the interlocutory action of the judge in directing the jury to return a verdict."

[1] 1. There is no merit in this motion. It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court and this court that the direction of a verdict is such a final judgment as will support a bill of exceptions. Meeks v. Meeks, 5 Ga. App. 394, 63 S. E. 270; Duggan v. Monk, 5 Ga. App. 206, 62 S. E. 1017, and citations; Howell v. Pennington, 118 Ga. 494, 45 S. E. 272; Scarborough v. Holder, 127 Ga. 256, 56 S. E. 293.

[2] 2. The undisputed evidence shows that the bale of cotton was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant for the purpose of having it ginned, and that the plaintiff made a demand on the defendant for the cotton, and the defendant refused to deliver it to him or to pay him its value. Indeed, the defendant admits these facts, but defends on the ground that it had nothing to do with the cotton, except to gin it, and, after it was ginned, to place it on a platform, from which it was to be afterwards hauled by a drayman of the Farmers' Warehouse to the warehouse, where it was to be held subject to the order of the plaintiff; and in support of this defense evidence was introduced to the effect that the plaintiff, when the cotton was delivered to the defendant, instructed the defendant to send to the Farmers' Warehouse, when the cotton was ginned and baled, the coupons calling for it. The plaintiff denied that he had given any such instructions. Under these facts, the defendant insisted in the court below, and insists here, that no conversion of the cotton was shown, and that the plaintiff failed to carry the burden which the law imposed upon him of proving the conversion; that the proper remedy was an action on the case, for a breach of contract, and that trover did not lie; in other words, that the bailor should have brought an action ex contractu against the bailee, based on the implied contract to return the cotton to the plaintiff as its owner after the purpose of the bailment had been accomplished. Bates v. Bigby, 123 Ga. 727, 51 S. E. 717.

Now, the undisputed evidence showed title to the bale of cotton in the plaintiff, and that its value was $35.75, and the plaintiff testified that he delivered this bale of cotton to the defendant for the purpose of having it ginned; that after doing so, and before this suit was filed, he demanded its return, and the defendant refused to deliver it to him. There was conflict in the evidence as to whether the cotton should be returned to the plaintiff when ginned and baled, or whether, when ginned and baled, the defendant fully performed the purpose of the bailment when it placed the cotton on the platform. The evidence also showed that the bailee not only refused, on demand, to deliver the cotton to the plaintiff, but refused to account for it to him. Under these facts, we think a conversion by the defendant could be implied, and the bailor had the right to sue in trover on the contract of bailment and recover the market value of the property. Lightsey v. Lee, 8 Ga. App. 762, 70 S. E. 179; Wilson Coal & Lumber Co. v. Hall & Brown Woodworking Machine Co., 97 Ga. 330, 22 S. E. 530. In short, the plaintiff proved title, value, conversion, and demand and refusal before the suit was instituted. This was sufficient to make out his right to recover, in the absence of any defense. Pryor v. Brady, 115 Ga. 850, 42 S. E. 223. The defendant conceded all the elements of a trover suit, except the fact of conversion, and, as stated, we think that a conversion could be implied, under the facts sworn to by the plaintiff. The action of trover is founded upon a concurrent right of property and possession, and any act of the defendant which negatives or is inconsistent with this right amounts in law to a conversion. Roper Wholesale Grocery Co. v. Faver, 8 Ga. App. 178, 68 S. E. 883. Certainly the law would cast upon the bailee the duty of exercising due care and diligence in keeping and protecting the property intrusted to him by the bailor, and there was evidence from which the jury could well have inferred that this duty of diligence had not been fully performed by the gin company in reference to the bale of cotton.

We conclude that the evidence, instead of demanding a verdict for the defendant, if sufficient to have justified the direction of a verdict at all, demanded that the verdict be for the plaintiff. Certainly there was such conflict on the question of conversion as would have required a submission of the case to the jury.

Judgment reversed.

SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM (§ 33*)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

The allegations in the answer showed a valid set-off, and the court erred in striking it.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by the Cherokee Sawmill Company against the Florida Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Cherokee Sawmill Company brought suit against the Florida Central Railroad Company on a promissory note. The defendant admitted the execution of the note, but filed a plea of set-off, alleging, in substance, that it delivered at a designated time to the plaintiff nine flat cars, to be used in the plaintiff's sawmill operations; that the plaintiff used the cars, and by reason of usage and rough wear they became worn out and of no value, and the plaintiff was therefore indebted to the defendant in the value of the cars at the time of delivery to the plaintiff, to wit, $3,857, with interest; also that the plaintiff after it had used these cars as above stated, agreed to pay the full value thereof—the plea being based both upon an implied contract to pay for the cars and upon an express promise to pay for them, made after their destruction. The plaintiff moved to strike the answer, and contended that the matters alleged therein as a defense sounded in tort, and could not properly be pleaded as a set-off against a suit on a note. The court passed an order striking the answer "for its insufficiency in law," and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the principal, interest, and costs. The case is here on exceptions to the order striking the plea, and to the final judgment upon the note.

Branch & Snow, of Quitman, and Theodore Titus, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error. Roscoe Luke, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The judge erred in striking the plea. The allegations of the plea do not sound in tort, but are based upon an implied contract, which arose between the plaintiff and the defendant at the time of the delivery of the cars. This implied contract was to pay to the plaintiff the value of the cars, if they were destroyed by any act of the defendant which in law amounted to a conversion, or to pay the reasonable hire of the cars, although they might not have been converted, but were eventually destroyed by the ordinary and natural wear and tear. The plea seems however, to contemplate the first contingency mentioned, and not the latter. Even if the cause of action had partaken both of the nature of a tort and of a contract, the defendant had the right to waive the tort involved in the destruction or use of the cars, and to sue for their value, basing its claim upon an implied promise to pay for them in the one case, or to pay the reasonable value of their hire in the other case. Under these circumstances the law presumes a promise to pay. Civil Code 1910, § 4406; Buchanan v. McClain, 110 Ga. 477, 35 S. E. 665. Besides, the plea contains the further allegation that the plaintiff expressly agreed to pay to the defendant the value of the cars after they had been rendered worthless by usage. This express promise to pay constituted a contract which could be set off against the note, and the demurrer to the plea admits that this promise was made. For both reasons, therefore, we think it clear that the defense relied upon arose ex contractu, and not ex delicto, and the court erred in striking the answer and entering up judgment on the note.

Judgment reversed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1023)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Where the only assignment of error in a bill of exceptions brought to the Court of Appeals is upon the refusal to allow a demand for trial in a criminal case, no question is presented which the reviewing court can determine, and the writ of error will be dismissed.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 576)—TRIAL—REFUSAL OF DEMAND—DISCHARGE.

Where a demand for a criminal trial has been regularly made, and two regular terms of court are thereafter held, and accused is not placed on trial, his discharge results automatically, provided qualified juries were impaneled, and the failure to try is not due to the voluntary absence of accused, or to some other conduct on the part of himself or counsel.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Harry Bishop was convicted of burglary. Conviction was set aside, and new trial ordered. From an order refusing a demand for trial, defendant brings error. Dismissed.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate and Geo. G. Glenn, all of Dalton, for plaintiff in error. T. C. Milner, Sol. Gen., of Cartersville, and Geo. W. Stevens, of Atlanta, for the State.

POTTLE, J. The accused was indicted for burglary. On June 8, 1910, his demand for trial was allowed and entered of record. On December 5, 1910, he was convicted, and on April 11, 1911, the conviction was set aside by the Court of Appeals and a new trial ordered, upon the ground that the evidence, resting solely upon the testimony of an accomplice, was not legally sufficient to support the verdict. Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. App. 206, 70 S. E. 976. At the July term, 1911, at the October term, 1911, and at the January term, 1912, the case was continued upon motion of the state, over the objection of the accused, who was present in court at each of the three terms, demanding a trial. At the January term, 1912, exceptions pendente lite were duly certified and filed, complaining of the refusal of the trial court to "grant said demand [for trial] and allow the same to be entered of record." At the April term, 1912, the case was again called for trial, whereupon the accused announced ready, and moved that he either be tried or discharged and acquitted. At all of the terms above specified juries were regularly impaneled and qualified to try the accused. It does not appear what disposition was made of the case after the April term, 1912.

The trial judge certifies that "there is no doubt of the guilt of movant, but as yet the state has not been able to get additional evidence sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty under the ruling of the Court of Appeals, and, besides, movant is a 'dope fiend' and needs restraint." The bill of exceptions contains an assignment of error upon the exceptions pendente lite filed at the January term, 1912, but does not contain any exception to the refusal of the court to discharge the prisoner at the April term, 1912. A motion to dismiss the writ of error has been filed by the solicitor general, upon the ground that there is no exception to any final judgment, and that the case is still pending in the trial court.

There being no exception to the refusal of the court to discharge the accused, but only an exception to the refusal to grant a demand for trial, there is no exception either to a final judgment or to a judgment which would have been final if rendered as claimed. The question sought to be made is therefore not regularly before the court. Sharpe v. State, 10 Ga. App. 212, 73 S. E. 83; Maples v. State, 10 Ga. App. 786, 74 S. E. 89. But as the accused can still raise the point, and from an adverse decision prosecute to this court another writ of error, we will indicate our views, in order to obviate the necessity of another appeal. Where a demand has been regularly made and allowed, and two regular terms of court are thereafter held, and the accused is not placed on trial, no motion to acquit is necessary, but the discharge of the accused results automatically, by operation of law, provided qualified juries were impaneled competent to try the case, and the failure to try is not due to the voluntary absence of the accused, or to some other conduct on the part of himself or his counsel. Flagg v. State, 74 S. E. 562. The demand of the accused was not satisfied by the trial, the conviction in which was set aside by the Court of Appeals and a new trial awarded; but the demand stood over to be complied with at the next term after the remittitur from this court was entered in the trial court. Gordon v. State, 106 Ga. 121, 82 S. E. 82.

The effort of the learned trial judge to vindicate the majesty of the law, and his reluctance to permit one clearly guilty of a crime to escape upon a mere technicality, are to be commended; but we think the law is equally clear that the prisoner was entitled to his discharge. The statute requiring the state to place the accused on trial at the second term after demand therefor has been allowed was passed in aid of the constitutional guaranty of a speedy trial. If the accused is guilty, the failure of the state to obtain evidence necessary to convict, under well-settled rules of law, furnishes no justification for disregarding the plain requirements of the statute. Cases may arise in the future where innocent men may suffer from the announcement of a precedent which in a particular case would seem to bring about substantial justice, and this furnishes the chief argument in favor of a rigid adherence to the rules and principles which have been prescribed for the government of all trials; nor should we lose sight of the fact that under our system there can be no legal determination of guilt until after a fair trial and a conviction upon sufficient evidence by an impartial jury. Until this result is reached the accused is presumed by the law to be innocent, and, unless one charged with crime is to receive the benefit of this presumption, he need only be accused to be condemned. The accused is entitled to his discharge. Indeed, under the facts appearing in the record, he is already discharged, and no action of the court is necessary to bring about this result.

Writ of error dismissed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§§ 65, 79, 114*)—OFFICERS—POWERS.

The trustees of the school districts created under the provisions of section 1531 of the Political Code of 1910, are empowered to make contracts in relation to school matters, and to acquire and hold land and other property for school purposes, and are invested with capacity to sue and be sued where their rights or liabilities as school trustees are involved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 162-167, 188-191, 271; Dec. Dig. §§ 65, 79, 114.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 111*)—OFFICERS—POWERS.

In the absence of express legislation to the contrary, sound public policy requires that the exercise by the board of trustees of a school district of its discretion as to the expenditure of funds raised by taxes from the citizens of the district for educational purposes should not be interfered with or controlled, unless there is a manifest abuse of discretion, or an expenditure of the funds for some purpose wholly disconnected therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-268; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 79*)—OFFICERS—POWERS.

School funds derived from local taxation within a school district may properly be expended by the trustees of the district in protecting or preserving the right of local taxation for educational purposes, by the employment of an attorney, or in other legitimate expenses, necessary for presenting their rights in the adjudication of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 188-191; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 159*)—TUITION—AUTHORITY OF TRUSTEES.

It is within the power of trustees of any school district in this state to provide means by which all children of school age in that district may receive the benefit of the school fund belonging to the district. And to that end they may either contract with the trustees of an adjoining school district for the payment of the tuition of nonresident pupils to themselves, or agree to pay to the trustees of an adjoining school district, whether in the same or in an adjoining county, the tuition of resident pupils when they determine that these pupils can more advantageously or conveniently attend the school of the adjoining district than the school of the district in which they reside.

5. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 110*)—FUNDS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—REPEAL.

The title to public school money paid into the hands of trustees of a school district while local taxation for school purposes was in force is unaffected by the fact that the local tax law was thereafter repealed or abolished by the provisions of section 1536 of the Political Code of 1910.

Error from City Court of Carrollton; Jas. Beall, Judge.

Action by W. A. Taylor and others, trustees, against G. S. Matthews and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Taylor and Brooks, as trustees of Wesley Chapel school district in Carroll county, sued Matthews, as principal, and Griffin, as surety, on a bond given by Matthews as treasurer of a former board of trustees of the school district. The petition alleged a breach of the bond, and a consequent indebtedness to the petitioners as trustees in the sum of $106.35, with interest, by reason of the fact that Matthews, as treasurer, had failed to turn over to his successor in office, or fully account for, that amount of the funds intrusted to him. It alleged that the sum sued for was paid out illegally, in that Matthews paid from the school fund $50 to an attorney as a fee for resisting proposed legislation affecting Wesley Chapel school district, $6.35 for railroad fare and expenses of certain persons coming to Atlanta to resist the proposed legislation, and $50 to a teacher whose school was in Paulding county for teaching children who resided in Wesley Chapel school district. The bond of Matthews as treasurer contained the condition that: "Whereas the said obligees [J. W. Brooks, W. E. Smith and G. S. Matthews as trustees of the Wesley Chapel local tax school district] elected said Matthews, principal, treasurer of said board of trustees, now, should he fully discharge the duties of said office and faithfully account to said obligees for all funds coming into his hands as treasurer, and return such as may be in hand when his term expires to his successor, then this bond to be void, otherwise of full force and effect."

Matthews pleaded that he had fully discharged his duties as treasurer, and had fully accounted to the proper authorities for all money received. He admitted the payment of the attorney's fee of $50, and defended upon the ground that the payment was in pursuance of a contract made with the attorney by his associates and himself as trustees under the following circumstances: "The people of said district had voted the local tax law in, and the trustees had successfully resisted their efforts to set aside the law in the courts by securing a decision in favor of the school in the Supreme Court, Mr. Holderness being of counsel for said trustees in said litigation, and the movants in said litigation then proposed to have passed by the Georgia Legislature a local bill, which was drafted and presented to the proper committee, abolishing the school district, and he was employed by the board to make an argument on the constitutionality of said bill before a house committee. The committee took the view he presented, and killed the bill." As to the payment of the $6.35, the defendant pleaded that "the trustees thought that said legislation was vicious. They knew that quite a number of people would testify before said committee in favor of the bill. Therefore it was suggested by the board that Mr. Matthews, Mr. Smith, and Prof. Ira Williams should also appear before said committee, which they did, and the actual expenses of said trip charged, all of which was in the interest of the school as they conceived it. After the killing of the bill, the defendant Matthews was directed by the president of the board to issue a draft in favor of Mr. Holderness, and to issue a draft covering the expenses of the said parties who testified before said committee. They plead and insist that the same was in the interest of the school, and insist that they had a legal right to make such an expenditure for the protection of the school interests of said district." The defendants admitted, also, that Matthews paid $50 to J. R. Cole, teacher of the county of Paulding, in settlement of the tuition of children living in Wesley Chapel school district who attended the Cole school, but pleaded as justification of his action that he was instructed by the county board of education of Carroll county to make the payment. It was pleaded, further, that at the time a settlement was demanded of Matthews by Taylor, one of the plaintiff trustees, an election had been held which had resulted against local taxation; the election being held in December, 1909, and Taylor not being commissioned by the county board of education until January 6, 1910; also, that, after the repeal of the local tax law, the trustees of the school district had no right to receive the funds in the hands of Matthews, but that the county board of education of Carroll county alone had the right to receive the funds in his hands, and that Matthews made a full and complete settlement with the county board. It was also pleaded that, before making the settlement with the county board of education, Matthews consulted the Attorney General and the state school commissioner, and was directed to settle with the county board of education of Carroll county, and required by law not to settle with Taylor, and that in the settlement with the county board the authority of the trustees of the school district to employ counsel and send witnesses before the legislative committee to testify in behalf of the school was recognized.

The bond signed by Matthews was put in evidence, and the case was submitted to the decision of the trial judge, without the intervention of a jury, upon the following agreed statement of facts: "Plaintiffs in this case are the only trustees of Wesley Chapel school district in said county. J. F. Brooks was elected and qualified as such trustee in December, 1908. W. A. Taylor was elected in December, 1909, and qualified in February, 1910. J. F. Brooks succeeded J. W. Brooks as trustee. Taylor succeeded G. S. Matthews. W. E. Smith was third trustee, and resigned after Taylor qualified. No successor has been elected. On December 12, 1907, J. W. Brooks, G. S. Matthews, and W. E. Smith were trustees of said local school district. Previous thereto said Matthews was elected secretary and treasurer of said board, and executed and delivered the bond sued on on December 12, 1907, with M. E. Griffin as security. On July 27, 1908, said Matthews paid out of the funds in his hands as secretary and treasurer $6.35 railroad fare to Atlanta and return for three men to testify before a house committee in behalf of the school in resisting a local bill affecting said school district, looking to the abolishment of local tax; also, March 11, 1909, paid S. Holderness out of said funds $50 for appearing before said legislative committee in opposition to said local bill, he having advised that said local bill was unconstitutional. The bill did not pass. On January 3, 1910, said Matthews, as said treasurer, paid out of said fund to J. R. Cole, a teacher of Paulding county, $50 for teaching the pupils of Wesley Chapel school district attending said Cole's school in Paulding county, in pursuance of the following order of the county board of education: 'December 28, 1908. The trustees of Wesley Chapel local tax school district and some of the citizens of said district appeared before the board, asking that this board relieve the situation in said district by cutting the lines in said district or recommending the paying of teachers in other contiguous schools the pro rata part of the school fund for said pupils, or the location of another school in said district. Upon consideration this board of education recommend that the local trustees of Wesley Chapel local district transfer such pupils as are too inconveniently situated to attend the Wesley Chapel school to such other schools as they may see proper, paying for same out of the appropriations made by the board of education to said district and out of the local tax collected in said district.' The $6.85 above referred to was paid by order of the majority of the local board of trustees; J. W. Brooks being absent. The said $50 paid S. Holderness was paid in pursuance of a contract made by a majority of the local board of trustees; Brooks not being present. On the 1st of February, 1910, J. F. Brooks, as treasurer of said local board, demanded the aforesaid sums of money of said G. S. Matthews, and he refused to pay the same to him. Prior to said demand said J. F. Brooks had been elected secretary and treasurer, and qualified as such by giving bond. On December 7, 1909, there was an election held in said district on the question as to whether or not local tax should continue or be abolished, which resulted in the abolition of local tax for said district. On the 17th of February, 1910, the board of education of Carroll county authorized the county school commissioner to have a settlement with G. S. Matthews, treasurer of said local tax school district, and to take charge of such funds as may be in his hands as such treasurer, and also to receive as such county school commissioner such funds as may be in the hands of M. E. Griffin, tax collector, of local tax collected by him and now in his hands, this action taken in pursuance of a ruling of the Attorney General. On February 26, 1910, in pursuance of said action of said county board of education, J. S. Travis, as county school commissioner, had a settlement with the said G. S. Matthews as said treasurer, and approved his accounts, paying out said items, receiving from him $62.47, and receipting him in full for all funds in his hands as treasurer."

The court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs assign error upon the judgment.

W. F. Brown and C. E. Roop, both of Carrollton, for plaintiffs in error. S. Holderness, of Carrollton, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Under the pleadings and the evidence the first question which arises is as to the power of the trustees of a school district, and especially as to their power and authority to bring a suit. We deal with this phase of the case first, because the defendant in his plea questions the right of the present trustees to pursue the instant action, and also because it seems to us that, if the trustees of the school districts provided for by law can employ counsel and maintain an action brought upon a breach of their treasurer's bond, perhaps the trustees of the same district would be authorized, in their discretion, to employ counsel to invoke the protection of their rights in another proceeding and in a different forum, and even to appear before a legislative committee in opposition to proposed legislation directly affecting the trust with the preservation and administration of which the trustees are charged. By the terms of Political Code 1910, §§ 1531, 1532, 1533, provision is made for the creation of school districts into which the law requires each county to be subdivided, for the election of three trustees for each school district, and for the election of a secretary and treasurer, who must be a member; and section 1537 prescribes the powers and duties of the trustees and of the secretary. Some of the duties of the trustees are specifically defined in the Code, but many of their duties and powers must be implied from the nature of the office and the trust imposed upon them. In the absence of an express definition of their powers, or of any limitation upon them in the statute, it must be assumed that there is an implied grant of enough power to enable these trustees to discharge the duties and to effectuate the trust imposed upon them. This view has been taken in other jurisdictions. The trustees of school districts are generally vested with the power of making contracts in relation to school matters. They have been empowered by statute, in this state, to borrow money for certain purposes, and usually they have power to acquire and hold land and other property for school purposes, and are invested with capacity to sue and be sued where the rights of their trust are involved. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 44, 45, and citations. We may remark, in passing, that the rights of the plaintiffs to bring the present suit depend upon the assertion of this principle.

[2] 2. It is apparent from consideration of the various sections of the Code which deal with the organization and administration of our public school system that it was the intention of the Legislature to deal with the subject in a broad, general way, leaving matters of detail largely to the discretion of those specially charged with the conduct of our public school system. See Political Code 1910, tit. 11, c. 4, art. 9, which article deals with the formation of school districts, the election of trustees, and the levy of local tax for public schools both by counties and by school districts. It is declared, in section 1545, that "it is the purpose and spirit of this article to encourage individual action and local self-help upon the part of the school districts," but "it is expressly understood that the general school laws of this state as administered by the county board of education shall be observed." We apprehend this section to mean that as the county board of education is subordinate to the state board of education and to the state commissioner of education, who is its chief executive officer, so the authorities of a school district laid out according to law is to be subordinate to the regulations of the county board of education, and nevertheless individual action and local self-help on the part of the school district is to be given the fullest recognition by those charged with administration of our public school system who are superior in authority to the school district authorities. Naturally this would call for an application of very liberal rules when the exercise of the discretion of the local board in the expenditures of the funds entrusted to them is to be reviewed. Of course, the expenditure of school money for any purpose foreign to the school, and not connected with its maintenance, would be contrary to law. On the other hand, occasions might arise in which the interest of the school would be subserved by the use of a portion of its funds for other purposes than the mere payment of its teachers or even the building or repairing of schoolhouses. The safety of funds already in hand might be involved, or the power to raise any funds in the future might be threatened. In such case it cannot be said that any expense necessary to preserve unimpaired the trust delegated could not be properly made by the school trustees from the school funds. To hold otherwise would be to say that in a supposable case those who are charged with the administration of the school interest of a school district must stand idly by and lose all, for want of power to save their rights by the use of those means, which must be employed by others under similar circumstances. In the absence of express legislation to the contrary, sound public policy requires that the exercise by the board of trustees of a school district of its discretion as to the expenditure of the funds raised by taxes from the citizens of the district should not be controlled or interfered with, unless there is a manifest abuse of discretion, or unless funds raised by taxation for educational purposes for some purpose wholly disconnected therefrom.

[3] 3. It would seem to be implied from the language used in section 1547 that it is the policy of the state to encourage individual action and local self-help in the school districts, and this can best be done by allowing the greatest possible freedom of action on the part of the local trustees, especially in the expenditure of funds raised by local taxation. It would seem to be in consonance with the spirit of our institutions to allow the chosen representatives of those who paid the local tax to control the disposition of the funds, with the single reservation that the money thus raised by taxation must be expended in the maintenance of a local school for whose support it was designed by the voters. It is true that public school money is a trust fund, and cannot be applied except for educational purposes, but it would never do to give so strict a construction to this language as to confine the expenditure to the payment of teachers and nothing else. All language is to be given a construction which will effectuate the purpose sought to be accomplished; and so, while money raised for the maintenance of a public school may in one sense be said to be money raised for educational purposes, it is not raised for all educational purposes, but only for the benefit of pupils in strictly public or common schools. Public school funds cannot be expended for the support of a strictly private school; that is, a school from which children legally entitled to enjoy the benefits of the public school funds may be excluded. But, while the expenditure of public school funds is confined to public schools, we are of the opinion that in the conduct of the public schools the proper authorities (such as the trustees of a school district) may, in their discretion, make any expenditure of the funds which is absolutely necessary for the proper maintenance of the school intrusted to their charge. They might properly expend a portion of the money in repairing or improving the school building, or in fitting it with proper appliances and conveniences. They might insure the school property against loss by fire, and pay the premium from the school fund. By a parity of reasoning we have no hesitation in holding that funds derived from local taxation within a school district may properly be expended by the trustees of the district in protecting or preserving the right of local taxation for educational purposes by the employment of an attorney, or in other legitimate expenses necessary for presenting their rights in the adjudication of the case. This ruling disposes of the alleged breach of the bond in the payment of the attorney's fee and of traveling expenses of witnesses before the legislative committee. The trustees of Wesley Chapel school district contracted to pay the attorney's fees and the expenses of the witnesses. They had the right to make the contract if the expenditure was necessary, and, according to the evidence in the record, the trial judge was authorized to conclude that the expenditure was necessary.

[4] 4. Regardless of the authorization of the county board of education, and the settlement with the county school commissioner, the treasurer was authorized, upon the order of the trustees of the school district, to pay the tuition of those children of school age residing in Wesley Chapel school district.

who attended the school in Paulding county. As provided in section 1537 of the Political Code, the trustees have the right to fix the tuition for nonresident pupils. The power of fixing the rate of tuition for pupils not residing in the district naturally implies the power of the trustees of the district in which the nonresident pupils reside to agree upon their part to pay this tuition, because each child of school age (with some exceptions) is equally entitled to receive the benefit of the common school fund apportioned by the state. It would be mockery to hold that the law, while devolving upon trustees of the common schools the solemn and responsible duty of providing means for the education of children of school age within their district, denies them the power to perform this duty. It is within the power of trustees of any school district in this state to provide means by which all children of school age in every school district may receive the benefit of the school fund belonging to that district. And to that end the trustees may either contract with the trustees of an adjoining school district for the payment of the tuition of nonresident pupils to themselves, or may agree to pay to the trustees of an adjoining school district, whether in the same or in an adjoining county, the tuition of resident pupils when they determine that these pupils can more advantageously or conveniently attend the school of the adjoining district than the school of the district in which they reside.

[5] 5. The point is raised by the plaintiff in error that, upon the repeal of the local tax law in Wesley Chapel school district, it was the duty of Matthews, as treasurer of the local board of trustees, to pay over any funds in his hands to his successor as treasurer of the local board of trustees, and not to the county school commissioner. We think this position is well taken, but it does not affect the decision of the case, for the suit in the present instance does not declare a breach of the bond, except in the three payments to which we have referred, and, consequently, any payment made by Matthews to the county commissioner in settlement of his accounts is not involved. The only questions raised are as to the validity of the payment of the attorney's fees, the expense of the witnesses, and the payment of the tuition of pupils entitled to the benefit of the school fund in Wesley Chapel district to a school in an adjoining county. The title to public school money paid into the hands of trustees of a school district while local taxation for school purposes was in force is unaffected by the fact that the local tax law was thereafter repealed or abolished by the provisions of section 1536 of the Political Code of 1910. The repeal of the local tax in Wesley Chapel school district did not abolish the office of treasurer of the board of trustees of that school district; and by his bond Matthews was bound to pay over any funds in his hands to his successor in office; and, if he paid anything to the county commissioner, the payment would seem to be unauthorized. Certainly, if any of the funds paid by him to the county commissioner had been raised by local taxation and paid by the taxpayers of Wesley Chapel school district, it should have been expended solely for the benefit of that school, but the present suit is not brought to recover any money paid out by Matthews as treasurer other than the three items enumerated above. As to this the payment in each instance was authorized by the local board of trustees, and therefore the principal sum of $106.35 sued for was properly accounted for according to the terms of the bond, and, having been legally expended by him, could not be paid over to his successor.

[8] 6. The judgment of the court below under our view of the law was required by the evidence. The payment of each of the sums expended by the treasurer was authorized by the trustees of the school district, and, as the spending of the money was necessary in the proper administration and preservation of the school fund with which the trustees were charged, it is needless to determine how far the mere order of the majority of the board of trustees would have protected the treasurer in making the payments, if they had been less closely connected with the proper maintenance and improvement of the educational facilities of the school district.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by J. F. Matthews against the Industrial Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. T. Jackson, of Augusta, Ga., for appellant. E. Foster Brigham, of Augusta, Ga., for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from judgment in magistrates' court in favor of plaintiff, affirmed in the circuit court by the presiding judge. There is no conflict in the evidence, the facts being admitted, and it is so conceded by appellant's and respondent's attorneys. The appeal really presents a question of law. The plaintiff brought his action against defendant to recover the sum of $2.10 for one day's work at 20 cents an hour, earned by him as a frame builder for which payment was demanded and refused. The defendant admitted that the plaintiff worked on the day in question, December 20, 1910, the number of hours shown by his shop time card, and the only ground upon which they refused to pay was that plaintiff had failed to punch on that day a mechanical time clock device installed by the defendant which all employes were required to punch when going on and off duty by a rule posted on said clock. The rule read: "All employes must note that this time clock is for their individual protection, and should any one be so careless as to neglect their own interest, by failing to register in and out, there is no one connected with this company, that has the authority to make corrections and from this day on, a man's time card will be taken as evidence of his time, unless he is sent out by the superintendent of his department, who, in that event, will record for his time. [Signed] T. G. Philpot, V. P." There was another rule or regulation of the company posted at the drinking places which was: "Mr. Redfern, Supt. It seems impossible to get your men to appreciate the importance of turning in their time cards. In future any one neglecting to turn in their time cards, will not consider the clock cards as sufficient evidence of his time. [Signed] T. G. Philpot, V. P." There was no written contract between the parties. Upon verdict for the plaintiff in the magistrates' court, defendant appealed to circuit court and alleged error in not granting nonsuit, as moved for by defendant, and alleged certain errors of law by the magistrate in his charge to the jury. His honor, Judge Prince, overruled the exceptions and dismissed the appeal, whereupon defendant appeals and asks for a reversal on the grounds that his honor erred in not sustaining defendant's appeal on each and every ground in not sustaining defendant's motion for a nonsuit, in that the evidence showed that there was a regulation of defendant, known to the plaintiff, requiring employes to punch the clock to indicate the time for which they were to receive pay, and showed, further, that on the day in question, December 20, 1910, plaintiff failed to punch the clock at all, and there was no clock record of any time put in by him that day, and that there was no evidence to support the verdict. Here we have a finding of fact in the magistrates' court, concurred in by the circuit judge on appeal.

[1, 2] We have held repeatedly that a judgment founded on facts in the magistrates' court, affirmed by the circuit court, will not be disturbed by this court if there is any testimony to support it. State v. Powell, 91 S. C. 5, 73 S. E. 1017, and cases therein cited. There is such testimony here, but, as the defendant seems to want this court to indicate some rule by which such business can be governed, any company can adopt such reasonable rules for the conduct of their business as they see fit and proper and as seems expedient to them, provided they are not in contravention of public policy or the law of the land. If the plaintiff violated the reasonable rules of defendant, and defendant had not waived its rules, the plaintiff could have been discharged by the defendant. Parties can contract mutually with each other and be bound mutually by the terms of the contract. There is no testimony in this case that shows that there was any agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that a sum should be forfeited by the plaintiff if he should violate any of defendant's rules, even if those rules were reasonable. "Acts of an employe sufficient to justify a dismissal will not justify a refusal to pay less than the stipulated price for the work, where such acts produce no pecuniary loss to the employer, who did not discharge the employe although aware thereof." McCracken v. Hair, 2 Speers, 256.

In this case there is no testimony that the plaintiff had assented to the rules, even though he knew of them or his attention had been especially called to them. He was not bound by any rules that he had not contracted to observe or was not incident to or assumed by him in the general scope of his employment. This court held, in Norman v. Southern Ry. Co., 65 S. C. 517, 44 S. E. 83, 95 Am. St. Rep. 809: "That a passenger paying full fare for a general ticket is not bound by limitations printed thereon unless his attention has been especially called to them and he has assented thereto." Here plaintiff performed work required and was entitled to be paid.

Appeal dismissed.

1. WITNESSES (§ 48*)—COMPETENCY—CONFESSION OF CRIME.

Where, in an action for the death of a locomotive engineer in a derailment caused by an open switch, the company offered evidence that about two hours before the accident a third person broke the switch lock and threw the switch, the confession of the third person convicted of murder for his wrongful act was inadmissible; his confession disqualifying him as a witness.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 648*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—JUDGMENT IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDING.

Woods, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Georgie E. Fonville, as administratrix of William J. Fonville, deceased, against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for appellants. Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Greenville, and John Gary Evans, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of Wm. J. Fonville. The cause and circumstances of his death are set forth in the complaint as follows:

"(5) That plaintiff's intestate was on the 24th day of September, 1908, and had been for some years, an engineer in the employment of the defendant Southern Railway Company, and on said date was operating an engine drawing train No. 41, a regular passenger train, on defendants' main line from Charlotte, N. C., to Seneca, S. C.

"(6) That on said main line, at a point about one mile south of Wellford, S. C., a spur track, known as Gross' Siding, leaves the main line and extends in a southeasterly direction to Gross' oil mill, and, after passing said mill, it again connects with the main line. That the movement of the spur track at the points of intersection with the main line are controlled by a switch at each connection with the main line. That the switch has connected with it a lantern so placed that it will in the nighttime show a white light when the switch is closed and the main line clear, and a red light when the switch is open and the main line not clear. That some such arrangement is necessary in order to provide for the safety of the employees operating trains in the nighttime, and it is necessary that the light be so placed that it may be seen by the persons in charge of the approaching train.

"(7) That for some distance north of said point the track is curved, and runs through a deep cut and under an overhead bridge, causing the view of an engineer on a south-bound train to be obstructed, so that the signal light placed as it was at Gross' Siding is concealed from view, except for a very short distance. That the said light could have been easily so placed or arranged as to be seen by those in charge of approaching south-bound trains, and that the failure to so place or arrange it was negligence on the part of the defendant.

"(8) That the train in charge of the plaintiff's intestate, at about 40 minutes after 8 o'clock on the evening of said date, approached said siding. That the switch connecting said spur track with the main line had been carelessly left unlocked and open, so that the train operated by plaintiff's intestate ran upon said spur track for about 250 feet, where the engine and two of the coaches were derailed, overturned, and wrecked, and plaintiff's intestate was caught under said engine, and so badly mangled, crushed, and scalded that he died a few minutes thereafter.

"(9) That the death of plaintiff's intestate was caused by the joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants, as follows: That the said switch was carelessly left unlocked or open, or was not provided with a safe and suitable lock, so as to secure it from outside interference, and that at the time of the approach of said train it had been, through the negligence of the defendants, thrown so as to connect the spur track. That the switch light was carelessly placed, so that it could not be seen by the approaching south-bound trains, and could not warn those operating said trains when the switch was thrown. The spur track was carelessly and negligently constructed and maintained, the rails were too light and improperly secured or fastened, the ties defective, the roadway not properly ballasted, or graded, so as to enable trains to pass over it in safety."

The allegations of the fifth paragraph were admitted. All others were denied.

[1] The plaintiff introduced testimony tending to prove all the material allegations of the complaint. Besides relying upon their denial of the material allegations of the complaint, the defendants undertook to prove that Fonville's death was caused by the malicious act of a negro boy, named Clarence Agnew, who, according to their contention, broke the switch lock, and threw the switch. The train was wrecked between 8 and 9 o'clock at night, at Gross' Siding, which is about half way between Duncan and Wellford. Defendants introduced testimony tending to prove that the switch lights were burning, and that the switch was properly set about 6 o'clock that evening, and that about that time, or a little later, Agnew was seen on the railroad going from Duncan towards Wellford; that he was seen knocking at the switch; that he was arrested the next morning at the scene of the wreck and carried to jail, charged with having maliciously caused the wreck; that on the next day—that is, the second day after the disaster—he was taken to the scene by the sheriff, who, following Agnew's directions, found an iron bolt and a part of the switch lock some distance from the switch, and another part of the lock was pointed out to the sheriff by him at or near Wellford, where Agnew was seen about dark on the evening of the disaster. Defendants offered to prove that Agnew had confessed to the sheriff and others that he broke the lock and threw the switch, and they also offered to prove, by the record thereof, his conviction, in the court of general sessions for Spartanburg county, of murder in causing the wreck of the train and the death of Fonville, and that he had been sentenced thereupon to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. The court excluded the record of his conviction and the evidence of his confession. We think the ruling was correct.

[2] The general rule that the records in criminal cases are not admissible in civil cases as evidence of the facts upon which a conviction was had is well settled. There are some exceptions, but the general rule is as stated and it is founded upon sound principles, to wit, the want of mutuality, arising out of the fact that the parties to the record are not the same, and the fact that the course of the proceedings and the rules of decision in the two courts are different. A higher degree of proof is required in criminal than in civil cases. 1 Gr. Ev. § 537; 7 Enc. Ev. 850; Miller v. Sou. Pac. R. Co., 20 Or. 285, 28 Pac. 70; Chamberlain v. Pierson, 87 Fed. 420, 31 C. C. A. 157. Appellant insists that the confessions of Agnew should have been admitted on the authority of Coleman v. Frazier, 4 Rich. 146, 53 Am. Dec. 727. The action in that case was to recover of defendant, who was postmaster at Edgefield, a sum of money contained in a letter mailed by the plaintiffs and addressed to a firm in Charleston. The contents of the letter were stolen while it was in the post office at Edgefield by one Meigs, who was allowed access to the post office. The declarations of Meigs, who was dead, made in the presence of the defendant, that he had stolen the money, were admitted in evidence. Its admission was placed on two grounds: "(1) That the defendant was present, heard it, and received it as true; and (2) that it was the admission of an act, committed by the party making it, against his interest, and subjecting him to infamy and heavy penal consequences, and who was dead at the trial." It will be observed at once that two features distinguish that case from this: (1) In that case, Meigs was dead; in this Agnew is alive. (2) In that, it does not appear that Meigs had been convicted of larceny; in this, it does appear that Agnew had been convicted of murder, and was therefore disqualified as a witness. It is contended, however, that Agnew was civilly dead, because of his conviction of murder. But it must not be forgotten that his conviction disqualified him as a witness; and, as he would not have been allowed to testify under oath against objection, a fortiori, his declarations are inadmissible.

[3] The next assignment of error that will be considered is in admitting evidence that the proper arrangement of the switch would have been to have placed what is known as a distant signal light at the north end of the curve from the switch toward Wellford, where it could have been seen by trains going south in time to stop before running into the switch, such signal light to be connected with the switch by means of rods and cables so as to be worked by the movement of the switch. Appellant contends that the negligence specified in the complaint was that the light was so placed at the switch that it could not have been seen, and that there is no allegation of negligence in not also placing a distant signal light. We think a liberal construction of paragraphs 7 and 9 of the complaint warrants the admission of the testimony complained of.

[4] The court properly submitted to the jury the question whether the defendants' negligence or Agnew's malicious act was the proximate cause of Fonville's death.

[5] The question of proximate cause is ordinarily one for the jury. It may be decided by the court only when the evidence is susceptible of only one rational inference.

The remaining exceptions relate to the charge and refusal to charge. We have carefully examined the charge in connection with the requests, and we are satisfied that the issues were fairly and correctly submitted to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

WATTS and FRASER, JJ., did not participate.

WOODS, J. I concur in the result and in the views expressed in the opinion, except as to the exclusion of evidence of the confession of the negro, Agnew, that he broke the lock and turned the switch. On the issue whether the wreck of the train was caused by the negligence of the defendants' agents in the management of their trains, lights, and switches, or by the criminal act of a third party, there cannot be doubt that such confession would have great probative value. The confessions of Agnew were against his interest, and his conviction of murder disqualified him and made him unavailable as to the defendants as a witness just as if he had been dead. The admission or confession of one who dies after making it is held admissible because of its manifest probative value, and because it is impossible to obtain the direct evidence of such person. Coleman v. Frasier, 4 Rich. 146, 53 Am. Dec. 727. The same reasoning applies as to the admissions and confessions of persons whose direct evidence has become unavailable by causes other than death, such as insanity or conviction of an offense which renders them incompetent as witnesses. Where the confession of a convict was made before conviction, the principle seems clearly applicable. The principle is well illustrated in Griffith v. Sauls, 77 Tex. 630, 14 S. W. 230, where the declarations of one Avery were received because he was rendered incompetent to testify by the loss of the power of speech and other infirmities of age. The Supreme Court of Texas in holding the declarations competent said: "If Avery had been dead, there could be no question as to the admissibility of his statements about which the witnesses testified, and this would be so because of the inability to produce the witness. If the party whose statements would be admissible if he were dead, from advanced age, or other irremediable cause, has lost the power of speech, and the ability to testify either orally or by deposition, what good would it do to produce him? In what would he be better than a dead man in so far as the production of his testimony is concerned? We think the circumstances and condition of Avery, as shown by the record, furnish as satisfactory reason for admitting his statements as proof of his death would afford."

I agree, however, that the exclusion of this evidence is not sufficient ground for reversal because the record shows that the breaking of the lock and interference with the switch by Agnew was proved beyond doubt by other evidence, and was assumed as a fact by the circuit judge in his charge to the jury. The real issue was whether there was negligence of the defendants in not properly safeguarding their trains by placing of their lights and switches, and on the trial of that issue I agree that there was no error.

STATE v. RAY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1912.)

1. FORGERY (§ 7*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—INJURY TO ANOTHER.

Where defendant signed another's name to an order on an express company requesting it to deliver to him a package of whisky which he had ordered in the other's name without his consent, he was guilty of forgery, since his act was calculated to injure the other in his rights, and put him in danger of being prosecuted for violation of the liquor law.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—SIMILAR ACTS.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Anderson County; G. E. Prince, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

T. P. Ray was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Proctor A. Bonham, Sol., for the State. Boggs & Dickson, of Anderson, for appellant.

HYDRICK, J. Defendant was convicted of forgery in signing the name of S. D. Gillard to an order addressed to the Southern Express Company, requesting the company to deliver to him a package of whisky which he had ordered in the name of Gillard, without his consent.

The exceptions raise only two points:

[1] 1. Error in holding that defendant could be convicted, since there was no proof of intention to defraud either Gillard or the express company. This point is controlled by the case of State v. Webster, 88 S. C. 56, 70 S. E. 422, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 337.

[2, 3] 2. Error in admitting other orders of like import, signed by other persons; that is, orders to which the names of other persons had been signed. It appears from the record that testimony was admitted without objection that defendant had at different times presented to the express company orders purporting to have been signed by different persons, and received packages of whisky shipped in their names. As this testimony was not objected to, the appellant cannot complain of its admission. But it was unobjectionable. State v. Allen, 56 S. C. 495, 35 S. E. 204; State v. Talley, 77 S. C. 99, 57 S. Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Maud O. Taylor and others against Isaac Strauss. From an order allowing an amended and supplemental complaint, defendant appeals. Dismissed and affirmed.

Lee & Moise and H. D. Moise, all of Sumter, for appellant. A. B. Stuckey, of Sumter, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This was an action brought to recover real estate and for damages; the complaint and summons being served upon Strauss on April 15, 1911. He answered the same on May 1, 1911. On December 15, 1911, plaintiffs served upon defendant notice of a motion to amend their complaint, based upon an affidavit of Mr. Stuckey, plaintiff attorney, to the effect that since the service of the original complaint it had come to his knowledge that Taylor Goodman was in possession of the land sued for under a written agreement, not recorded, and he was a necessary and proper party to the suit, and he desired to amend his complaint by making Goodman a party and also amend as to the amount of damages claimed. Along with this notice was served a copy of the affidavit of Stuckey and a copy of the proposed amended complaint. The motion was heard by Hon. John S. Wilson, judge of the Third circuit, at which hearing the plaintiffs and defendants appeared by counsel, and defendants resisted the motion upon the ground that the matter was not proper for amendment, but must be brought by supplemental pleadings. Over the objection of the defendant, Judge Wilson granted an order allowing "that the plaintiff have leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint in the form requested in the notice and mentioned herein, and that Taylor Goodman be made a party to this action, and that a copy of the amended and supplemental summons and complaint herein be served upon the said Taylor Goodman, and also upon the defendant, Isaac Strauss, or his attorney, within 10 days hereafter, etc."

From this order defendant appeals, and asks reversal upon the same grounds taken before Judge Wilson at hearing. There is nothing in the exceptions. They are technical, strained, hairsplitting, and absolutely without merit. It was a matter purely within the discretion of the judge to allow or refuse the motion or to impose terms. He had authority under sections 143, 194, 195, and 198 of the Code of Laws to grant the order appealed from.

Appeal dismissed and judgment affirmed.

Where the exceptions assigning error to the denial of defendant's motion to suppress depositions on the ground that at the time they were taken he was engaged in a trial did not show that defendant's attorney, but for such engagement, would have appeared at the making of the depositions, nor that other counsel could not have been engaged to represent him in the taking thereof, nor that defendant was prejudiced thereby, the denial was not error.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Little Bros. against T. H. Brock. Defendant's motion to suppress depositions overruled, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Dagnall, for appellant. Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. [1] This is an appeal from an order refusing to suppress certain depositions. The action was commenced on the 18th of December, 1911. On the 24th of January, 1912, notice was served upon defendant's attorney that the testimony of certain witnesses would be taken de bene esse at Knoxville, Tenn., on the 5th of February, 1912. The following statement appears in the record: "Court of common pleas for Anderson county convened February 5, 1912, and attorney for defendant had other cases set for trial on this day. When the case was called for trial, attorney for defendant moved the court to suppress the depositions of N. T. Little and J. W. K. Brown, pursuant to the notice served on plaintiff's attorneys January 25, 1912. The defendant urged in the support of the motion to suppress the depositions that reasonable notice had not been given of the taking of the depositions, as the depositions had been taken while the court of common pleas was in session, which court had jurisdiction of the action, that it was impossible for defendant attorney to be present and cross-examine the witnesses, as he was engaged in the trial of other cases in court of common pleas at the time the depositions were being taken. The court overruled the motion to suppress the depositions, and allowed same to be used in evidence. Defendant's attorney excepted to the ruling of the court."

In the exceptions assigning error in this ruling, it was not made to appear that but for the defendant's attorney being so engaged he would have appeared at the taking of the depositions; nor that other counsel could not have been engaged to represent him in the taking of the depositions, nor that the defendant was prejudiced by refusing the motion.

[2] Such questions are necessarily largely within the discretion of the trial court. The case of Gibson v. Railroad Co., 88 S. C. 360, 70 S. E. 1030, is conclusive of the question raised by this appeal.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 388*)—FRATERNAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—CAPACITY TO ISSUE POLICY—ESTOPPEL.

By receiving premiums for the insurance, a fraternal order is estopped to deny its capacity to issue a beneficiary life certificate.

3. INSURANCE (§ 718*) — FRATERNAL BENEFICIARY INSURANCE—RIGHT TO PROCEEDS.

Provision in a fraternal benefit life certificate insuring a member of a particular class that after "this" certificate has been in force three years "from the date hereof" it shall be noncontestable is not controlled by a by-law restricting the benefits where a member of that class commits suicide or dies from intoxication, etc., except as to members who have been in good standing for three years before their death, thus restricting recovery on a certificate which had not been in force three years, though the member had been in continuous good standing in the insurance department for three years, having been transferred from another class when the certificate issued.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Catharine W. Kammer against the Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Bates & Simms, of Barnwell, for appellant. James E. Davis and R. C. Holman, both of Barnwell, and W. H. Townsend, of Columbia, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. [1, 2] This is an action by the plaintiff, as beneficiary in a certificate of membership, issued to Henry Kammer, her husband, by the Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias.

The allegations of the complaint which we deem it necessary to reproduce (as there was a demurrer) are as follows:

"First. That the defendant above named is a fraternal order, and is incorporated under the laws of one of the United States of America, and has for its corporate name the 'Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias.'

"Second. That, among other things, the said defendant corporation has an insurance department for the purpose of insuring the lives of its members, who are in good standing in said order.

"Third. That Henry Kammer, late of the county and state aforesaid, before and at the time hereinafter mentioned, was a member of said order (in good standing), to wit, of Blackville Lodge No. 18, one of defendant's local lodges, located at Blackville, S. C., where the said Henry Kammer resided.

"Fourth. That on the 1st day of November, A. D. 1908, the defendant above named for and in consideration of the payment to it by the said Henry Kammer of the sum of $3.16 monthly premiums, insured the life of the said Henry Kammer in plan 'D,' class 5, in its insurance department for the sum of $2,000, and thereby issued to him its certain certificate of membership No. 256,323 (otherwise called its policy of insurance), made payable to the plaintiff above named, who was the wife of the said Henry Kammer, at the head office of its board of control, upon the death of the said Henry Kammer, and upon the receipt and approval of satisfactory proofs, of the fact and cause of the death of said member, while the aforesaid certificate is in full force.

"Fifth. That on the 24th day of August, A. D. 1910, the said Henry Kammer died, having fulfilled all the conditions on his part, and the plaintiff has fully complied with all the conditions of said certificate, or policy of insurance on her part.

"Sixth. That no part of said insurance has been paid, and the said sum of $2,000 is now due this plaintiff (beneficiary) upon said certificate or policy as herein before set forth."

The defendant demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that "it does not allege defendant's capacity to make the contract set forth in the complaint, and the purpose for which it was incorporated." In disposing of this ground, his honor, the presiding judge, said: "I think the allegations in the first and second paragraphs of the complaint are sufficient to show that the defendant had the capacity to issue the policy." Not only was this ground of demurrer properly overruled, for the reasons just stated, but the case of Williamson v. Association, 54 S. C. 532, 32 S. E. 765, 71 Am. St. Rep. 822, shows that the defendant, after receiving the benefits mentioned in the complaint, was estopped from relying upon such fact.

There was a second ground of demurrer, but his honor, the presiding judge, allowed the plaintiff to amend her complaint so as to remedy the alleged defect. The demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

[3] The defendant, after admitting certain facts, alleged as a defense: "That amongst the various privileges and requirements of the said fifth class are especially these agreements contained in the fourth, tenth, and eleventh paragraphs of said certificate, and a part of said application for transfer, to wit: '(4) After this certificate has been in full force for thirty-six consecutive months (three years) from the date thereof, it shall be incontestable.' * * * [Italics ours.] That notwithstanding that the said certificate was not in force for 36 consecutive months from its date, and notwithstanding the agreement of said Henry Kammer that, 'if his death be caused or superinduced by the use of intoxicating liquors, narcotics or opiates,' the said Henry Kammer's death, as alleged in the complaint, was caused or superinduced by the use of intoxicating liquors, narcotics, or opiates, as this defendant is informed and believes; and under the terms of said certificate the amount 'to be paid on this certificate, if any, shall be a sum only in proportion to the whole amount thereof as the member's matured life expectancy is to his entire expectancy at the date of this certificate.' * * * That, if there be anything due under this certificate of membership, the amount is $152.03. The defendant introduced in evidence, for the purpose of sustaining said defense, section 32 of the by-laws, which was as follows: "If the death of any member of the fourth class heretofore admitted, or hereafter admitted, to said class, or if the death of any member of the fifth class shall result from suicide, either voluntary or involuntary, whether such member shall be sane or insane at the time, or if such death shall be caused or superinduced by the use of intoxicating liquors, narcotics, or opiates, or in consequence of a duel or at the hands of justice, or in violation, or attempted violation, of any criminal law, then the amount to be paid upon such member's certificate shall be a sum only in proportion to the whole amount, as the matured life expectancy is to the entire expectancy, at date of admission to the insurance department, the expectation of life based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality in force at the time of such death to govern; provided, that in the case of members transferred to the fourth class, from either of the former first, second or third classes, the date of such transfer shall be taken, as the date of admission to the insurance department, in computing the amount to be paid as aforesaid: Provided, that this section shall not apply to any member of the fifth class, who has, at the time of his death, been in continuous good standing in the insurance department for thirty-six months consecutively immediately preceding his death." After reading said section to the jury, his honor, the circuit judge, thus charged them: "I want you to notice these provisions: 'Provided that in case of parties transferred to the fourth class, from either of the first, second, or third classes, the date of such transfer shall be taken as the date of the admission to the insurance department,' etc. I charge you that this section does not apply in the case of a member of the fifth class, such as is sued on in this case. It does not apply if the person insured has been in good standing in the insurance department, either the fourth class or fifth class, for 36 months immediately preceding the time of his death. * * * My reason for making this ruling is: You will notice in the first proviso it is provided, in case of a transfer into the fourth class from the first, second or third classes, it says the date of the transfer shall be taken as the date of admission to the insurance department. But in the next proviso there is no such thing as that. There is no such language as that used, but it is provided that this section shall not apply to any member of the fifth class, who has at the time of his death been in continuous good standing in the insurance department for 36 months." If his honor, the presiding judge, had only been called upon to consider section 32 of the by-laws, it may be that he properly construed it. But his construction is inconsistent with the provisions of the certificate, quoted in the answer of the defendant. The words in the fourth paragraph of the certificate which we italicized show that the 36 consecutive months therein mentioned were to commence from the date of the certificate transferring Kammer to the fifth class. Furthermore, if section 32 of the by-laws was properly construed by the circuit judge, then there was no necessity to insert in the certificate the provisions set out in the answer. The writings which form the contract must be construed together, and the construction which we have placed upon them is the only one that will give force and effect to every part thereof. The exceptions raising this question are sustained. These views practically dispose of all questions involved.

Judgment reversed, and new trial granted.

GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 151*)—SERVICES OF GUARDIAN—COMMISSIONS.

Under the rule allowing guardians $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. commissions for all money received and the same rate for all money paid out, where the guardian of certain minors received and paid out certain funds belonging to the minors for which he was required to increase his bond from \$800 to \$4,500, he was entitled to commissions thereon.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Geo. W. Gaze, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of Henry Mosley, deceased. From a circuit court order reversing a probate order allowing H. S. Boulware, as general guardian of Rachel Mosley and Henry Mosley, commissions on a portion of the estate, he appeals. Reversed.

J. J. McSwain, of Greenville, for appellant Boulware. L. O. Patterson and B. M. Shuman, both of Greenville, for appellees Rachel and Henry Mosley.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from an order of Judge Gage made at March term of court, 1911, for Greenville county, reversing an order of the probate court for said county allowing the appellant, as general guardian for Rachel Mosley and Henry Mosley, commissions on the sum of $2,095.50, amounting to the sum of $104.77. Henry Mosley, the father of Rachel and Henry, died testate in Greenville county on April 30, 1908, leaving real and personal property in Greenville county and real estate in Atlanta, Ga. His personal property was insufficient to pay his debts, and an order was taken in probate court for Greenville county to sell certain real estate in Greenville county and the personal property, which was done, and the proceeds arising therefrom was insufficient, and a further order was taken to sell more real estate. The appellant, Boulware, had been duly appointed general guardian for Rachel Mosley and Henry Mosley, and entered into bond in the sum of $800 conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties as said guardian. In the meanwhile certain real estate in Georgia of the testator had been sold, and the net proceeds of that sale, amounting to $2,200.50 belonging to the minors, Rachel and Henry, was in the hands of the Georgia court ready to be turned over to them or their legally appointed guardian. On August 19, 1909, John T. Bramlett, Esq., as judge of probate for Greenville county, upon Boulware executing a bond in the sum of $4,500, with sufficient surety, passed the necessary orders for Boulware to receive the funds, and the Georgia funds were accordingly turned over to Boulware, and he disbursed the funds under a decree of the probate court for Greenville county, and was allowed commissions for receiving and paying out, by an order of that court, which order was appealed from and reversed by the circuit judge.

The judgment of the circuit court should be reversed. Executors, administrators, guardians, etc., are allowed $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. commissions for all money that they shall receive, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for all money that they may pay out. Boulware received the money as guardian of the minors, and paid it out as such. In order to get the money, he was required to increase his bond from \$800 to \$4,500. This fund was in another jurisdiction. He brought it in South Carolina and is entitled to his commissions.

Judgment of the circuit court reversed.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 269*)—LEASES—CONSTRUCTION.

C. and his wife and three others granted to S. and B. the sand located on a tract of land at a fixed price per cubic yard, with the right of ingress and egress and to locate buildings, etc. The grantees assigned their interest to a company, to which C. and his wife by a later agreement granted the right to build wharves, etc., and leased 4 acres; it being recited that it was desirable to extend the terms of the previous contract to secure the land necessary for wharves, etc. Held, that the agreements cannot be regarded as one contract; and hence, under Code 1904, §§ 2791, 2962, personal property which had been removed from the land covered by the first agreement to the 4-acre tract more than 30 days was not subject to levy under a distress warrant for rent accruing under the first agreement.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Northampton County.

Action between the Dime Deposit & Discount Bank of Scranton, Pa., and Mary E. Wescott and others. From the judgment, the Dime Deposit & Discount Bank appeals. Reversed.

This is a controversy between creditors of the Old Dominion Granite Brick Company, an insolvent corporation. The appellant claims that it has the superior lien on the proceeds of certain personal property by virtue of a fieri facias levied upon it prior to the levy of a distress warrant and attachment sued out by the appellees. The latter insist that their lien is superior to that of the appellant, although the levy under which they claim was later in date, because the relation of landlord and tenant existed between them and the debtor company. The appellant denies that the demand of the appellees is for rent, and insists that, if it were, the property levied on was not on the leased premises, and, so far as it ever had been, had been removed therefrom for more than 30 days prior to the levy.

The commissioner who took the account in the case reported that the property levied on was on a 4-acre parcel of land upon which the debtor company had erected its factory and other buildings, which land was not within the boundaries described in the agreement of May 14, 1906, the original lease, as claimed by the appellees, and that the sand levied on, which came from lands described in that agreement, had been removed therefrom more than 30 days before the levy.

The 4 acres upon which the property was when levied on is land embraced in an agreement dated February 14, 1907. These two writings, it is claimed by the appellees, must be construed together, and constitute one entire lease, and that property on lands described in either writing was liable for the rent claimed.

The agreement of May 14, 1906, is as follows:

"This agreement, made this 14th day of May, A. D. 1906, between Mary E. Wescott, Anna Cora Wescott, William H. Wescott, E. W. Custis, and Mary E. Custis, his wife, hereinafter called the 'vendors,' of the first part, and L. M. Sturgis and John P. Butler, hereinafter called the 'purchasers,' of the other part,

"Witnesseth: That the said vendors, in consideration of the sum of ten cents ($.10) per cubic yard, to be paid them by the said purchasers or their assigns, as hereinafter provided, and of the agreements and covenants as hereinafter contained to be done and performed on the part of the said purchasers, do by these presents agree to sell unto the said purchasers and their assigns all the sand being on that certain tract of land lying and being in Savage's Neck, in Northampton county, Virginia, beginning at the southwestern corner of the land of Mrs. F. G. Mapp, and running along the bay shore at ordinary high-water mark to Sandy Point, and lying between said bay shore and a certain line of marked trees on the east, with full and free liberty of entry and right of way for the said purchasers, their assigns, their servants, agents, workmen, and teams, in, through, over, and upon said premises, for the purpose of taking and removing and carrying away the said sand and manufacturing the same; the said purchasers to take not less than twelve hundred cu. yds. (1,200 cu. yds.) of sand per month, unless prevented by act of God or unavoidable accident from so doing. It is understood that the fee-simple title in said lands do not pass to the purchasers or their assigns under this agreement. It is further agreed, by and between the said parties, that the said purchasers shall cut no timber and shall injure no crops, nor interfere with any rights of fishing and oystering now owned by said vendors. It is further agreed, by and between the said vendors and said purchasers, that the said purchasers shall have the right of ingress and egress, to and from said land, over the lands of the said vendors for all lawful purposes, as may be designated by the said vendors, and that they, the said purchasers and their assigns, shall have the privilege of putting upon the lands of the said vendors all necessary buildings, and factories which may be necessary for them to erect, in order to properly use and manufacture said sand, the points at which said buildings and factories to be erected to be designated by said vendors; and it is also agreed that said purchasers shall have the right to build along the said bay shore such wharves and boat landings as they deem necessary to properly conduct their business, and that the said vendors shall have the right and privilege to use said wharves and boat landings so built by said purchaser, free of charge.

"In consideration whereof, the said purchasers do by these presents agree to pay unto the said vendors, their executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of ten cents ($.10) per cubic yard of sand without deduction, the method of estimating a cubic yard to be in such a manner as may be satisfactory to the said E. W. Custis and Wm. H. Wescott, payment for all sand used during any month on or before the 10th day of the succeeding month. It is further agreed, by and between the aforesaid parties, that the said parties of the second part, or their assigns, shall begin taking the same on or before the 1st day of December, A. D. 1906. This contract is executed in triplicate."

In November of the same year Sturgis and Butler, parties of the second part to that agreement, assigned all their right, title, and interest in it to Brundage and Knapp, trustees, who acquired the same for the benefit of the Old Dominion Granite Brick Company (the debtor corporation), and afterwards, in April, 1908, assigned the same to that company.

In February, 1907, E. W. Custis and Mary E., his wife, two of the five parties of the first part to the agreement of May 14, 1906, entered into the following agreement with the debtor company:

"This agreement, made this 14th day of February, A. D. 1907, between E. W. Custis and Mary E. Custis, his wife, of Eastville, Northampton county, Virginia, parties of the first part, and the Old Dominion Granite Brick Company, Incorporated, a corporation of the state of Virginia, party of the second part:

"Whereas, by the terms of a certain contract dated the 14th day of May, A. D. 1906, the said E. W. Custis and wife, joined by others, did agree with L. M. Sturgis and John P. Butler, giving and granting unto the said Sturgis and Butler the exclusive right to take all the sand being in and upon that certain tract of land in Savage's Neck, Northampton county, Virginia, in said contract fully described, and for the purposes and at the rates of compensation fully set forth in said contract, which said contract is duly recorded in the proper office for the recording of deeds and other documents in Northampton county, Virginia, to which reference is hereby made, and by the terms of said contract, it was further agreed, that the said Sturgis and Butler should have the privilege of putting upon the lands of the said Custis and wife, and others aforesaid, all necessary buildings and factories, which may be necessary for them to erect and maintain in order to properly use and manufacture said sand, the points at which said buildings should be located, erected, and maintained to be designated by said Custis and wife, and others aforesaid, also that the said Sturgis and Butler should have the right to build along the bay shore such wharves and bay landings as they might deem necessary to properly conduct their business; and whereas, all the title, right, and interest of the said Sturgis and Butler in said contract has heretofore been assigned unto F. E. Brundage and H. A. Knapp, trustees for the Old Dominion Granite Brick Company, Incorporated, which said assignment has been duly recorded in the same office for recording deeds aforesaid; and whereas, the said parties of the first part hereto are the owners of that portion of Savage's Neck upon which the said Old Dominion Granite Brick Company, Incorporated, desire to erect, construct, and maintain their factory and build their wharf for the shipping of their products, and it is deemed desirable to have a modification or extension of the terms of said contract so far as concerns the landing necessary for wharves, piers, factories, buildings, and plans of said brick company, which modification or extension has been agreed upon by the parties hereto:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the sum of one ($1.00) dollar, by each of the parties hereto unto the other in hand well and truly paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, it is hereby agreed as follows, to wit:

"First. The brick company shall have the right to build a wharf or pier at Sandy Point into Cherrystone creek, near the end of the said point, and to occupy as much land as may be necessary for that purpose, and also to extend a track or tracks in as nearly a straight line as practicable from this point to the sand deposit, situate about one mile in a northerly direction, and to use, occupy, and maintain said tracks with as much land as may be necessary for the same, not to exceed ten feet in width at any point where it runs through the timber of the parties of the first part north of field where the plant of said brick company is to be constructed, during the entire life of said contract of May 14, 1906.

"Second. The said brick company shall have the right to use and occupy for the construction and maintenance of their factory and buildings appurtenant thereto, which may be necessary in the proper conduct of their business, a piece of land as follows: Starting at an iron pin driven in the ground at a corner of the woods of the parties of the first part, as designated by said parties; thence in an easterly direction, about 240 feet, to a corner; thence in a southerly direction, about 750 feet, to a corner; thence in a westerly direction, skirting a small pond, about 430 feet, to a corner; thence in a northerly direction to the iron pin, place of beginning, containing four acres of land as thereabouts.

"Third. In consideration of those additional privileges herein extended to the said brick company, it is agreed that five hundred dollars of the preferred stock in said brick company and $1,000 of the common stock of said brick company shall be issued unto the said Custis and wife. The Old Dominion Granite Brick Company doth hereby constitute and appoint Henry A. Knapp to be its attorney for it and in its name, and as for its corporate act and deed, to acknowledge this agreement before any persons having authority, under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, to take such acknowledgment, to the intent that the same may be duly recorded.

"In witness whereof, this contract has been executed by the said parties hereto on the day and year first above written."

Starke, Venable & Starke and Kendall & Daniel (S. T. Stancell, of counsel), for appellant. Otho F. Mears, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. (after stating the facts as above). If it be true, as contended by the appellant, that the property on which the distress warrant and attachment were levied was not on the premises for which the rent was claimed to be due, and had been removed therefrom for more than 30 days prior to the levy, then it is wholly immaterial whether the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the appellees and the debtor company; for, even if such relation did exist, the appellant's claim would be superior to that of the appellees.

[1] It is clear, we think, that the agreements of May, 1906, and February, 1907, cannot be considered as constituting one contract. While the latter recites in substance the provisions of the former writing, and states that the brick company desires to erect its factory and build its wharf on property owned by Custis and wife, and that it is deemed desirable to have a modification or extension of the terms of the agreement of May, 1906, "so far as concerns the landing necessary for wharves, piers, factories, buildings, and plans" of the brick company, the parties to the two agreements are different and the subject-matter is not the same. There were five persons parties of the first part to the agreement of May, 1906. Of these only two were parties to the agreement of February, 1907. The four acres of land which the brick company acquired the right to use and occupy for the construction of its plant by the latter agreement were not within the boundaries described in the agreement of May, 1906. The consideration paid for it was stock in the brick company, issued to the two parties of the first part in the February agreement, and not to the five persons who were parties of the first part in the May agreement.

[2] Where two papers are executed at the same time, or simultaneously, between the same parties in reference to the same subject-matter, they must be regarded as parts of the same transaction and receive the same construction as if their several provisions were in one and the same instrument. Portsmouth Refining Co. v. Oliver Refining Co., 109 Va. 513, 520, 64 S. E. 56, 32 Am. St. Rep. 924, and authorities cited; Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 710, 714, 24 S. E. 345. But we know of no rule of law that would authorize or justify the court in construing as one instrument two writings executed under the circumstances disclosed by this record.

The rent or royalty, for the collection of which the distress warrant and attachment were sued out, was due or to become due under the agreement of May, 1906, was payable jointly to all five of the persons who were parties of the first part to that agreement, and the said proceedings for its collection were in the name of and for the benefit of all of them. The property levied on under the distress warrant and attachment not being on the premises described in that agreement (the leased premises, if the agreement were a lease, as to which we express no opinion), and none of it having been on said premises for more than 30 days prior to the levy, it was not subject to such levy; for there is no authority for levying either a distress warrant or an attachment for rent upon property which has been removed from the leased premises more than 30 days. Code, §§ 2791, 2962.

It follows, from what has been said, that we are of opinion that the circuit court erred in holding that the lien of the appellant was inferior to the claim of the appellees, and that its decree so holding must be reversed, and this court will remand the cause to the circuit court for further proceedings in accord with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

WHITE et al. v. OLD et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 456*)—CONSTRUCTION—MEANING OF WORDS.

Words in a will which have a definite primary meaning must be understood to be used in such sense, unless an intention to use them in another sense manifestly appears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 974; Dec. Dig. § 456.*]

2. WILLS (§ 499*)—CONSTRUCTION—MEANING OF WORDS—"NIECE" OR "NEPHEW."

Testator gave a legacy to his niece Kate, daughter of Dr. H. W., and to Dr. H. W. a specified sum for himself and his other children, and he gave legacies to any niece or nephew whom he had omitted, excepting the children of Dr. H. W., for whom he had made provision. Testator was a widower, who had never had any children, and left surviving him a number of nieces and nephews, and grandnieces and grandnephews, descendants of sisters who died before the execution of the will. There were two Drs. H. W., father and son; the father being the father of the niece Kate. Testator had a niece Mrs. P., who was omitted from the will, and the legacy to her was on her death paid to her children. Held, that the words "niece or nephew" did not embrace grandnieces and grandnephews.

3. WILLS (§ 483*)—CONSTRUCTION—PROPERTY DEVISED—EFFECT.

Testator provided that if, under the decision of the Supreme Court of Appeals recently rendered in a suit involving the construction of his wife's will, he should receive his distributive share of her estate free from claims, he desired his executor to purchase a lot in the city of Norfolk to erect thereon a public library building, and he devised to the Norfolk Public Library, a domestic corporation, such lot, provided it would erect a public library building thereon. The executor was unable to carry out the provision immediately, and subsequently another donated a lot as a site for a public library building, and the library corporation, with funds furnished by a third person, erected a public library thereon. The library corporation insisted that the lot devised by testator was necessary to meet the growing needs of the city for another library building, and insisted on its capacity to hold, and its ability and readiness to erect thereon a suitable library building. Held, that the devise was valid.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Suit by W. W. Old, executor of Henry Dubois Van Wyck, deceased, against one White and others, to construe the will of the deceased. From a decree construing the will, certain defendants appeal. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

N. T. Green and Maryus Jones, for appellants. J. B. Jenkins, W. W. Old, Jr., G. Tayloe Gwathmey, and A. B. Seldner, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. This bill was filed by W. W. Old, executor of Henry Dubois Van Wyck, deceased to construe two clauses of testator's will. The first of these clauses is as follows:

"To any niece or nephew of mine whom I have omitted or neglected in making the above provisions (excepting the children of Dr. Howell White, for whom I have provided as hereinbefore set out) the sum of three thousand dollars."

The testator was a widower, who had never had any children and left surviving him a brother, and nieces and nephews, and grandnieces and grandnephews, descendants of four sisters who died before the execution of the will. Dr. Howell White, here mentioned, was a nephew, and appellees' contention is that the effect of the parenthetical language employed in the foregoing clause referring to the children of Dr. White, who were grandnieces and grandnephews of the testator, manifests a purpose to enlarge the primary meaning of the words "any niece or nephew," so as to include grandnieces and grandnephews. The trial court so construed the clause, and from that ruling the residuary legatees appealed.

The provision for the White children referred to occurs in a previous clause of the will as follows: "To my niece Kate Bartow, daughter of Dr. Howell White and Helena White, the sum of two thousand dollars; and to Dr. Howell White the sum of ten thousand dollars for himself and his other children." There were two Drs. Howell White, father and son. That the first part of the preceding clause refers to the elder White is made plain by the fact that he is the father of Kate Bartow; and that the subsequent bequest of $10,000 to Dr. Howell White, "for himself and his other children," has reference to Dr. Howell White, Jr., is shown by the circumstance that the only children of the elder Dr. White are Mrs. Kate Bartow and Dr. Howell White, Jr. Besides, the pleadings show that the father predeceased the testator. The adjective "other," which precedes "children," has no significance; and the conclusion that its insertion was a mere inadvertence gains color from the fact that prior to the execution of the present will the testator had, at different times, prepared three drafts of wills along the same general line, and in the corresponding clause in each of these drafts the word "other" is omitted.

We pass, then, to the consideration of the concrete question involved in this branch of the controversy, namely, whether testator, in using the words "niece" and "nephew," intended to include grandnieces and grandnephews.

[1] It is a canon of construction that words in a will or other written instrument which have a definite primary meaning must be understood to be used in that sense, unless an intention to use them in some other sense manifestly appears. Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 710, 24 S. E. 345; Vaughan v. Vaughan, 97 Va. 322, 33 S. E. 603; Brett v. Donaghe, 101 Va. 786, 45 S. E. 324; Roberson v. Wampler, 104 Va. 380, 51 S. E. 835, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 318; Roanoke v. Blair, 107 Va. 639, 60 S. E. 75.

In 3 Jarman on Wills (5th Am. Ed., from 4th London Ed., notes by Randolph & Talcott) p. 707, rule XVI, the principle is thus stated: "That words, in general, are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense only, unless the clear intention to use them in another can be collected and that other can be ascertained."

In Wootton v. Redd, 53 Va. 196, Judge Lee, at page 206, observes: "Conjecture cannot be permitted to usurp the place of judicial conclusion, nor to supply what the testator has failed sufficiently to indicate." Waring v. Bosher, 91 Va. 286, 21 S. E. 464; Allison v. Allison, 101 Va. 537, 44 S. E. 904, 63 L. R. A. 920. See, also, the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackstone in Perrin v. Blake (1771) Hargrave's Law Tracts, 489-510; s. c. 10 Eng. Rul. Cases, 689.

In Crook v. Whitely, 7 De G., M. & G. 490 (44 Eng. Reprint, 191), Lord Chancellor Cranworth remarks: "According to the ordinary rule of construction, the word 'niece' as used in this will must be taken in its natural sense, which means the children of a brother or sister."

In Schouler on Wills, § 536, it is said: "Notwithstanding the equivocal sense of 'nepos,' in Roman jurisprudence, 'nephew' means in English law the son, and 'niece' the daughter, of a brother or sister, and great-nephews and greatnieces are not embraced by the term."

So, in Lomax on Executors, 36, subsec. 15: "'Nephews' and 'nieces' will not, upon the principles already stated with respect to the construction and enlargement of the term 'children' and 'grandchildren,' ordinarily comprehend grandnephews and grandnieces."

The rule that "children means generally issue in the first degree, and does not embrace grandchildren," has been repeatedly decided by this court. Smith v. Chapman, 11 Va. 246; Thomason v. Anderson, 31 Va. 127, 128; Moon v. Stone, 60 Va. 130; Waring v. Waring, 96

Va. 641, 32 S. E. 150; Vaughan v. Vaughan, supra; Brett v. Donaghe, supra.

[2] Looking, therefore, to the will as a whole, we find nothing upon which to lay hold as a safe guide to indicate an intention on the part of the testator to use the words "any niece or nephew of mine" in other than their primary or ordinary sense. It will be noted that, exclusive of the clause under interpretation, testator employs the word "niece" only twice in his will. He speaks of his "niece" Mrs. Van Gelsen and of his "niece" Kate Bartow, and in each instance applies the word in its primary sense. On the other hand, the words "grandniece" and "grandnephew" do not occur in the entire will, but legatees of that class are designated either by name or as the "children" of their parents.

In Re Woodward, 117 N. Y. 522, 23 N. E. 120, 7 L. R. A. 367, the court uses this language: "As to the appellants, they are called by the testator, not 'nephews' or 'nieces,' but 'children' of his deceased 'niece,' and in the same clause are twice referred to in that manner—a discrimination in language and choice of words of description which indicate no intention to include the persons named with nephews and nieces, but the contrary. It is obvious that testator had in his mind the different degrees of relationship of his various beneficiaries, and the selection of different words to describe them cannot be attributed to mistake or inadvertence."

It moreover appears that testator had a niece, Mrs. Catherine Parks, who was omitted from his will, and that fact satisfies the language of the clause in judgment, other than the parenthetical proviso. Mrs. Parks having died, her legacy was paid to her children. Yet, if the construction given to the clause be correct, each of these children of Mrs. Parks, in addition to their mother's portion, is entitled to receive a legacy of $3,000, which could hardly have been testator's intention.

In Shelly v. Bryan (1821) Jacobs, 207 (37 Eng. Reprint, 824), a leading case on the meaning of "nieces" and "nephews," Sir Thomas Plummer, M. R., says: "But it would be contrary to the authorities to interpret a term having a proper application to one class as extending to two classes, comprising both parents and children."

And in Crook v. Whitely, supra, Lord Chancellor Cranworth observes: "But I do not know any case in which it has been held that the same words can be construed to include persons of different degrees in the same class."

This brings us to the consideration of the force to be given the parenthetical words, upon which the decision of the court of law and chancery seems to have been rested, in the clause under construction: "To any niece or nephew of mine whom I have omitted or neglected in making the above provisions (excepting the children of Dr. Howell White, for whom I have provided as hereinbefore set out) the sum of three thousand dollars."

The argument is based on the ground that as Dr. Howell White was himself a nephew of testator, and his children grandnieces and grandnephews, the parenthetical words would be useless unless the testator intended to include grandnieces and grandnephews in the expression "any niece or nephew of mine."

The clause as a whole is at most only a precautionary one, intended to avoid the possibility of premitting any of a named class. But in no aspect of the situation is the parenthetical exception necessary to effectuate any intention of the testator. It in terms applies only to "omitted or neglected" nieces and nephews, and (even if grandnieces and grandnephews were intended to be included) it could by no possibility have affected the rights of the children of Dr. Howell White, who were neither "omitted" nor "neglected," but had already been provided for. So that the contention amounts to this: That a useless provision in a precautionary clause in a will shall, by implication, be given the effect of introducing a new class of beneficiaries, embraced by no other language of the will. Such a deduction from an implication affords a most unsafe guide in the exposition of wills or other writings.

In this connection it would be wise to keep in mind the admonition of Sir William James, L. J., in Re Blowers Trust (1870) L. R. Ch. App. Cases, 350 (a case like the instant case, where it was sought to vary the ordinary meaning of the words "nephews and nieces," so as to include "grandnephews and grandnieces"): "But before we alter the meaning of words in obedience to a supposed indication of intention of the testator—before we deviate from the direct path in order to follow a light which appears to be held out by the testator—we must take care to be reasonably sure that it is a genuine light, and that we are not following the glare of a will-o'-the-wisp into a morass."

The effect of provisos and exceptions in a statute was luminously considered by the House of Lords in Guardians of the Poor v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, A. C. (1897) 647, a number of their lordships delivering opinions. Lord Chancellor Halsbury says: "It [his construction of the act] satisfies the words, whilst the other view [that the proviso enlarged the enacting clause] gives to the proviso a meaning which I think would be most formidable, not merely with reference to the question which is now under debate before your lordships, but also as a matter of construction, that a proviso could be so read as to suggest that the previous part of the section of which it is a proviso should imply by law the existence of words there of which there is not a trace in the previous words of the section itself."

My lords, that certainly would be a very serious invasion upon any rule of construction by which any document, whether an act of Parliament or anything else, has ever been construed, and I should be very much averse indeed to lend any countenance to such a mode of construing a proviso."

Lord Davey said the whole argument was based on "the old and apparently ineradicable fallacy of importing into an enactment which is expressed in clear and apparently unambiguous language something which is not contained in it, by what is called implication from the language of a proviso which may or may not have a meaning of its own." Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 222; Tinkham v. Tapecott, 17 N. Y. 141, 152; Baggaley v. Pittsburg & L. S. I. Co. (C. C. A.) 90 Fed. 636, 36 C. C. A. 202.

The provision of the will construed in Cromer v. Pinckney, 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 466, cited in the opinion of the trial court, was essentially different from the clause before us. The language of the bequest in that case was: "To the children of my nephew John Cromer." John Cromer, though a grand-nephew, was described as a "nephew," which showed conclusively that the word "nephew" was not used by the testator in its primary sense.

Our conclusion, therefore, upon this branch of the case, is that testator used the words "niece" and "nephew" in their ordinary sense, and that the court of law and chancery erred in holding that those words embraced greatnieces and greatnephews.

[3] The other clause of the will involved in this appeal is as follows: "If under the decision of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia recently rendered in the suit therein pending involving the construction of my wife's will, I shall receive my distributive share of her estate free from the claims of fees of the attorneys asserted therein, then I desire my executor to purchase a lot in the city of Norfolk, Virginia, for the purpose of having erected thereon a building for a public library, he to use and invest the money necessary to purchase the said lot as he may think best, and such lot so purchased I devise and bequeath to the Norfolk Public Library, a corporation chartered by the state of Virginia, if the said corporation will erect or have erected a suitable building thereon for a public library, and desire my executor to make or have made the proper conveyance of the said lot to the said corporation."

The decree appealed from upholds this provision of the will. The executor was not able to carry out the provision immediately upon taking charge of the estate; and subsequently the family of the late Dr. William Selden donated a lot as a site for a library building, and the corporation, with funds furnished for the purpose by Andrew Carnegie, erected a public library thereon. Nevertheless the corporation insists that it is not limited to a single library building, and that the lot in question is necessary to meet the growing needs and demands of the citizens of Norfolk for another library building in the interest of literary improvement. And it insists upon its capacity to take and hold the lot donated by the testator, and its ability and readiness to erect or cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for a public library, as provided for in testator's will.

In these circumstances, there was plainly no error in the decree appealed from, sustaining the devise.

Upon the whole case, the decree must be reversed in part and affirmed in part, as outlined in this opinion.

Reversed in part; affirmed in part.

MONK et al. v. BARNETT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 232*) — ISSUANCE OF STOCK—PAYMENT—RIGHTS OF CREDITOR.

Under Const. 1902, § 167 (Code 1904, p. cclxi), and Code 1904, § 1105e, par. 9, providing that corporate stock may be issued in exchange for anything which the board of directors may determine to accept and at any price agreed upon, provided an accurate and verified statement of the transaction be filed with the State Corporation Commission, creditors of a corporation could not complain that $40,000 of stock had been paid for with certain options and contracts not exceeding $4,000 in value, where no fraud or deception had been practiced, and the requirements of the constitutional and statutory provisions as to filing of the statement or financial plan had been complied with, and they had no right of action against the holders of such stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 879, 880, 883, 884, 987; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 232*) — ISSUANCE OF STOCK—STATEMENT OF FINANCIAL PLAN—SUFFICIENCY.

Though a statement of financial plan filed to comply with such constitutional and statutory provisions was indefinite, vague, and unsatisfactory in its specification and description of the options and contracts exchanged for stock, yet where it was filed with the Corporation Commission, and was in the form prescribed by the Commission, and was permitted, approved, and ordered to be filed by the Commission, it was sufficient to comply with these provisions and protect the holders of the stock from personal liability to creditors of the corporation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Action by John Monk and another against O. M. Barnett and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jeffries, Wolcott, Wolcott & Lankford, for appellants. Robt. W. Shultice and Williams & Tunstall, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. This case, which is now before us for the second time, originated in a bill in equity filed by appellants against the Exposition Deepwater Pier Corporation and appellees, C. M. Barnett, J. W. Hough, and H. B. Goodridge, who were the only stockholders and incorporators of said corporation; the purpose of the bill being to enforce the mechanic's lien of the appellants against the pier and land of the Exposition Deepwater Pier Corporation, and to require the stockholders of the corporation to pay in full their subscriptions to the capital stock of the company.

There were two questions presented upon the former appeal, and upon the first of these questions this court reversed the decree of the circuit court appealed from, and remanded the cause, declining to pass upon the second question, for the reason that it appeared from the evidence in the record that the property of the corporation was sufficient to pay appellants' lien debt thereon; but the opinion added: "If, however, the real estate should prove inadequate to satisfy the lien, the appellants are not to be concluded by the decree under review from seeking such relief as they may be entitled to, if any, against the stockholders. Monk v. Exposition Deepwater Pier Corp., 111 Va. 121, 68 S. E. 280.

It appears that when the evidence in the cause was taken the pier was comparatively new, and was supposed to be worth the amount named by the witnesses—$10,000; but from various causes operating during the delay because of litigation as to the rights of the respective creditors in the property, it, after full advertising and active bidding, brought at public auction on September 17, 1910, only $2,400, leaving about $4,000 still due appellants. Thereupon appellants proceeded in their effort to obtain a decree against said stockholders for an amount sufficient out of what remained unpaid of their subscriptions to discharge the balance of the debt alleged to be due appellants; but upon a final hearing of the cause the circuit court entered its decree now under review, holding that said stockholders had substantially complied with the provisions of the Constitution and statutes of the state "enacted for the formation and regulation of corporations in this state, and that said stockholders [appellees here] had paid in full their subscriptions to the stock of the Exposition Deepwater Pier Corporation, and that there was no further liability upon them, or either of them," dismissing appellants' bill as to said stockholders.

Appellees, Barnett, Hough, and Goodridge, who, as has been stated, were all the stock subscribers and incorporators of said Deepwater Pier Corporation at the time of its organization filed with the State Corporation Commission, in March, 1907, a statement of the financial plan upon the basis of which the stock or bonds of the corporation were to be issued, and the contention of appellants is that said statement filed by appellees was not such a compliance with the provisions of section 167 of the Constitution of Virginia (Code 1904, p. cclxi) and of section 1105e, par. 9, of the Code of 1904, as would avail appellees of the privilege extended by the statute of avoiding their common-law liability to pay into the treasury of the company so much of their stock subscriptions, up to the par value thereof, as might be necessary to discharge the indebtedness of the corporation.

[1] Section 167 of the Constitution, supra, confers upon the General Assembly power to make general laws regulating and controlling all issues of stock and bonds by corporations, and further provides:

"Whenever stock or bonds are to be issued by a corporation, it shall before issuing the same file with the State Corporation Commission a statement (verified by the president or secretary of the corporation, and in such form as may be prescribed or permitted by the Commission), setting forth fully and accurately the basis, or financial plan, upon which such stock or bonds are to be issued; and where such basis or plan includes services or property (other than money), received or to be received by the company, such statement shall accurately specify and describe, in the manner prescribed or permitted by the commission, the services and property, together with the valuation at which the same are received, or to be received; and such corporation shall comply with any other requirements and restrictions which may be imposed by law."

Said section of the Constitution then required the General Assembly to provide adequate penalties for the violation of the section, or any laws passed in pursuance thereof.

The statute (paragraph 9, § 1105e, supra) provides:

"Subscriptions to the capital stock of any corporation may be paid in money, land, or other property, real or personal, leases, options, mines, minerals, mineral rights, patent rights, rights of way, or other rights or easements, contracts, labor, or services; and there shall be no individual or personal liability on any subscriber beyond the obligation to comply with such terms as he may have agreed to in his contract of subscription; and any corporation may adopt such plan of financial organization and may dispose of its stock or bonds for the purposes of its incorporation at such prices, for such consideration, and on such terms and conditions as it sees fit: Provided, however, that before making any issue of its stock or bonds it shall file with the State Corporation Commission a statement (verified by oath of the president or secretary of the corporation, and in such form as may be prescribed or permitted by the Commission), setting forth fully and accurately the basis or financial plan upon which such stock and bonds are to be issued; and where such basis or plan includes services or property (other than money) received or to be received by the corporation, such statement shall accurately specify and describe in the manner prescribed or permitted by the Commission the services and property, together with the valuation at which the same are received, or to be received, and the judgment of the directors as to the value of such land or other property, real or personal, leases, options, mines, mineral rights, patent rights, rights of way, or other rights or easements, contracts, labor, or services, in the absence of fraud, participated in by both parties to the transaction, shall be conclusive.

"For any violation of this section the offending corporation shall be liable to a fine of not exceeding one thousand dollars, to be imposed and judgment entered therefor by the State Corporation Commission, and shall be enforced by its process."

The financial plan filed with the State Corporation Commission in this instance is as follows: "Four hundred shares, valued at $4,000, are to be issued to J. W. Hough, H. B. Goodridge, and C. M. Barnett as fully paid in consideration of their turning over to said company their options, rights, and contracts to acquire land and build a pier near the Exposition Grounds, and their contracts with various steamboat lines to use said pier exclusively in taking passengers to said grounds, and contracts with said steamboat companies and with the Jamestown Exposition Company to take and pay cash for certain bonds of this company; said rights, options, and contracts being valued at four thousand dollars."

It appears that appellees subscribed to $40,000 of the stock of the Deepwater Pier Corporation, and paid for it with the contracts and options named in said plan of organization, all of which were worth, according to their own valuation, but $4,000; and it is conceded in the argument of this appeal that "the very object of section 187 of the Constitution was to do away with the common-law liability of stockholders," under which they could be required to pay (in money) for their stock up to the par value thereof until the debts of the company were satisfied.

Very clearly the provisions of the Constitution and statute change the former rule, and persons organizing a corporation can subscribe to its capital stock and pay therefor in anything which the board of directors may determine to accept, and at any price which may be agreed upon, and the stock may be paid for at any price at which it may be offered by the company, and no one can complain, provided the requirements of the Constitution and statute are complied with. Therefore the sole question for our determination in this case is: Where no fraud or deception has been practiced, does the financial plan of organization in question meet the requirements of the provisions of the Constitution and statute, and thereby relieve the appellees of their common-law liability to pay for the stock subscribed to by them up to the par value thereof until the debts of the company are satisfied?

It is very true, as appellants contend, that the statute, supra, enacted pursuant to section 187 of the Constitution, with respect to the liability of subscribers to the capital stock of a corporation chartered under the laws of this state, is in derogation of the common law and has to be given a strict construction; but it will readily be observed that the statute, in language plain and unambiguous, provides that subscriptions to the capital stock of any corporation may be paid, not only in money, but in every or any species of property or property rights that could be suggested, including leases, options, contracts, labor, or services, etc., and there shall be no individual or personal liability on any subscriber beyond the obligation to comply with such terms as he may have agreed to in his contract of subscription; that any corporation may adopt such plan of financial organization, and may dispose of its stock or bonds for the purposes of its incorporation at such prices, for such consideration, and on such terms and conditions as it sees fit, provided a statement of its financial plan of organization is first filed with the State Corporation Commission, in such form as may be prescribed or permitted by the Commission, setting forth fully and accurately the basis or financial plan upon which such stock or bonds are to be issued; and where such basis or plan includes services or property (other than money), received or to be received by the corporation, such statement shall accurately specify and describe in the manner prescribed or permitted by the Commission the services and property, together with the value at which the same are received, or to be received, and the judgment of the directors as to the value of the services or property, real or personal, leases, options * * * contracts, etc., in the absence of fraud, shall be conclusive.

In this case appellees subscribed to $40,000 of the stock (400 shares) of the Exposition Deepwater Pier Corporation, and agreed with themselves as the incorporators and directors of the company that said stock be issued to them fully paid in consideration of their turning over to the company "their options, rights, and contracts to acquire land and build a pier near the Exposition Grounds, and their contracts with various steamboat lines to use said pier exclusively in taking passengers to said grounds, and contracts with said steamboat companies and with the Jamestown Exposition Company to take and pay cash for certain bonds of this company, said rights, options and contracts being valued at four thousand dollars."

[2] A more indefinite, vague, and unsatisfactory specification and description of the options and contracts agreed to be turned over to the company by appellees in payment for the $40,000 of stock fully paid to be issued to them by the company is hardly to be conceived; but the statement of the financial plan of the organization of the corporation filed with the Corporation Commission was in the form prescribed by the Commission, and was by the Commission permitted when it received, approved, and ordered the same to be filed and to become a matter of record in the office of the Commission.

By the adoption of our present Constitution, and the enactment of statutes pursuant thereto, relating to the issue of stocks and bonds by corporations, the policy of granting charters of incorporation to almost every conceivable business undertaking then in existence, or that might be undertaken within the state, was inaugurated, and though the policy may be fraught with ever so many possibilities, indeed probabilities, of fraud and imposition upon individuals, firms, or other corporations dealing with or becoming creditors of a corporation chartered in the state, the courts, in the absence of the charge and proof of fraud in the obtaining of the charter or the organization of the corporation, or the issuing of its stock, are powerless to prevent or to redress such wrongs or impositions.

This new policy now in vogue in this state has not only in view the granting of a charter to any three or more individuals to conduct, as a corporation, any business that might be conducted by an individual or individuals within the state, but invites the application for such charters, and provides that all persons, firms, partnerships, or other corporations contracting with the corporation chartered in the state must look to the records of the State Corporation Commission for information there to be found, or suggested, as to the character, location, and value of the assets of the corporation, and if they fail to look to said records, or fail to make proper inquiry along lines suggested by these records, and sustain a loss or injury in consequence of such neglect of duty, they shall have no remedy in the courts against the stockholders having certificates of fully paid stock for such loss or injury.

One who is advised or might have been advised as to the character and value of the assets of a corporation, and extends credit to the corporation, cannot, in the absence of fraud in the organization of the company, or the issuing of its stock or bonds, complain that the assets of the company were not as valuable as he expected them to be, and he has no remedy or right of action against the stockholders of the corporation holding its fully paid stock.

Such is the case before us, and we are of opinion, therefore, that the decree appealed from is right, and it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nottoway County.

Suit by C. P. E. Burgwyn against W. I. Jones and others. From a decree of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. E. Plummer, for appellant. W. Moncure Gravatt, T. Freeman Epps, and H. H. Watson, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. The decree appealed from held that the agreement upon which the appellant, who was the complainant in the circuit court, based his right to the relief sought, was one providing for the sale of an interest in real estate, and, not being in writing, was invalid under clause 6 of section 2840 of the Code. The agreement relied on was made in August, 1906, and, as set out in the bill, is as follows:

"The property known as the 'Fitzgerald Mill Property,' situated in Nottoway county, Virginia, near Nottoway Courthouse (the legal title to which at the time said agreement was made being in the said M. W. Gill, E. F. Peirce, and W. I. Jones as aforesaid), was to be examined by your complainant, and a report on said property, dealing with its possibilities as a power plant and its availability for furnishing electric light power to the neighboring towns, was to be made by your complainant to said M. W. Gill, E.

F. Peirce, and W. I. Jones, or to any one of them, and your complainant was to perform such other services as would naturally be performed by an engineer, such as surveying, making estimates of the cost of development, etc.; that as soon as your complainant made such examination, submitted such report, and performed such other services as would naturally fall to him, all of said parties, to wit, M. W. Gill, E. F. Peirce, W. I. Jones, and your complainant, were to endeavor to sell said property at the best price and on the best terms that could be secured, said property to be sold as a whole, and each of said parties to deal with said property as to them might seem best, the one object being to secure a purchaser at a price which would yield a profit upon the money invested and the services performed; and that as soon as said property should be sold, the profits realized on said transaction should be equally divided between the four parties above mentioned.

"(6) Your complainant avers that said agreement was in effect a partnership agreement, and that said parties were, as between themselves, copartners; that it was mutually understood and verbally agreed by and between said parties that your complainant, by reason of the services to be rendered by him for the benefit of said undertaking, was to have an interest in the said property equal to that of any of said parties, after the purchase price of said property and the expense of maintaining the same had been deducted, and that all of the said parties would work together for their common benefit."

As appears from the allegations of the bill filed in September, 1908, Jones, Peirce, and Gill were the fee-simple owners of the real estate at the time the alleged partnership agreement between them and the complainant was made, by which he was "to have an interest in the said property equal to that of any of said parties after the purchase price of said property and the expense of maintaining the same had been deducted." It was further alleged in the bill that in the year 1907 Gill sold and conveyed all his interest in the said land to Peirce and Jones, and that later in the same month Peirce sold and conveyed all his interest therein to Jones, the vendee in such sale assuming the liability then resting on the vendor; that in the same year Jones sold and conveyed an undivided one-half interest in the land to Carter, White, and Epes, who were purchasers without notice of the appellant's rights; that the appellant, therefore, only had an equitable interest in the undivided half of the property owned by Jones, but was entitled to have an accounting from him for the proceeds arising from the sale of the other half, and was entitled to one-fourth of all the profits that have been or may be realized on the sale of the property. It was prayed that there might be a settlement of the partnership accounts, that his equitable interest in this undivided half of the land standing in Jones' name be established and protected, that his share in the profits which have accrued from the transaction be ascertained and decreed him, and for general relief.

In the year 1911 the appellant filed his amended and supplemental bill, of which he made the original a part, and in which he alleged that since the filing of the original bill the whole of the land had been sold to the Norfolk & Western Railway Company (the latter having knowledge of his rights), reiterated the allegations of his original bill that he is the owner of an equitable interest in the land so sold, and prayed that the Norfolk & Western Railway Company be made a party defendant to the bill (which was done), and for substantially the same relief that he sought by his original bill.

[1, 2] It is well settled in this state that a partnership for the purchase and sale of real estate for speculation, the profits to be divided among the partners, is valid when verbally made, and the existence of the partnership and the extent of the interest of the partners may be shown by parol. Miller v. Ferguson, 107 Va. 249, 250-252, 57 S. E. 649, 122 Am. St. Rep. 840, 13 Ann. Cas. 138, and authorities cited. But the precise question in this case seems not to have been involved in any of the cases cited and decided by this court. In those cases the partnership formed was for the future purchase and sale of lands for profit. In this case the land in which or in the proceeds of which, the appellant claims an interest, was at the time the partnership was formed the property of the members of the firm other than the complainant.

It is insisted by the appellee Jones that there is a wide distinction between an agreement to acquire an interest in or to share the profits of lands thereafter to be acquired and an agreement to become interested in and to share the profits from lands already purchased and owned by a member or members of the firm when the partnership is formed. Upon this question the authorities are not agreed.

Browne, in his work on the Statute of Frauds (section 261a), is inclined to the opinion that the weight of authority is in favor of the view that it is not material, where the land is used for partnership purposes, "whether the partnership was already established and engaged in its business when the land was acquired and brought into the stock, or whether it was established and the land acquired and put in contemporaneously, or whether the partnership was established for the purposes of some other trade or business, or for the special purpose of dealing in and making a profit out of the very land itself which is in question."

Our cases, as before stated, fully recognize and enforce the rule as stated by the learned author, so far as it applies to the purchase of lands made subsequent to the formation of the parol partnership for dealing in real estate; but they have not gone to the extent of holding that an agreement is not within the statute of frauds which includes also an agreement for the purchase and sale of an interest in lands then owned by one of the partners, or to be subsequently acquired by him.

While the precise question involved in this case has not been passed upon by this court (and seems not to have often arisen in any jurisdiction), we have decisions which seem in principle to limit the rule to purchases of land or interests therein subsequent to the formation of such partnership.

In Henderson v. Hudson, 15 Va. 510, the complainant relied on a verbal agreement between himself and the defendant that the latter should associate the former as partner with him in the purchase of a certain parcel of land, and sought to have a one-half interest therein decreed to him. The statute of frauds was relied on by the defendant. Chancellor Wythe, who presided in the trial court, was of opinion that the statute applied to contracts and actions upon them between the buyer and seller of land, and not to a contract between the purchaser and a third person that such person should be admitted as a partner in the purchase, and granted the relief sought; but upon appeal it was held that the statute did apply, the decree of the trial court was reversed, and the bill dismissed.

In Walker v. Herring, 62 Va. 678, 8 Am. Rep. 616, that decision was approved; it being held that the statute of frauds and perjuries applied to a parol contract entered into between the plaintiff and defendant, by which the former agreed to purchase, and did purchase, certain lands at a trustee's sale for himself and the defendant, the terms of which the latter refused to comply with.

These cases are in conflict with the broad doctrine laid down by Mr. Browne in his work, and are so regarded by him, especially the latter decision. These cases in principle are in accord with decisions in other jurisdictions.

In Caddick v. Skidmore, 2 De G. & J. 51, the defendant owned a colliery, and he and the plaintiff made an oral agreement to become partners in the colliery for the purpose of leasing it upon royalties which were to be divided between them. The colliery was demised upon a royalty on account of which the defendant made certain payments to the plaintiff, and afterwards the defendant sold the original term. The bill prayed for an accounting and for payment for what was due to the plaintiff, apparently both back royalties and his share of the proceeds of sale. Lord Chancellor Cranworth dismissed the bill for a want of a sufficient memorandum in writing, saying that "an agreement to the effect that plaintiff and defendant were to become partners in a colliery for the purpose of demising it upon royalties, which were to be divided in some proportion between them," was in his opinion "an agreement not capable of being enforced unless proved by such evidence as is required by the statute of frauds."

In the case of Goldstein v. Nathan, 158 Ill. 641, 42 N. E. 72, it was held that a parol contract between the owners of separate tracts of land, by which they agreed to sell them and divide the profits equally, was void under the statute of frauds. Both parcels of land were sold, and suit was brought by one of the parties to enforce the agreement against the other. In that case it was contended that, since it appeared from the bill that the lots had been sold, nothing remained but to account for the profits, and it was denied that the statute of frauds in any way controlled the question. The Supreme Court of Illinois, fully recognizing the doctrine, prevailing in that jurisdiction as well as in this state, that a partnership may be formed for the purpose of dealing in lands for profit, and that the existence of such partnership and the extent of the interests of the respective partners may be shown by parol, said in discussing that case that there was a wide distinction, however, between "an agreement for one to become interested in the profits of certain land already purchased and owned by another, and an agreement to share in the benefits to be thereafter acquired. Where lands are purchased by a partnership and paid for with the moneys thereof, or acquired as partnership property in the usual course of such partnership, a court of equity may treat such real estate as partnership funds, and as a consequence personal property. This rule grows out of the nature of the partnership relation, and is rendered necessary for the purpose of doing justice between the parties, or between the firm and others doing business and having dealings therewith. Black v. Black, 15 Ga. 445. In this case the land was not purchased by the appellant in the name of the appellee and the purchase money paid by the appellant. It is not a case of a purchase of lands paid for out of partnership funds and a deed taken to appellee. No partnership funds existed. There was, therefore, no resulting trust in appellant, and whatever interest he is alleged by the bill to have acquired was by virtue of his contract. The lot was owned by the appellee at the time of the contract, and paid for by his money, and any interest in the land or the proceeds growing out of the alleged contract cannot be secured and made to apply to the profits as distinct from the land itself. If appellant acquired an interest in appellee's lot by virtue of his contract, it attached upon the contract being made. If such interest attached, and the land had not been sold, the appellant would have been entitled to his moiety therein. Had the appellee died before sale, and appellant had an interest in the lot, he would have had the right to sell and wind up the partnership affairs. It is only by having acquired an interest in the lot that he could have acquired an interest in the proceeds of the sale. We hold that where two separate owners of real estate, purchased by their separate funds, enter into a copartnership with reference to a sale thereof by a parol contract, such contract is within the statute of frauds."

One of the cases referred to as sustaining the conclusion reached in that case was McCormick's Appeal, 57 Pa. 54, 98 Am. Dec. 191. In that case Judge Strong, afterwards Justice Strong of the Supreme Court of the United States, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Undoubtedly a partnership may hold real estate, and they may have a resulting trust where the partnership funds have paid for them. Such was Erwin's Appeal, 39 Pa. 535, 80 Am. Dec. 542. So there may be a constructive trust in favor of the firm, as was held in Lacy v. Hall, 37 Pa. 360; but these come within the exceptions to the statute of frauds. In both cases the lands were acquired after the partnerships had been formed and while the joint business was in progress. But here there is no resulting or constructive trust. The agreement, if there was any, to put the land into the joint stock, was made before the firm had any being, and the partnership funds did not pay for it. A parol agreement to put land into a firm, or to consider it as firm property, made before the firm exists, is wholly ineffectual to pass any title either in law or in equity."

The court is of opinion that the verbal agreement set up by the appellant in his pleadings was one providing for the sale of an interest in real estate, and within the statute requiring the same to be in writing, and that the circuit court did not err in refusing the relief prayed for, and dismissing his bills.

N. J. STEIGLEDER & SON v. ALLEN.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 3*)—SUBCONTRACTOR—PRIVITY.

At common law, there being no privity between an owner of property and a subcontractor, who had agreed with the general contractor alone to construct a portion of a building for the owner, such subcontractor had no legal claim which he could maintain against the owner for work done or materials furnished under his contract with the general contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 99*) — BUILDING CONTRACT—RIGHTS OF SUBCONTRACTOR—OWNER'S LIABILITY—STATUTES—NOTICE.

Code 1904, § 2479, provides that any subcontractor may give written notice to the owner, or his agent, stating the nature of his contract and the probable amount of his claim, and if the subcontractor shall, after the work is done or materials furnished by him, and within 30 days from the time the building is completed or his work thereon is terminated, furnish the owner, or his agent, and the general contractor a correct, verified account of his claim against the general contractor, the owner shall be personally liable to the claimant for the amount due to such contractor by the general contractor, provided the same does not exceed the sum in which the owner is indebted to the general contractor, etc. Held, that the subcontractor's right to recover against the owner was purely statutory; and hence, where the subcontractor's notice to the owner of the nature of his contract and the probable amount of his claim was not given until after the work was completed and the materials furnished, it was insufficient to charge the owner.

Error to Circuit Court, Henrico County.

Action by N. J. Steigleder & Son against Joseph E. Allen. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

O'Flaherty & Fulton, for plaintiffs in error. Allen G. Collins, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This action of debt was brought by plaintiffs in error, N. J. Steigleder & Son, a partnership, against defendant in error, Joseph E. Allen, to recover of the latter the sum of $1,039, a balance alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs, as subcontractors with one R. H. Walton, a general contractor, who had contracted with the defendant to build and construct upon the latter's lot of land in Ginter Park, Henrico county, Va., a certain house. The declaration in the case, inter alia, charges that the defendant, as owner, on September 1, 1909, contracted with said Walton, general contractor, to build a concrete block house in Ginter Park for the defendant, for the sum of $8,000; that Walton, general contractor, on September 6, 1909, contracted with plaintiffs, as subcontractors, to do the entire cement and concrete work in said house for the sum of $1,989; that plaintiffs completed their said work on January 31, 1910, and on February 18, 1910, gave notice in writing of said contract, and the work they had done, to the defendant, owner of said house, and that on June 20, 1910, before the expiration of 30 days after the completion of said building, the plaintiffs also gave another written notice to the defendant, and served upon him a verified copy of the account, showing that there was a balance of $1,039 then due by Walton to the plaintiffs for doing said cement and concrete work on the defendant's house; that at the time of the service of the first notice the defendant, Allen, had in his hands the sum of $8,000 due to Walton, the general contractor, under his aforesaid contract; and further alleged that by reason of said facts the defendant became and was, under section 2479 of the Code of 1904, personally liable and indebted to the plaintiffs for the said sum of $1,039, the balance due them for said work.

The defendant, on October 29, 1910, appeared and filed a written demurrer to said declaration, and set forth therewith in writing the grounds of the demurrer, among which, and the only one that we deem it necessary to consider, is that the notice of February 18, 1910, was not given by the plaintiffs to the defendant until after the plaintiffs had completed their part of the work, and that section 2479 of the Code required this notice to be given before or while the work was being done, and that it could not be given after the plaintiffs had completed their part of the work.

The defendant also, on October 29, 1910, filed a special plea and the "particulars of his defense"; but the circuit court, without ruling on the special plea or the "particulars of defense," entered the judgment to which this writ of error was awarded, sustaining the demurrer to the declaration, and giving judgment for the defendant for costs against the plaintiffs.

The question presented is whether the notice given by the plaintiffs, after their work was completed and their materials furnished, was a sufficient compliance with the provisions of section 2479 of the Code to bind the defendant personally for the debt asserted by the plaintiffs.

[1] At common law there was no privity of contract between the owner of property and a subcontractor with a general contractor, who had alone contracted with such owner to construct a building or other improvements upon his property, and therefore such subcontractor had no legal claim which he could maintain in a court of law or equity against the owner for work done or materials furnished under his (the subcontractor's) contract with the general contractor; but by our statute, originating in the act appearing in Acts 1869-70, p. 444, the common-law rule was abrogated and a right of action in the subcontractor against the owner of the property built upon or improved was provided in certain circumstances and upon well-defined conditions. Up to the enactment of the statute as amended, appearing in the Code of 1887 as section 2479 (Code 1904, p. 1241), it was not very clearly determinable whether the notice required of the subcontractor to be given to the owner of the work to be done or material to be furnished by the subcontractor was to be done before the work was done or the materials furnished by him, as a condition precedent to his right to demand and have of the owner pay for the work done and materials furnished, or whether such notice after the work was completed was sufficient; but by section 2479 of the Code of 1887 the subcontractor might give notice of the "nature and character of his contract and the probable amount of his claim," and after he had performed his work and furnished the material, and the structure was completed, or the work thereon otherwise terminated, he was required to furnish the owner with a "correct account, verified by affidavit, of his claim against the general contractor for the work done or materials furnished and of the amount due," and to furnish a like account to the general contractor, which account was to be furnished to the owner and the general contractor within 30 days from the completion of the building or structure, or the work thereon otherwise terminated.

When the Legislature came to re-enact said statute, it by an act approved February 28, 1894 (Acts 1893-94, p. 523), framed it as follows: "Any subcontractor may give notice in writing to the owner or his agent, stating the nature and character of his contract and the probable amount of his claim; and if such subcontractor shall at any time after the work done or material furnished by him and before the expiration of thirty days from the time such building or structure is completed or the work thereon otherwise terminated furnish the owner thereof or his agent and also the general contractor with a correct account, verified by affidavit, of his claim against the general contractor for the work done or materials furnished and of the amount due, the owner shall be personally liable to the claimant for the amount due to said contractor by said general contractor: Provided the same does not exceed the sum in which the owner is indebted to the general contractor at the time the notice is given or may thereafter become indebted by virtue of his contract with said general contractor."

That statute, which is now section 2479 of the Code of 1904, and controls this case, may have been intended by the Legislature, as plaintiffs contend, "to broaden and widen the scope of the statute, and to give the subcontractor additional rights to any of those that had been conferred upon him by or under any of the former laws, and sought to give him a remedy which would be adequate to his varying needs"; but clearly it was not intended to put the owner, contracting with a general contractor for improvements on his property, at a greater disadvantage by allowing the subcontractor for a part of the work or materials himself to give the owner notice of his demand against the general contractor either before, during, or after the performance of the work. While it was the object of the statute, under certain conditions, to make "the owner personally liable to the subcontractor for the amount due him by the general contractor," it was also intended that the owner should be apprised of the probable amount of the subcontractor's claim against the general contractor, so that the owner, as said by this court in Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Miller, 80 Va. 826, might protect himself by not paying to the general contractor an amount exceeding the sum due him at the time the subcontractor's notice was given, or he would thereafter become indebted to the general contractor by virtue of the owner's contract with him.

How unfairly the statute might be made to operate against the owners of property designing to put improvements thereon under contract with that large class of persons engaged as general contractors in such business, if the interpretation of the statute contended for by the plaintiffs in this case could be sustained, cannot be better illustrated than by reference again to the facts appearing in the record.

On June 20, 1910, plaintiffs served upon the defendant a second notice, setting forth that they furnished their material and completed their work on January 31, 1910, and that they gave their first notice February 18, 1910. After this second notice was given the defendant, the plaintiffs, on June 23, 1910, filed a mechanic's lien against the defendant's lot and building. Other subcontractors with Walton, the general contractor, filed notices with the defendant, and some of such subcontractors filed mechanics' liens against defendant's house and lot, and the Miller Manufacturing Company filed a bill in chancery to enforce against said house and lot a lien filed by it, which bill was for the benefit of all other subcontractors who had filed liens to the extent of the amount then due by defendant, Allen, to Walton, the general contractor. The defendant had with Walton, on June 20, 1910, a settlement by which it was ascertained that he (defendant) was indebted to Walton in the sum of $1,196.68, while the claims asserted by the subcontractors amounted to $3,496.84.

[2] It will be observed that the statute, supra, requires (1) a notice from a subcontractor to the owner of the "nature and character of his contract and the probable amount of his claim"; (2) within 30 days after the materials are furnished or the work to be done by the subcontractor is completed, he is to furnish the owner with "a correct account, verified by affidavit, of his claim against the general contractor for the work done and materials furnished, and of the amount therefor due"; and (3) serve upon the general contractor a like account. If the service upon the owner of the required verified account of the subcontractor could be considered as sufficient to make the owner personally liable to the subcontractor for the amount of the latter's claim against the general contractor, then it would have been needless to require a notice from the subcontractor to the owner before he performed the work or furnished the material required under his contract with the general contractor. The language of the statute unmistakably indicates that the notice must be given before the actual amount of the claim is ascertained, before the material is furnished or the work completed, to apprise the owner of the nature of the contract under which the subcontractor will have a debt due to him; while the requirement that the subcontractor shall, within a prescribed period, serve the owner and general contractor with a verified account, etc., was intended to have the owner informed as to the actual amount of the subcontractor's claim against the general contractor.

The right of the subcontractor to recover of the owner, personally, in such a case, like the right of such a contractor to enforce a mechanic's lien against the owner's property, is purely the creation of the statute, and it must be availed of, if at all, upon the terms and conditions which the statute prescribes. Section 2479 of the Code prescribes in express, plain, and unmistakable language the way, and the only way, in which an owner of property can be bound personally to a subcontractor for a debt due him from the general contractor, with whom the owner alone contracted for improvements upon his property. As was said by this court in Shackelford v. Beck, 80 Va. 573, with reference to certain portions of the mechanic's lien statutes: "As the law calls for nothing unreasonable at the hand of him who would fasten an incumbrance upon the property of his neighbor, no just ground of complaint is afforded by insisting upon a rigid adherence to its provisions."

The declaration in this case does not set out facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to a personal judgment against the defendant for the amount of the demand made upon him, or for any part thereof, and therefore the judgment of the circuit court, sustaining the demurrer thereto, is right, and is affirmed.

Affirmed.

MULLINS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 18, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 366*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—RES GESTÆ.

The declarations of deceased, shortly before leaving home on a trip, during which it was claimed he was murdered, that he was going for whisky, and that accused was going with him, not made in the presence of accused, were incompetent, not being a part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 806, 811, 814, 819, 820; Dec. Dig. § 366.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 166*)—EVIDENCE—MOTIVE.

Testimony that accused had been indicted for another crime, and that the prosecutor intended to call deceased as a witness on the trial of that case, was incompetent to show motive for a homicide, in the absence of evidence that deceased had been summoned as a witness, or that accused knew deceased was to be a witness, or knew that deceased knew anything about the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 320-331; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 166*)—EVIDENCE—MOTIVE.

Where it was claimed that the motive for a homicide was to prevent deceased testifying against accused in another case, testimony that accused's wife said to him that "he" would be the hardest witness against accused, and that accused replied that he would not be at court, was incompetent, where the witness did not know of whom they were talking, and no offer to show later that it referred to deceased was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 320-331; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

Error in admitting testimony relative to a conversation between accused and his wife concerning a third person was not cured by an instruction to disregard, unless the jury found that the conversation referred to deceased, where there was no evidence on which the jury could base such a finding, since it was for the court, and not for the jury, to determine the competency of the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 754, 3088, 3180, 3137-3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 719*)—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—COMMENTS ON EVIDENCE.

A remark of the prosecuting attorney that in his opinion a conversation between accused and his wife, shown by the evidence, referred to deceased, was prejudicial to accused, where there was no evidence on which such an opinion could be properly based.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1669; Dec. Dig. § 719.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 223*)—EVIDENCE—PROCEEDINGS AT INQUEST—STATEMENT OF ACCUSED.

Under Code 1904, § 3901, providing that in criminal prosecutions, with certain exceptions, statements by accused upon a legal examination shall not be given in evidence against him, unless made when examined as a witness in his own behalf, statements by accused on his examination at the coroner's inquest were improperly admitted at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 466; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 789*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

An instruction that a reasonable doubt is such a doubt as may be honestly and reasonably entertained, and must be based on the evidence, that it must not be an arbitrary doubt, but must be serious and substantial, and must be a doubt of a material fact necessary for the jury to believe to find a verdict of conviction, and not of immaterial and nonessential circumstances, while possibly of little aid to the jury, could not have misled them, when considered in connection with another instruction that the jury should not go beyond the evidence to hunt up doubts, nor entertain doubts merely chimerical or conjectural, that a doubt justifying the acquittal must arise from a candid and impartial investigation of the evidence, and is insufficient unless it is such that, if interposed in the graver transactions of life, it would cause a reasonable and prudent man to hesitate, and that if, after considering all the evidence, the jury could say that they had an abiding conviction of the truth of the charge, they would be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Morgan Mullins was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

Instruction No. 9, given by the court and referred to in the opinion, was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury, as a matter of law, in considering the case, the jury are not to go beyond the evidence to hunt up doubts, nor must they entertain such doubts as are merely chimerical or conjectural. A doubt to justify an acquittal must be a reasonable doubt, and it must arise from a candid and impartial investigation of all the evidence in the case, and unless it is such that, were the same kind of doubt interposed in the graver transactions of life, it would cause a reasonable and prudent man to hesitate and pause, it is insufficient to authorize a verdict of not guilty. If, after considering all the evidence, you can say that you have an abiding conviction of the truth of the charge, you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt. On the other hand, the jury must not go beyond the evidence to hunt up inferences of guilt."

Vicars & Peery and A. A. Skeen, for appellant. Samuel W. Williams, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BUCHANAN, J. The accused, Morgan Mullins, was indicted for the murder of Ark. W. Howell, and upon his trial convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to the penitentiary for 10 years.

It appears that the deceased left home on the morning of the 6th of February, 1911, for the purpose of going after whisky, and that on the 17th of that month his body, with the head cut or beaten off, was found on the side of the mountain about 1½ miles from his home. The evidence relied on by the commonwealth to show that the accused murdered the deceased is entirely circumstantial.

[1] Ten of the errors assigned are based upon the action of the trial court in the admission of evidence. Two witnesses, Laura Mullins and George Flemming, were permitted, over the objection of the accused, to detail conversations with the deceased, had the evening before and the morning of the day upon which the deceased left home on the errand or trip from which he never returned. Those witnesses testified that in the conversations had with them, respectively, the deceased stated that the object of his trip was to get whisky, and that the accused was going with him. The accused was not present at either of these conversations.

The evidence of these witnesses as to what the deceased stated in reference to the accused was clearly inadmissible. The declarations of a person before his death, which are so connected with the act as to form a part of the same transaction, and which illustrate and explain the homicide, are admissible as part of the res gestæ; but declarations or statements not constituting a part of the res gestæ, and not made in the presence of the accused, are not competent evidence.

In McBride's Case, 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. 454, it was held that on a trial for murder the statements of the deceased, made on the day before the homicide to a third person, in the absence of the prisoner, as to where the deceased was then going, were irrelevant, and should not be received in evidence.

[2] The commonwealth introduced a witness named Davis, who testified that the accused had been indicted in Dickenson county, more than a year before Howell's murder, for sending a threatening letter through the mail; that he (the witness, who seems to have been the prosecutor, or active in that prosecution) intended to have the deceased introduced as a witness against the accused in that case. The deceased had never been summoned as a witness, and there was no evidence that the accused knew that he was to be a witness, or that he knew anything about the case. The prisoner objected to the evidence of Davis that the deceased was to be a witness against him in that case, but the court overruled his objection.

If the prisoner had known that Howell was to be a witness against him, the evidence would have been admissible as tending to show a motive for the murder of Howell; for where the motive of a party is a material inquiry in a cause, whether civil or criminal, any evidence which tends in any degree to throw light upon that question is admissible. Parsons v. Harper, 57 Va. 64; 1 Wigmore on Ev. § 389. But before a fact or circumstance is admissible in evidence against a party to show motive, such fact or circumstance must be shown to have probably been known to him; otherwise, it could not have influenced him. For a man cannot be influenced or moved to act by a fact or circumstance of which he is ignorant. 1 Wigmore on Ev. § 389, and authorities cited.

It not appearing that the accused had any knowledge or reason to believe that the deceased was to be a witness against him, or that he even knew that the deceased knew anything about the case, the court ought not to have permitted the evidence of Davis, which was objected to, to go to the jury.

[3, 4] A witness named Puckett was permitted to testify, over the prisoner's objection, that she was at the home of the accused some two months before the homicide, when the deceased came there to get meal, and that about half an hour after the deceased had left she heard part of a conversation between the accused and his wife in which the latter said, "He would be the hardest witness against you," and the accused replied, "Never mind, he would not be at court." The witness stated that she did not know to what case the accused and his wife were referring, that no names were called, and that she did not know who they were talking about. Thereupon the accused, by counsel, moved the court to exclude the said evidence from the jury, because it did not appear that the alleged conversation between the accused and his wife had reference to the deceased, and was, therefore, incompetent and irrelevant. The court overruled the motion, but afterwards, during the cross-examination of the witness, said to the jury: "In reference to the statement of this witness, the commonwealth must convince you beyond all reasonable doubt that it referred to the defendant there, meaning that Howell would be a witness against the defendant; if it fails to convince you, you must disregard the witness' evidence."

There being no evidence showing that the conversation between the accused and his wife was in reference to the deceased, the court ought to have sustained the accused's objection to it, in the absence of the assurance of counsel that other evidence would be duly presented during the progress of the trial which would show its admissibility, or at least ought to have admitted it only upon the condition that the commonwealth would subsequently offer evidence showing that it was admissible. No such assurance being given, and no such evidence being introduced during the trial to show that the conversation in question was in reference to the deceased, the evidence was improperly before the jury, and the action of the court in leaving the question to them to determine whether or not they should consider it did not cure the error in permitting the evidence to go before the jury.

"Questions as to the competency or admissibility of testimony," as was said in the Vass' Case, 30 Va. 786, 791 (24 Am. Dec. 695), "at whatever stage of the trial they may be raised (though regularly they ought to precede the introduction of the testimony objected to) are referred to the decision of the judge. 'As it is the province of the jury to consider what degree of credit ought to be given to evidence, so it is for the court alone to determine whether a witness is competent or the evidence admissible. Whether there is any evidence is a question for the court; whether it is sufficient is for the jury. And whatever antecedent facts are necessary to be ascertained for the purpose of deciding the question of competency—as, for example, whether a child understands the nature of an oath, or whether the confession of a prisoner was voluntary, or whether declarations offered in evidence as dying declarations were made under the immediate apprehension of death—those and other facts of the same kind are to be determined by the court and not by the jury.” Claytor v. Anthony, 27 Va. 299; Smith's Case, 51 Va. 734, 737; 4 Wigmore on Ev. § 2550; 1 Thompson on Trials (2d Ed.) § 318.

The action of the court in leaving the evidence objected to provisionally to the jury, to be considered or rejected by them, as they might determine its admissibility or inadmissibility under the instruction given by the court, was not the proper practice, as the jury had nothing to do with the admissibility of the evidence. Wigmore on Ev. §§ 497, 861, 1451, 2550; 1 Thompson on Trials (2d Ed.) § 318.

[5] The impropriety of such a practice is illustrated by the use made by the attorney for the commonwealth of that evidence. In the closing argument for the commonwealth he stated to the jury that in his opinion the conversation related by Miss Puckett referred to the deceased, because he was a witness against the accused in the prosecution against him in Dickenson county, and the deceased had been killed before the term of court at which the defendant was to be tried. If the court had excluded that conversation, as it ought to have done, instead of letting it go before the jury for them to pass upon its admissibility, there would have been nothing in the case upon which the attorney for the commonwealth could have based the argument and opinion which he was permitted to make and express over the objection of the accused.

It cannot be said that the accused was not prejudiced by the argument made and the opinion expressed when there was no evidence in the case upon which to base either. Jessie's Case, 112 Va. 887, 71 S. E. 612.

[6] The action of the court in permitting Larkin Combs to testify to a statement made by the accused in his examination at the inquest before the coroner's jury is assigned as error.

Section 3901 of the Code provides that “in a criminal prosecution, other than for perjury or in an action on a penal statute, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination, unless such statement was made when examined as a witness in his own behalf.”

The introduction of the evidence in question was forbidden by the section of the Code quoted, and the objection of the accused ought to have been sustained. Kirby's Case, 77 Va. 681, 690, 46 Am. Rep. 747.

The other assignments of error, based upon the action of the court in the admission of evidence, need not be considered separately and in detail. It is sufficient to say that the evidence objected to was for the most part admissible, and where it was not it consisted of expressions of opinion, hearsay, and other irrelevant matter, which, while it should not have gone to the jury, yet was of such a character that its admission could not have prejudiced the accused.

[7] The action of the court in giving the following instruction is assigned as error: “The court instructs the jury that a reasonable doubt is such a doubt as may be honestly and reasonably entertained as to the offense charged. Reasonable doubt must be based upon the evidence, any substantial and material fact essential to prove the offense, or that is suggested by the evidence, or grows out of the evidence itself. It must not be arbitrary doubt, without evidence to sustain it. It must be serious and substantial, in order to warrant an acquittal. It must be a doubt of material fact or facts necessary for the jury to believe to find a verdict of conviction, and not of immaterial and non-essential circumstances.”

That instruction, it must be admitted, is not a model definition, either in brevity or clearness, and perhaps was of little aid to the jury upon the question upon which it was given. Indeed, it may be safely said, we think, that it is very doubtful whether what is meant by the term “beyond a reasonable doubt” can be made clearer by attempted definition and explanation. Like other language which is in common use and within the comprehension of persons of ordinary intelligence, it can seldom be made plainer by further definition or refinement, and in the opinion of many judges and some of our ablest text-writers the effort to define it should be abandoned altogether. 4 Wigmore on Ev. § 2497; 2 Chamberlayne on Modern Ev. §§ 996b, 1016; 2 Thompson on Trials (2d Ed.) §§ 2, 463.

While the instruction complained of may not have aided the jury, it cannot be said that, when read in connection with instruction No. 9 given by the court, it could have misled them. Both of them were identical with instructions Nos. 8 and 9 given in the McCue Case, 103 Va. 870, 912, 1002, 49 S. E. 623, and held to be sufficient guides to the jury upon the subject of reasonable doubt.

The assignment of error based on the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict because not sustained by the evidence, and for after-discovered testimony, need not be considered, since the judgment will have to be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial granted for the erroneous rulings of the court as hereinbefore discussed.

Reversed.

POINT MOUNTAIN COAL & LUMBER CO.
v. HOLLY LUMBER CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 10, 1912.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 65*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—MISTAKE—EXTENT OF POSSESSION.

While the general rule is, that one who by mistake enters lands of another not covered by his title papers will be limited in his adversary possession to the land actually enclosed or of which he has had the pedis possessio; yet, if his title papers do cover the land entered, and the entry be with the purpose and intent of holding the same to the limits of the boundaries described in his deed or title papers, and as surveyed, and located on the ground by natural and fixed objects called for, he may by such entry and adversary possession and color of title, continued openly, notoriously and exclusively for the requisite period acquire title to all the land comprehended in his title papers, although such land may have been located and entered, by mistake as to the true location of original lines and corners called for in some prior or ancient patent, deed or title paper, by which he traces his title to the commonwealth.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 385-370; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 1*) — OPERATION AND EFFECT—SETTLEMENT OF BOUNDARIES.

One of the objects of the statute of limitations is to settle disputed boundaries, as well as disputed claims of ownership, regardless of what the true boundary or better right may turn out to be.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 10, 12-65, 67-76; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 70*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT — EXTENT OF POSSESSION — "COLOR OF TITLE."

Color of title, for the purposes of the statute of limitations as to land, is that which has the semblance or appearance of title, legal or equitable, but which in fact is no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 394-414; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1264-1273; vol. 8, p. 760.]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 100*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—EXTENT OF POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

The same kind of adversary possession which by pedis possessio will ripen into good title to land actually occupied and enclosed under a claim of title, will if under color of title give good title to the occupant to the limits of the boundary covered by his deed or title papers, the boundaries thus called for being in such cases equivalent to actual enclosure and occupancy under claim of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 547-574; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 48*)—NATURE AND REQUISITES—CONTINUITY—INTERRUPTION OF POSSESSION.

By section 19, chapter 90, Code 1906, adversary "possession of any part of the land in controversy under such patent, deed or other writing, for which some other person has the better title" is "taken and held to extend to the boundaries embraced or included by such patent, deed or other writing unless the person having the better title shall have actual adverse possession of some part of the land embraced by such patent, deed or other writing"; and the fact that some stranger to the better title, not shown to have entered under or by authority or sufferance of the owner of the better title may have cropped or otherwise used and had enclosed by an indifferent fence or barrier a small portion of the disputed boundary, does not interrupt the operation of the statute of limitations in favor of one in possession of the residue of the disputed boundary, occupying and claiming the whole thereof by color of title, or render the possession of the latter less exclusive of the owner of such better title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 236, 237; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 68*)—LANDLORD'S TITLE—INTERRUPTION OF POSSESSION.

Recognition of title or attornment to another by the tenant of such adversary claimant, will not by section 4, chapter 93, Code 1906, interrupt the continuity of such claimant's possession, but will be void, "unless it be with the consent of the landlord of such tenant, or pursuant to, or in consequence of, the judgment, order, or decree of a court"; or such claimant otherwise have notice or knowledge of such recognition or attornment by his tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 158, 210-214; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

7. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 68*)—LANDLORD'S TITLE—INTERRUPTION OF POSSESSION.

If such tenant of an adverse claimant take a secret lease from a third person claiming to be the owner, without the knowledge of his landlord, the character of his possession will not be changed thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 158, 210-214; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Webster County.

Action by the Point Mountain Coal & Lumber Company against the Holly Lumber Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and new trial awarded.

Haymond & Fox and Linn & Byrne, for plaintiff in error. Morton & Wooddell, J. S. Cogar, W. G. Bennett, Jake Fisher, and Hall Bros., for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. In ejectment plaintiff claims lot No. 19, of 2,000 acres; defendant lot No. 18, of 3,000 acres, of the Pennell chain of surveys, the latter laying immediately Northeast of the former.

One of the questions of fact presented was as to the true location of the original division line between these two lots. Plaintiff's contention was that this line began at a rock and two beeches, thence North 40 degrees West crossing Back Fork of Elk River at 212 poles, 455 poles to a chestnut. Defendant contended that the line began at a Cucumber, as called for in the original survey and patent, located 150 poles or more Southwest of the rock and two beeches, and thence according to the calls of the original patent North 40 degrees West, with proper variation, 455 poles to the chestnut called for. The land in controversy covers some 400 acres.

Though not admitting the correctness of the jury's finding, plaintiff concedes that it is probably bound by the verdict, on conflicting evidence, locating the original division line between these lots, as claimed by defendant. But on the question of title by adversary possession it makes no such concession. On the contrary it insists that by such adverse possession under color of title, it has acquired good and indefeasible title to the disputed boundary, entitling it as matter of law to a verdict and judgment; or, if not this, that it was entitled to have the question of fact of such adverse possession submitted to the jury, uninfluenced by and wholly apart from the question of the true location of the original boundary line between the two lots, and not as was done by defendants' instructions, and particularly by its instructions numbered 4 and 5, given on its behalf, confused therewith.

Originating with a decree of partition of lots numbered 12 and 19, made upon the report of commissioners in 1871, it is conceded that this decree and all subsequent deeds down to and including the immediate deed to plaintiff describe said lot No. 19, as beginning at a large rock and two beeches, and a corner to lot 18, and thence for the division line, North 40 degrees West crossing Back Fork of Elk River at 212 poles, 455 poles to a chestnut, and from thence calling for courses and distances and natural and fixed objects, to the beginning, and thereby definitely and conclusively locating plaintiff's land on the ground substantially as described in the declaration. The evidence, oral and documentary, leaves no room for controversy on this point. Furthermore, the uncontroverted evidence is, that plaintiff and its predecessors in title have persistently, since the decree of partition of 1871, claimed the land within the boundary fixed by that decree, and described in the subsequent deeds, including the disputed boundary, to the exclusion of all other claimants; that in August, 1895, Frederick S. Stevens and others, then owners of the 2,000 acres, known as lot No. 19, found one John McClanahan on the land claimed by them and within the boundary or interlock now in controversy; that on that day they sold and conveyed to him by metes and bounds a tract of twenty acres, more or less, in the Northeast corner of said tract, and within the boundary now in controversy; that on the same day they leased to him two small pieces of said land South of said Back Fork, and within the disputed boundary, one called the Corn lot, of about three acres, the other a triangular piece about the same size, all described as belonging to the Stevens tract, for the term of five years, the lessee covenanting and agreeing, in consideration of the premises, to keep a watch over the entire Stevens tract so called, to keep off trespassers, prevent cutting of timber, and make reports as to boundary lines, &c., to H. G. Thurmond, the lessor's local attorney. The record also shows that on October 4, 1897, McClanahan and wife, for the consideration recited, reconveyed to said Stevens, the land conveyed by the latter and others to him in 1895, reciting in the deed that at the time of the former conveyance it was supposed this tract conveyed contained about twenty acres, but that it had been found to contain some eighty acres, more or less. After this conveyance McClanahan, as he admits and swears, continued as before to reside on the land and to occupy it as the tenant of plaintiff and its predecessors and was so occupying it at the date of this suit, openly, notoriously, and exclusively, and reporting to the owners and their attorney to the exclusion of all other persons, unless it be a little patch of about a half acre, within the boundary in controversy, enclosed by a log or brush fence, and sometimes cultivated by one David McClanahan. Under whom or by whose authority or by what claim, if any, David McClanahan so occupied this land is not definitely shown.

Defendants controvert plaintiff's claim of title by adversary possession, on two grounds: First, that the calls in the decree of partition and subsequent deeds relied on, for a rock and two beeches, as the beginning corner, being mistaken for the cucumber called for in the original grant, and from thence, by like mistake, for the other boundaries, and together mistaken for the true boundary lines of said lot No. 19, plaintiff was without color of title to any of the land in controversy; and that as the land actually enclosed and occupied by McClanahan for ten years prior to the suit, was not definitely located on the ground and described and shown to the jury, no recovery thereof could be predicated on mere claim of title, and that the general verdict for defendant is clearly right: Second, that conceding possession by John McClanahan, under plaintiffs, his possession within the disputed boundary was not exclusive, (a) because David McClanahan, who lived on a portion of defendants' land not within the disputed boundary, for some years had occupied and cultivated a portion of the disputed strip, and who on November 24, 1905, by deed of that date conveyed the land claimed by him, about one hundred acres, together with all possessions and rights of possession owned or claimed by him, etc., to defendant; (b) because, on January 1, 1904, John McClanahan and Charlott, his wife, plaintiff's tenants, accepted from E. A. Beckley, one of the defendants, a lease for part of the 3,000 acre tract, and claimed to cover the land then occupied by them under the prior lease from plaintiff, this lease, among other things, reciting: "It is further understood that the possession of the second parties heretofore had of the said 3,000 acre Haines tract, or any part thereof has been under and with the consent, sufferance and authority of the said E. A. Beckley and those under whom he holds, and that such possession has been for the use and benefit of said owners of the said tract of land."

[1] Adverse possession by John McClanahan for ten years prior to ouster by defendants, the facts not being controverted, we think, clearly entitled plaintiff, as matter of law, to a verdict and judgment for the land sued for, unless defeated in these rights for the reasons assigned by defendant.

[2-4] First, among defendants' contentions, did plaintiff and its predecessors have color of title? Defendants answer No, because the location on the ground by the report of the commissioners and the decree of partition of 1871, and the subsequent title papers, was by mistake, the evidence as claimed tending to show intention of the owners to claim only to the true boundary lines of said lot No. 19, and not to the actual boundaries described in said decree and deeds. Plaintiff's counsel do not controvert the general proposition relied on by defendants' counsel, supported as it is by Heavner v. Morgan, 41 W. Va. 428, 23 S. E. 874, Jackson v. Land Association, 51 W. Va. 482, 41 S. E. 920, and Schaubuch v. Dilleuth, 108 Va. 86, 60 S. E. 745, 15 Ann. Cas. 825, that if one by mistake enter on the lands of another, his title papers not actually covering the land entered, he can not by adverse possession under color of title acquire title to the land not actually covered by his title papers, but will be limited to the land actually enclosed and of which he has the pedis possessio. But they say this proposition has no application to the case in hand, for the reason as they contend, plaintiff's title papers do actually cover the land in controversy, by actual survey and location on the ground, with manifest and fixed purpose and intent on the part of plaintiff and its predecessors to claim the land covered by the decree of partition and subsequent deeds. In the case at bar plaintiff's dwelling house, that occupied by its tenant, is actually on the land in controversy, and so are the enclosed fields, and as if to make no mistake as to plaintiff's intention and purpose, it or its predecessors had the land surveyed, the boundaries marked not only by corner trees and line trees, but by the rivers and other water courses crossed, and by painting the trees along the lines so as to give notice of their claim on the ground; and although we concede the fact to be that boundaries thus described and called for in deeds and other title papers may have been made by mistaking them for original lines and corners the statute of limitations is not thereby robbed of its efficacy, and a claimant of the land by color of title and possession defeated of his rights acquired by such adversary possession. Where land is thus held in adverse possession for the requisite period, although it be under a mistake as to the true location of the lines the statute operates to give good title and to bar the rights of the original owner. Teass v. St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 13, 17 S. E. 400, 19 L. R. A. 802, citing Buswell on Adverse Possession, § 250; Burrell v. Burrell, 11 Mass. 294; Brown v. McKinney, 9 Watts (Pa.) 567, 36 Am. Dec. 139; Clark v. Tabor, 28 Vt. 222; Robinson v. Phillips, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 418, and Alexander v. Wheeler, 69 Ala. 332. In the principal case, at same page, Judge Holt says: "It is one of the objects of the statute to settle disputed boundaries, as well as disputed claims of ownership, regardless of what the true boundary, or better right, may turn out to be." And where one is in possession under a deed or other instrument purporting to convey title, however defective, and whether in good or bad faith, he has color of title, entitling him if continued for the statutory period, to hold the land as against the true and real owner or recover it from him, if after ouster by the latter he has by adverse possession ripened his bad title into a good one, to recover it by suit in ejectment, to the extent of the boundaries in his deed or title paper. As many times decided by this and other courts, color of title for the purposes of adverse possession under the statute of limitations as to land, is that which has the semblance or appearance of title, legal or equitable, but which in fact is no title. Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 247; Adams v. Alkire, 20 W. Va. 480; Swann v. Thayer, 36 W. Va. 46, 14 S. E. 423, and many cases collated in 1 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Reports, 206, et seq. And the same kind of adverse possession, which by pedis possessio will ripen into good title to land actually occupied and enclosed under a mere claim of title, will give good title to the occupant under color of title to the entire boundary covered by his deed or title papers, the boundaries in the deed in such cases being equivalent to actual enclosure under a claim of title. See cases already cited. And if the occupant intends to claim the land the fact that such possession originated in a mistake as to the true boundary of some prior grant or title paper, will not prevent the running of the statute. Rudolph v. Peters, 35 App. D. C. 438, 22 Ann. Cas. 446, and note 450. Plaintiff certainly proved color of title.

But was the continuity of plaintiff's adverse possession by John McClanahan broken, or rendered inoperative by the alleged possession of David McClanahan, or by John McClanahan, under the lease of January 1, 1904?

[5] First, as to the possession by David

McClanahan. He did not live on the disputed boundary. The only land claimed to have been occupied by him in any way within the disputed boundary was about half an acre, which appears to have been enclosed by an indifferent fence or barrier. Defendants' witness says he had it enclosed by "some rails on the lower side of it, and I think some logs on the upper side of it. It was a fence sufficient to hold his stuff there." Other witnesses for defendant say this patch was so enclosed and that they saw crops in this patch some years. It does not very distinctly appear who built the fence, nor that David McClanahan originally made the improvement, nor that it was he who cropped the place. And it certainly does not appear under whom, if ever, he made entry in 1895, when the evidence tends to show it was first noticed. The deed from David McClanahan and wife to Beckley of November 24, 1905, one of the deeds offered in evidence by defendant, describes the tract of one hundred acres more or less as the same conveyed to McClanahan by C. P. Dorr and wife, January 21, 1891, but we do not understand from the evidence this land to be identified as any part of the disputed boundary, or as covering the small entry or enclosure referred to. Nor does this deed from McClanahan to Beckley purport to convey any other land, unless it be by another clause, which undertakes to grant all rights of possession owned or claimed by McClanahan "in and to what is known as the Sheffy tract, the Haynes tract, the Goff tract and any and all of the tracts of land owned or claimed by the said E. A. Beckley on Back Fork of Elk River or its tributaries." No other reference to right of title or possession in David McClanahan to this small piece within the disputed land is made in this or any other title paper. Nor does it otherwise appear under whom or by what authority David McClanahan cropped or occupied the land, or that his possession or occupancy was open, notorious and exclusive of others. Certainly it nowhere appears that David McClanahan occupied the land, under defendant or any one under whom it claims, prior to his deed to Beckley. John McClanahan who occupied the land some twenty-five or thirty years, and who in August, 1895, took a deed for the twenty acres referred to, from Frederick S. Stevens, on that day by lease in writing became lessee of Stevens of other lands within the disputed boundary and agreed to hold, watch and care for the residue of the tract, and to ward off all trespassers thereon, so that at the date of the deed from David McClanahan to Beckley in November, 1905, unless the former's possession of the small patch defeated it, John McClanahan's possession for plaintiff and its predecessors had matured into good title. But upon what principle can David McClanahan's possession of the small lot defeat the operation of the statute of limitations under John McClanahan's possession? As already noted it is not clear that he occupied and cultivated the land every year. Indeed the evidence is very uncertain about this; but how did he occupy the land and whose tenant was he? For aught that appears he may have been tenant at will or sufferance of plaintiff or some one under it; or he may have been a mere trespasser. By section 19, chapter 90, Code 1906, adversary "possession of any part of the land in controversy under such patent, deed or other writing, for which some other person has the better title," is "taken and held to extend to the boundaries embraced or included by such patent, deed or other writing unless the person having the better title shall have actual adverse possession of some part of the land embraced by such patent, deed or other writing." In Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 472, 27 S. E. 255, it is said: "If he have a writing, giving color of title, his possession goes to the extent of the boundaries specified in it, where there is no actual adverse possession under the better title within it." Citing the section of the Code, and Oney v. Clendennin, 28 W. Va. 34. It is argued that the possession or occupancy of David McClanahan, such as it was, must be presumed to have been under the good or better title. But is this so? John McClanahan having been in possession and actually residing on the land in controversy with enclosed and cultivated fields, if defendant relied on the protection of the statute was not the burden on it to show that David McClanahan was occupying the land for it or under it? Would his occupancy as a stranger to the title claimed by it interrupt the continuity of John McClanahan's possession, or render it less exclusive of the owner of the better title? We think a proper construction of our statute requires an answer in the negative. If David McClanahan's occupancy of the little patch in question was not under the better title of defendant, if his possession was that of a stranger, John McClanahan's possession was exclusive of the superior title of defendant, and as against that title the statute gave him possession to the limits of the boundaries described in plaintiff's deeds for the purposes of the statute of limitations. In Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 238, 245, speaking of the quality, exclusiveness of possession, necessary to give one title by adversary possession, the court says: "To give that effect to his possession of a part of the land, the possession must be exclusive; for if the true owner is in the actual possession of any part of the land the dispossessor will be confined to his enclosure or actual possession and he will not be considered as in possession to the boundaries of his deed or writing." But will the trespass or indifferent occupancy by a stranger, to the title of the true owner, under our statute, work the same result to the other claimant's possession? The character of the possession of John McClanahan, under the statute, we think, rendered it exclusive, within the meaning of Ketchum v. Spurlock, 34 W. Va. 597, 599, 12 S. E. 832; Maxwell v. Cunningham, 50 W. Va. 298, 316, 40 S. E. 499; Wilson v. Braden, 56 W. Va. 372, 49 S. E. 409, 107 Am. St. Rep. 927. The fact that the possession is continued, hostile, actual, visible, exclusive, and adverse to the owner of the legal or better title is the test of our statute, and is emphasized by our cases just referred to. In 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. Pl. & Pr. (3d Ed.) 386, 387, it is said: "In order that the possession of the claimant may ripen into title, the doctrine has been frequently announced that it must be exclusive. To render one's possession exclusive he is not, of course, required to exclude every one from all entry on the land, but merely from all possession of the land." The same book at the latter page says, that the exercise by the public, or by the owner, of an easement or way over land will not necessarily prevent the possession from being exclusive. The rule that possession follows the title, much relied on by defendant, seems from the same authority to be applicable only where the possession of the claimant is in common with the owner of the land, not to the case of a stranger to the title. The many cases on the question of exclusiveness of possession are collated in note 23, at page 386, of the authority just cited. One case, Ward v. Cochran, 150 U. S. 597, 608, 14 Sup. Ct. 230, 37 L. Ed. 1195, may seem to imply that possession to be exclusive must be exclusive of all others and not to be limited to the true owner of the legal title. That was a case from Nebraska, not controlled by any statute, as the court observes, 150 U. S. at page 605, 14 Sup. Ct. 230, 37 L. Ed. 1195. It depended for its decision on the rule applied in the courts of that state, in the federal courts, and other courts not controlled by statute. One of the cases cited, French v. Pearce, 8 Conn. 439, 440, 21 Am. Dec. 680, limits the exclusive occupancy to the true owner. Two or three of the Nebraska cases cited seem to hold that the possession must be exclusive of all other persons. But we do not think our statute should receive an interpretation extending it to other than the owner of the legal title, and certainly not to the character of possession held or claimed by David McClanahan, the real point for decision in this case. We have already alluded to the size and character of David McClanahan's possession and enclosure—a small patch of half an acre within the four hundred acres involved. If this was a contest between plaintiff and David McClanahan could the latter prevail over the former, even as to the small lot occupied by him? David McClanahan did not reside on the land in controversy. John McClanahan did—had his house there, as well as enclosed and cultivated fields. Our cases following decisions in other states hold that the enclosure, which will amount to exclusive possession and bar the true owner, must be a substantial one, that partial enclosure, or enclosure by felling trees and lapping them around the land, or enclosure by brush fences, is, as a general rule, too loose and indefinite. See Industrial Co. v. Schultz, supra, and cases reviewed therein. Such, to a large extent, seems to have been the character of possession and enclosure by David McClanahan, and would not be good as against the true owner of the land, and we do not think it should be regarded as interrupting the exclusiveness of the possession of John McClanahan for plaintiff. Such was evidently the view taken by the court below and covered by plaintiff's instruction to the jury No. 8.

[8] But was plaintiff's possession interrupted and its rights by adversary possession defeated by the act of John McClanahan in accepting the lease from Beckley of January 1, 1904? While this lease is offered in evidence and is copied into the record, it was rejected, and was not before the jury, and it constitutes no part of the record, not being made so by a proper bill of exceptions. But suppose it was a part of the record, was it properly rejected? We think it was, unaccompanied as it was with any evidence of notice by McClanahan to his landlord thereof, or of adverse holding by him. The lease does not appear to have been recorded so as to give even constructive notice. John McClanahan denies that he ever accepted a lease from Beckley for any land within the boundary claimed by plaintiff. His evidence is that he leased from Beckley the Ditzel place outside the blue line, not within the disputed boundary. But whatever be the fact as to the contents of the lease, it is immaterial if notice of the lease and of adverse holding thereunder, and termination of his tenancy under his lease from Stevens, was not given plaintiff by McClanahan. Defendants' counsel argue there is evidence tending to show such notice to plaintiff, and they rely on Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. 402. No such evidence is pointed out, it is denied by plaintiff's counsel, and we have not found it in the record. The only evidence which we find relating to the subject is that of John McClanahan himself. On cross-examination he was asked: "You did tell the Point Mountain people or their agent, that you were holding under the Holly Company or E. A. Beckley? A. I told them I was holding that Ditzel place. Q. Tell them you were holding that land? A. Yes sir. Q. Did you tell them you had a contract? A. Yes sir, for the Ditzel place. Q. Tell them it was on record? A. I don't know whether I did or not. I told them that I had a lease for the Ditzel place." But on re-direct examination he swears that he never so told plaintiff or Martin, plaintiff's representative, until after this suit was brought. Such notice, of course, would not bring the case within the principles of Voss v. King. While the principles of this case are recognized in 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law & Pr. (3d Ed.) 435, it is there said: It has been held, however, that the recognition of title or attornment by the tenant of the adverse claimant, if done without the latter's knowledge, would not necessarily interrupt the continuity of such claimant's possession. But does not our statute, section 4, chapter 93, Code 1906, settle this question? It provides: "The attornment of a tenant to any stranger shall be void, unless it be with the consent of the landlord of such tenant, or pursuant to, or in consequence of, the judgment, order, or decree of a court."

[7] And in Swann v. Young, 36 W. Va. 57, 14 S. E. 426, this court said, point 1 of the syllabus: "In this state the tenant may in some cases assert his adverse colorable title against his landlord without first restoring the possession; but his possession will not be adverse, until and unless notice of his disclaimer has been distinctly and unequivocally brought home to the landlord; and having entered under his landlord's title he cannot dispute it, in the sense of putting him to the proof of title." To the same effect is Voss v. King, supra. Point 2 of the syllabus of this case is: "If a tenant takes a secret lease or conveyance for land from a third party claiming to be the owner, without the knowledge of his landlord, the character of his possession will not be changed."

Remaining for consideration are plaintiff's exceptions to defendants' instructions to the jury numbers 4 and 5. The effect of these two instructions was to tell the jury that by the true construction of the decree of partition, and of the several subsequent deeds under which plaintiff claims the intention was to assign and convey lot No. 19, of the Pennell surveys, and that if by mistake or otherwise that was inserted in said decree and deeds a misdescription thereof, conflicting in any way with the original boundaries of said lot, such erroneous description must be rejected and said lot located by the true and actual boundaries thereof as such boundaries originally existed. The main criticism of these instructions is that they ignore or minimize the fact, that the error, if any, in description, originated with the report and survey of the commissioners and the decree thereon in the partition suit, carried into all the subsequent deeds, and which actually located this lot on the ground, with reference to natural objects called for and marked, and under which the decree and deeds as claim and color of title possession was taken and held for sufficient time to ripen into good title regardless of the true location of the original corners and lines of lot No. 19.

The true location of the original lines and corners of the two lots was one of the issues before the jury though not controlling. Plaintiff contended that the original lines and corners were located as surveyed and described in the decree of partition and subsequent deeds; the defendant that they were elsewhere; but as the rights of plaintiff did not depend alone on the true location of these original lines and corners, but on adversary possession, the location of the original lines and corners was really immaterial. The instructions are not binding instructions however. The court fully instructed the jury by other instructions given at the instance of the plaintiff, on the question of adverse possession, and as the true location of the original patent lines and corners was presented as an issue by both parties, and the instructions complained of, we think, properly propounded the law on that subject, and we do not see that plaintiff was materially prejudiced thereby, although the issue covered by the instructions under the evidence was in fact uncontrolling and really immaterial.

On the real merits of the case, however, as presented, and for the reasons given, we think, the verdict unwarranted by the evidence, contrary to the law, and that judgment thereon is erroneous, and ought to be reversed, the verdict set aside and a new trial awarded the plaintiff, and the judgment here will so order.

DE NIEFF et al. v. HOWELL et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 664, 1058*)—RECORD—CONFLICT—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a movant in a motion for new trial complains of a ruling excluding certain testimony, and this testimony, in substance, appears in the approved brief of evidence, the apparent conflicting statements will be harmonized by holding that, notwithstanding the ruling, the court at some other stage of the witness' testimony allowed the evidence. Under such facts the ruling will not require a new trial, even if the evidence was admissible.

2. DEEDS (§§ 200, 203*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action to cancel a deed on the grounds of mental incapacity of the grantor, undue influence exercised by the grantee, and nondelivery of the deed, it is not error to exclude the testimony of a witness that he did not know anything concerning the making of the deed until after the grantor's death, notwithstanding the witness may have testified that he was intimate with the grantor, and had frequently heard him say that he intended to give his property to others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 601, 602, 604-611; Dec. Dig. §§ 200, 203.*]

3. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 46*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In the trial of an action to set aside a deed from a husband to his wife, brought after the grantor's death, it is not erroneous to exclude testimony that the widow had asserted her intention to claim a child's part in lieu of dower, and also a year's support out of the remainder of his estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

4. WITNESSES (§ 159*)—COMPETENCY—TESTIMONY AS TO TRANSACTIONS WITH PERSONS SINCE DECEASED.

In an action by children of a former marriage against the widow of a deceased grantor to cancel a deed on the ground, inter alia, of its nondelivery, a defendant, who is a child of the grantor and the grantee, is not incompetent to testify that he saw the deed in possession of the grantee, for the reason that he is interested and his testimony concerns a declaration by conduct of the grantee of the deceased grantor. This is so, notwithstanding the grantor's administrator may be a party to the case.

5. DEEDS (§ 68*)—MENTAL CAPACITY.

On the issue of incapacity to contract, it was not error to charge: "It does not require a high degree of mental power to make a binding contract. One who has enough of mind and reason to a clear and full understanding of the nature of the consequences of his act in making a deed is to be considered sane. One who lacks this capacity is to be considered insane. For one who has not strength of mind and reason equal to a clear and full understanding of his act in making a contract is one who is afflicted with an entire loss of understanding."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 149-155; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

6. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 51*)—INSTRUCTIONS—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

In view of its context and of the evidence, the following instruction to the jury was not cause for a new trial: "A person standing in confidential relation to another is not prohibited from exercising any influence whatever to obtain a benefit to himself. The influence must be what the law regards as undue influence; such influence that is obtained by flattery, importunity, superiority of will, mind, or character, which would give dominion over the will to such an extent as to destroy free agency, or constrain one to do against his will what he is unable to refuse. Such is the kind of influence which the law condemns as undue."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 108; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO CASE.

Where plaintiffs seek to cancel a deed for certain specific causes, it is no ground for new trial that the court omits an instruction that the deed may be canceled for a cause not set up in the pleadings, and as to which no contention is made at the trial, even if such cause be ground for invalidating a deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

8. REQUESTS COVERED BY GENERAL CHARGE.

The requests to charge were covered by the general charge.

9. REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

The trial was without substantial error, a verdict was rendered on disputed evidence, the verdict has the approval of the trial judge, and we see no reason for disturbing his discretion.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

10. WILLS (§ 155*)—VALIDITY—"UNDUE INFLUENCE."

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 3834, "undue influence," which operates to invalidate a will, is such an influence as amounts to deception.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. J. De Nieff and others against S. E. Howell and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. F. Golightly and W. E. Suttles, both of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Malvern Hill, Rosser & Brandon, and Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The children and representatives of children of A. H. G. Howell by a former marriage brought their action against his widow and a child of the last marriage to cancel a deed to realty and a bill of sale to personalty executed by A. H. G. Howell to the second wife. It was alleged that the instruments should be set aside, because the maker was non compos mentis, because of undue influence exercised by the grantee, and because the instruments were never delivered to the grantee. Pending the case the administrator of A. H. G. Howell was made a party plaintiff. The defendants prevailed at the trial, and the bill of exceptions is to the judgment refusing a new trial.

[1] 1. Four of the special grounds for new trial complain that the court declined to allow a witness, after stating the facts upon which he based it, to give his opinion that the grantor of the deed was not capable of transacting important business; that he was not a man equal to a clear and full understanding of the making of a deed; that he was a man of "borrowed ideas." The court ruled that the witness would be permitted to state his opinion, from the facts and circumstances enumerated by him, whether the grantor was of sound or unsound mind, but that his opinion as to the grantor's mental capacity to do particular acts was irrelevant. It appears from the approved brief of evidence that the witness did testify in substance to his opinion, which was alleged to have been excluded. In such cases this court cannot hold that the brief of evidence is incorrect, but must reconcile the two statements on the theory that, while at one time the court made the ruling stated in the motion for new trial, at some stage of the examination the testimony was admitted. Under such facts the ruling will not require a new trial, even if the evidence was admissible. Woods v. State, 137 Ga. 85, 72 S. E. 908.

[2] 2. A nephew of the grantor, after testifying that he knew his uncle for many years and had heard him frequently say that he intended to give his property to two of his children, offered to testify that he knew nothing of the making of this deed until after the grantor's death. The court excluded so much of his testimony as related to his ignorance of the deed until after the grantor's death. The testimony was wholly irrelevant on any issue made by the pleadings.

[3] 3. It was sought to show that the widow had asserted her intention to take a child's part and a year's support in the remainder of the grantor's property. The validity of the deed in question did not depend upon the widow's intention of asserting her legal rights in the estate of the grantor.

[4] 4. The defendants were the widow of the grantor and her son. The son was not a party to either instrument. He was made a defendant on the theory that all the heirs of the grantor were necessary parties to cancel the grantor's deed. The son was permitted to testify that he saw the deeds in the hands of his mother, the grantee, during the life of his father. This testimony was excepted to, on the grounds that he was interested, and that the declarations by conduct of his mother were inadmissible. Interest does not disqualify a witness. The witness was not testifying to any declaration of his mother in her favor, but to the physical fact that he saw the deeds in his mother's possession during his father's lifetime. This testimony was clearly admissible.

[5] 5. On the issue of total incapacity to contract the court instructed the jury as stated in the fifth headnote. The criticism is upon the last sentence of the instruction. This language was taken from the opinion of the Supreme Court in Barlow v. Strange, 120 Ga. 1015, 48 S. E. 844. In that case, as well as in the cases cited, it is pointed out that a person who is non compos mentis, in the legal acceptance of the term, is one who is entirely bereft of understanding, and that in order to avoid a contract on account of mental incapacity there must be an entire loss of understanding. The charge is not inaccurate, and the context shows that it was given on the phase of the case relating to the plaintiffs' allegation that the deed was void because of the mental incapacity of the grantor.

[6, 10] 6. The excerpt from the charge contained in the sixth headnote is said to be erroneous, because in effect it amounts to an instruction that, if the grantor was not so overcome as to be unable to refuse to make the deed, it would be good. Undue influence which operates to invalidate a will is such influence as amounts to deception, or to force and coercion, destroying free agency. Bohler v. Hicks, 120 Ga. 800, 48 S. E. 306; Civil Code, § 3834. There can be no fatally undue influence without a person incapable of protecting himself as well as a wrongdoer to be resisted. Undue influence, which overturns an otherwise legal contract, is the exercise of sufficient control over the person, the validity of whose act is brought in question, to destroy his free agency and constrain him to do what he would not have done if such control had not been exercised. Fraud and undue influence are not equivalent terms. Undue influence may be a species of fraud, or it may exist without any positive fraud. The undue influence which will annul a deed must be of that potency which substitutes somebody else's will power for that of the grantor. It was in this connection that the court delivered the charge which is criticised.

[7] 7. The petition was constructed on the theory that the wife paid nothing for the land. The deed recited a consideration of $10 and love and affection. Complaint is made that the court failed to charge on the effect of the statute invalidating any sale by a wife of her separate estate to her husband without the approval of the superior court of the wife's domicile. Civil Code, § 3009. In the first place, we do not think the statute applies to the facts of this case; and, in the next place, it is a rule of procedure that, where a plaintiff seeks to cancel a deed because of specific defects, the court is not bound to charge that the deed may be void for another cause, as to which no contention is made either in the pleadings or on the trial.

[8, 9] 8, 9. The requests to charge were covered in the general charge. The rulings of the court were not open to the objections taken to them, and the verdict is supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

BRYAN v. TATE et al.

(Syllabus by the Court.)VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 100)—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—RESCISSION.

An owner of an undivided interest in land was induced to sell the same at a gross under-value on the false representation of the purchaser that he had been advised that the title was not good and that the land was barren and of little value, whereas the title was good and the land was very valuable, because of its marble deposit, and ten years thereafter instituted an equitable action to rescind the sale. As excusing his delay, he alleged that he had no reason to suspect the truthfulness of the representations, that he lived more than 140 miles away; that the cost of investigation would have exceeded the purchase price, that an investigation would not have revealed a marble deposit on the land, and that he had no knowledge of the fraud complained of until three years before bringing suit. Held, that the plaintiff's voluntary failure to bring suit for three years after being fully cognizant of the fraud, committed seven years before that time, is such laches as will bar him of his action.

Error from Superior Court, Pickens County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by B. C. Bryan against W. B. Tate and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Dorsey & Shelton and Stevens & Ogburn, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. S. H. Sibley, of Union Point, Wm. Butt, of Blue Ridge, and Howard Tate, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The petition was dismissed on general demurrer. It alleged as follows: The petitioner is a grandnephew of Stephen Griffith, who died in 1873, seised and possessed of certain land in Pickens county, Ga., leaving a will wherein the land was devised to L. and A. for the life of L., with remainder to A.; but if they should both die without leaving child or grandchild, then the property not disposed of by his executor should revert to those who would be entitled to the same as if the testator had made no will. The devisee A. died in 1902, without child or grandchild, and the devisee L. had no child or grandchild at the death of A., and she is now more than 85 years of age, and without possibility of issue. The executor died in 1907, without having exercised the power of sale. The plaintiff is a remainderman under the will, being one of the heirs at law of Stephen Griffith. It is alleged that W. B. Tate, who had acquired the interest of the life tenants, procured P. F. M. Furr to fraudulently secure petitioner's interest, which was $\frac{1}{2}$ of the whole. Furr, on December 23, 1899, induced petitioner to make him a deed to his interest in the land for and in consideration of \$13.89, by falsely representing that he had been advised that the heirs of Griffith had no claim to the property, and that the proposed purchase price would have been petitioner's share if he had been an heir, and that the land was almost a barren field, of little or no value. It is alleged that the land conveyed contained valuable marble deposits, which were undeveloped and their existence was unknown to petitioner, and that petitioner relied on the truth of Furr's statements, and did not suspect, nor have reason to suspect, anything to the contrary; nor did any circumstances exist which would lead him to investigate the truthfulness of Furr's representations. Petitioner was also deceived by the representation that he had no interest under his granduncle's will. At the time he resided in the county of Banks, 140 miles away from the land, and a journey to the land would have cost him more than the sum he received for his interest, nor could he by investigation have learned anything as to the mineral value of the land. The real value of the whole property was from \$400,000 to \$500,000. Petitioner did not learn until 1907 of the fraud which had been practiced upon him. Furr conveyed the land to W. B. Tate on January 2, 1900, in pursuance of the scheme of Tate to acquire petitioner's interest. Tender of the amount was alleged to have been made to Furr, and the prayer was to cancel the deeds from petitioner to Furr and from Furr to Tate. The action was begun in 1910.

We think that the petitioner was in such laches that he lost whatever equitable right of rescission he may have had. As bearing upon his excuse for failing to sooner bring his action, it may be proper to remark that the will in controversy is that construed by this court in Satterfield v. Tate, 132 Ga. 256, 64 S. E. 60. As there construed, the will gave a joint life estate to L. and A. during the life of L., and a defeasible vested remainder to A., subject to be divested upon her dying without child or grandchild during the life of L., and upon the divesting of the remainder the property would go to the heirs of the testator as executory devisees. So that, when petitioner conveyed his interest while A. and L. were both in life, he had only a contingent interest in the land, contingent upon A. and L. dying without issue. Assuming that the allegations of the petition make a case of fraud, petitioner waited over ten years since the perpetration of the fraud, and three years after its discovery, before he appealed to the courts for relief. It does not appear when he tendered the purchase price to Furr.

No principle is more firmly imbedded in our equitable jurisprudence than that which requires a suitor who seeks equitable relief to move with diligence and without delay. "Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt." Limitation of actions apply equally to courts of law and equity; but in addition the courts may impose an equitable bar whenever, from the lapse of time and laches of the complainant, it would be inequitable to allow a party to enforce his legal rights. Civil Code, § 4369. Long acquiescence or laches by parties out of possession is productive of much hardship and injustice to others, and cannot be excused but by showing some actual hindrance or impediment caused by the fraud or concealment of the party in possession. Woolfolk v. Beatly, 18 Ga. 520. No confidential or fiduciary relation existed between Furr and the petitioner because of their relationship. Crawford v. Crawford, 134 Ga. 114, 87 S. E. 673, 19 Ann. Cas. 932. So far as the record discloses, Furr and the petitioner were dealing at arm's length, and petitioner asks to be excused of diligence in detecting the fraud because he had no reason to suspect the verity of Furr's representations; that he lived 140 miles away, and could not by investigation have known of the existence of the marble deposits. He does not state why an investigation would not have revealed a marble deposit, nor why Furr and Tate had superior knowledge of the marble deposit. He now knows of the marble deposit, but he fails to disclose the source of his information. Was the existence of the mineral apparent from surface outcroppings, or from its development by the purchaser? If an inspection of the premises would have disclosed the existence of marble, then a most casual investigation would have revealed it. If the marble deposits were revealed by the defendant's development of the property, then it would be inexcusable laches for the petitioner to wait ten years, three years of which time he had knowledge of all the facts, before moving to rescind his deed. Even if the petitioner be excused of laches for the seven years' delay, nevertheless, at the end of that period, when fully cognizant of the alleged fraud, he deliberately waited three years longer before appealing to a court of equity. The voluntary delay of three years, after knowledge of a fraud perpetrated seven years before that time, is inexcusable, and bars petitioner of any right of action which he might have had. Reynolds v. Martin, 116 Ga. 495, 42 S. E. 796.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 588*)—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

All the questions presented for determination depend upon a consideration of the evidence. The oral evidence is brief, and not very material to the issues involved. These issues depend almost wholly upon the construction to be placed upon an extended correspondence between the parties. This correspondence consists of about 50 letters. Fully half of them are wholly irrelevant and immaterial, many were not even introduced in evidence, and those that are relevant and material contain much irrelevant and immaterial matter. No attempt whatever was made to comply with the mandatory requirements of the statute relating to briefs of evidence in motions for new trials. Civil Code 1910, § 6093. All of the letters are copied literally and in extenso, with no effort at abridgment or condensation. This court is reluctant to refuse to consider a case because no proper brief of the evidence has been made, and will not do so unless the violation of the statute is flagrant and palpable. When such violation occurs, the explicit terms of the statute, and the uniform practice of the Supreme Court and of this court, demand an affirmance of the judgment, where the only questions made depend upon a consideration of the evidence. Durden v. De Loach, 9 Ga. App. 396, 71 S. E. 493; Howard Piano Co. v. Brown, 8 Ga. App. 426, 69 S. E. 495, and citations.

HILL, C. J. Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). In my opinion the ruling requiring dismissal for failure to properly brief testimony should not be enforced in the present case to the utmost degree of strictness, for the reason that, while the letters are not briefed, in my judgment those that are material could not be briefed, so as to convey their meaning as accurately as if the entire letter were copied. A number of letters entirely impertinent in their contents appear in the record, but each of them is prefaced by the statement that they were not introduced by the plaintiff. The appearance of these letters in the record is a violation of the letter of the rule, but, in my judgment, does not affect its spirit, for the reason that it is perfectly plain that they are nothing more than that much waste paper would be; a mere glance of the eye disclosing the fact that it is not necessary for the court to peruse them, or to inquire as to the materiality of their contents. Under my conception of the requirements of section 5527 of the Code of 1895 (Code 1910, § 6139), the court of review should not seek for excuses to dismiss the writ of error or even place itself in the position of appearing to do so; for, in the language of that statute, if there is enough in the bill of exceptions and the record to enable the court to determine the point at issue, it is its duty to do so. In view of the fact that the letters that have found their way into this record, so far as they are immaterial, are plainly marked, I do not think the writ of error should be dismissed; and in so far as the evidence itself is concerned, as it does not appear that there was any individual undertaking on the part of the decedent, but rather that he acted as a representative of a corporation, the judgment refusing new trial, in my opinion, should be reversed.

YESBIK v. MACON, D. & S. R. CO.
(No. 4,180.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 2, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 185*)—SHIPMENT OF FREIGHT—DAMAGES IN TRANSPORTATION.

Where goods received by a common carrier are in due course of transportation delivered to a connecting carrier, and reach the point of destination in a damaged condition, a recovery may be had against the delivering carrier, unless it shows that it did not receive the goods "as in good order," or, if so, that the goods were damaged before delivery to the initial carrier, or that, if the damage occurred in the course of transportation, it was due to no fault on the part of any of the carriers that handled the shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 835-850; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 49*)—FRUIT SHIPMENT—NOTATION ON BILL OF LADING.

A notation, on a bill of lading issued for a car load of fruit, that the vents on the car are to be closed, will not be construed as a direction from the shipper to the carrier to close the vents, in the absence of proof that the shipper knew of and assented to such notation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 142-147; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 177*)—CONNECTING CARRIERS—INJURY TO FREIGHT—LIABILITY OF DELIVERING CARRIER.

Where it is shown that a connecting carrier either actually or presumptively received as in good order a shipment of goods, which arrived at destination in a damaged condition, proof of the issuance by the initial carrier of a bill of lading containing an undertaking to deliver the goods at destination, over the line of the connecting carrier, will not defeat the right of the owner to recover the damages from the latter carrier.

Error from City Court of Dublin; H. R. Daniel, Judge.

Action by Acy Yesbik against the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The action was to recover for damages to a car load of bananas, alleged to have been caused partly by an unreasonable delay in transportation and partly on account of the negligent manner in which the goods were handled by the carrier. The plaintiff was nonsuited. It appears, from the evidence, that the Fruit Dispatch Company delivered the fruit to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company at New Orleans, to be shipped to the plaintiff at Dublin, Ga. The company issued its bill of lading, wherein it was recited that the goods were received in apparent good order, to be delivered to the Seaboard Air Line at Montgomery, Ala., and by it to the defendant at Vidalia, for transportation to destination. Following the description of the goods was the notation: "All vents closed; all plugs out and sealed." The bill of lading was dated at the top February 15th, but at the bottom appeared the following: "Signed Feby. 16. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., per O. B. Bonner." The bill of lading was signed only by the initial carrier. The plaintiff testified that the car of fruit was delivered to him by the defendant on Monday, February 20th, in a worthless condition, caused from decay; that two days was a reasonable time for the car to have been transported from New Orleans to Dublin, and it should have reached destination on February 17th; that the vents on the car were closed, the effect of which was to steam the bananas and "get them cooked"; that hot air will affect bananas in from 10 to 12 hours. He further testified that he went to the depot at Dublin on Sunday, February 19th, and was informed that the car had arrived; that, if the vents had been opened, the fruit would have been in good condition when it arrived at destination. There was no evidence to show when the car was actually delivered to the initial carrier, nor when it was received by the defendant. There was evidence that the bananas were sound and in good condition when delivered to the first carrier at New Orleans. There was some other evidence for the plaintiff, but it is immaterial, since the nonsuit was wrong if the plaintiff by his testimony made a prima facie case.

Counsel for the defendant in error seek to sustain the nonsuit upon three grounds: (1) Because the evidence demanded a finding that there was no unreasonable delay in handling the shipment; (2) because, if the fruit was decayed on account of the closing of the vents, the plaintiff cannot recover, since this was done pursuant to the direction of the shipper, as shown by the bill of lading; (3) because the suit is upon the common-law liability of the defendant, and the evidence discloses an express contract with the initial carrier to deliver at destination, and it alone can be held liable.

Davis & Sturgis, of Dublin, for plaintiff in error. Chas. Akerman, of Macon, and J. S. Adams, of Dublin, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] There being no allegation that the defendant receipted for the car of bananas as in good order, the petition will be construed as an effort to recover upon the implied obligation of the carrier to deliver safely and promptly, and not upon the statutory liability set forth in section 2752 of the Civil Code of 1910. It appearing that the shipment was delivered to the defendant as a connecting carrier in due course of transportation, and, nothing to the contrary appearing, the presumption is that the bananas were received as in good order. The onus is upon the defendant to show that they were not so received. Hartwell Ry. Co. v. Kidd, 10 Ga. App. 771, 74 S. E. 310; Forrester v. Ga. Railroad Co., 92 Ga. 699, 19 S. E. 811. Until this presumption is rebutted, the defendant stands as though it had actually received the goods as in good order, and its liability is the same as that fixed by the section of the Code. It can defend by showing that, when received by it, the goods were in the same condition as when tendered to the plaintiff at Dublin; but, if received by it without exception, only those defenses are open which could be made by the initial carrier, such as that the bananas were damaged when delivered to the first carrier in New Orleans, or that, after shipment, they became damaged without fault on the part of any of the carriers. The plaintiff made a prima facie case by showing the receipt of the bananas by the defendant as a common carrier and the damage to the fruit.

[2] The evidence on the subject of delay is indefinite and probably not sufficient to show an unreasonable delay in transportation. But this becomes immaterial, in view of the plaintiff's testimony that the closing of the vents, and not the delay, caused the damage. A carrier is bound to follow shipping directions given by the apparent owner of the goods shipped, and will not be liable for damages consequent upon obedience to such instructions. Hutchinson, Carriers (3d Ed.) § 69. But there is no evidence that the shipper directed the initial carrier to close the vents. There was no express contract, but a bill of lading in the nature of a receipt for the goods, signed by the carrier alone. The mere notation on the receipt, after the description of the goods, "all vents closed" is not sufficient, standing alone to prove that the carrier had been directed by the shipper to keep the car in this condition. There was no proof of the shipper's assent, or even knowledge; and, for aught that appears, the carrier closed the vents on the car in the exercise of its own judgment.

[3] The defendant having been named in the bill of lading as one of the carriers over whose line the goods were to be transported, the decisions in East Tenn. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 85 Ga. 497, 11 S. E. 809, and Almand v. Georgia R. Co., 95 Ga. 775, 22 S. E. 674, have no application. Besides, in neither of those cases was the suit for damage to goods in transit.

Judgment reversed.

MEYER et al. v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 20, 1912.)

CARRIERS (§ 408*)—BAGGAGE—LOSS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a carrier received and checked as baggage goods delivered to it by a passenger and failed to deliver the same on demand, the burden was on it to escape liability to explain why the goods were not delivered, though it received them as a bailee or warehouseman, and whether the goods were baggage or not.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; T. H. Spain, Judge.

Action by J. B. Meyer and another against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and new trial granted.

D. W. Robinson, of Columbia, for appellants. Barron, Moore, Barron & McKay, of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This was an action by the plaintiffs against the defendant to recover the value of certain dry goods and notions contained in a telescope which had been delivered to the defendant for transportation and checked by defendant as baggage from Columbia, S. C., to Sumter, S. C. There was also a small amount of wearing apparel with it as to which there was no dispute. The complaint alleges that the telescope was filled with dry goods and notions which was the property of the plaintiff Meyer, which was being carried by the plaintiff Bunn, a salesman, to Sumter, S. C., for sale, the profits to be divided between them. The complaint alleges that the telescope, with its contents, was received by the defendant, which gave its check for the same, and undertook to transport and deliver the same promptly and safely. The plaintiffs further allege that the defendant failed to deliver the goods to plaintiffs or either of them at any time, and that it had lost or miscarried the same. The defendant entered a general denial. On the trial the plaintiffs offered evidence to sustain the allegations of the complaint. They also offered in evidence the check they had received for the telescope from the defendant, which had on it a printed clause limiting the responsibility for baggage to personal effects of the passenger necessary for his journey. It was testified that the plaintiff Bunn purchased a ticket and went on the same train his baggage was supposed to go on. Testimony was given as to the cost price of articles in the telescope and their sale price at Sumter, S. C.; also the correspondence between attorney for plaintiffs and the passenger agent of the defendant in January and March, 1911, in regard to the loss, in which plaintiffs set forth an itemized statement of goods contained in the telescope and the statement was verified; also a letter from the defendant January 26, 1911, acknowledging the receipt of the claim and a promise to look into it and advise further; a similar letter in March, 1911. At the close of plaintiffs' testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted by the court as to all but the small amount of personal baggage of the value of $4.65. Plaintiffs appeal, and ask reversal on the following grounds: (1) That his honor erred in granting a nonsuit in this case, and in holding and ruling that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the value of the goods lost by the defendant, upon the ground that the same was not personal baggage, because: (a) The defendant, having undertaken to transport the said goods, was charged with the duty of exercising care and skill in regard thereto, and was responsible for its negligence in losing the said goods, whether baggage or any other class of goods. (b) Because the defendant had not set up in its answer any claim or pretense that any fraud was committed on it that it was misled in checking said baggage, the contents of said telescope having been fully set forth in the complaint in this case. (c) That the uncontradicted evidence showed that the defendant had undertaken to trace and return said goods to said plaintiff, and wholly failed and neglected to do so. (d) That the uncontradicted evidence in the case tended to show that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence in failing to transport and deliver the said goods or find and return the same to plaintiff, and no excuse or explanation of said negligence and delay was given or admitted by the defendant.

We think the exceptions should be sustained, and the order of nonsuit set aside. The plaintiffs show beyond question that the defendant received the property, and has failed to account for the same. It has failed to deliver it to the plaintiffs, and gives no manner of explanation whatsoever as to what became of it, whether lost by it negligently or whether lost without any negligence on its part. To permit a nonsuit under such circumstances would be to allow the defendant to confiscate the plaintiffs' property. In any aspect of the case, the defendant, having received the property from the plaintiffs, and taken custody of it, has no right to keep and retain it or to convert it. On proof of delivery to the carrier and demand for it, the burden is on the defendant to explain why it has not delivered it, even though it received it as a mere bailee or warehouseman. This principle is fully discussed and established in Fleischman v. Railway, 76 S. C. 237, 56 S. E. 974, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519. It was the duty of the court at close of plaintiffs' case to refuse the motion for nonsuit, as the burden was then on the defendant to explain and show the failure to deliver the telescope was through no negligence or want of due care on its part. The defendant having received the baggage and having failed to account for it is liable for a conversion. Fleischman v. Railway, 76 S. C. 237, 56 S. E. 974, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519; Wall v. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, 71 S. C. 337, 51 S. E. 95. As to whether the articles in the telescope were baggage or such articles as are generally carried by a traveling salesman, it is unnecessary to consider now, and as to whether the defendant was an insurer of it or not, as the case will have to go back for a new trial.

Judgment reversed and new trial granted.

TRAPP v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

1. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGING ON FACTS.

In an action against a telegraph company for delay in delivery of a message due to its wrong delivery to a neighbor of the addressee, the court charged that there was no evidence that anybody told the messenger to deliver it to the neighbor, and that, if there was no evidence from which the jury could conclude that by implication he was authorized to so deliver it, such delivery was wrongful, and amounted to no delivery. There was no attempt to show that the neighbor had any authority to receive the message. Held, by a divided court, that such charge was not improper as being a charge on the facts, since the court may tell the jury that facts are admitted, or that there is no controversy about them.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

In an action for delay in delivery of a telegram, where a messenger, not finding the addressee at home, left it with a neighbor, the question of willfulness was for the jury, and hence the denial of a nonsuit as to punitive damages and the refusal to set aside so much of the verdict as awarded punitive damages was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 317*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—HEARSAY.

In an action for delay in delivery of a telegram causing the addressee to lose a position which was open to her, testimony of the sender that the prospective employer stated to him that the position would continue 10 or 12 weeks at $25 a month was not hearsay, where it was not claimed that the offer of employment was in writing.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County.

Action by Mrs. Ella Trapp against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ferguson, Featherstone & Knight, of Laurens, for appellant. Simpson, Cooper & Babb, of Laurens, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. I cannot concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice FRASER in holding that the fourth exception of appellants should be sustained on the ground that it was a charge on the facts, and that the judgment should be reversed. I concur in so much of his opinion as overrules the other exceptions.

[1] I think the fourth exception should be overruled and the judgment affirmed. There was no error in the judge's charge. He did not invade the province of the jury by charging on the facts. There is no violation of this provision of the Constitution for the circuit judge to state to the jury what facts are admitted by the pleadings, what facts are admitted in evidence, and the evidence about which there is no controversy. There certainly was no testimony from any source that Mrs. Peterson had any authority to receive this telegram. She said no one had authorized her to receive it. There is no attempt on the part of the defendant to show that she was authorized to receive it. The defendant, in delivering the telegram to a person other than the one to whom it is addressed, or one authorized to receive it, does so at their peril. A careful reading of Judge Gage's charge as a whole will show that he committed no error. "Statement of judge in charge of undisputed evidence is not a charge on facts in violation of the Constitution." Turner v. Lyles, 68 S. C. 395, 48 S. E. 301; Jennings v. Manufacturing Co., 72 S. C. 419, 52 S. E. 113.

As two of the justices concur in this opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). This is an action by the respondent against the appellant for failure to deliver promptly the following telegram: "Come to Atlanta by first train—report 92 Luckie St. Good position open for you." The testimony tended to show that the telegram was received by the agent of appellant at Laurens, S. C., and turned over to the messenger boy to be delivered about 2 o'clock on the 2d of June, 1910. The messenger, after some search, succeeded in finding where Mrs. Trapp lived. Mrs. Trapp was not at home when the messenger went to her house. He delivered the message to a neighbor to be delivered to Mrs. Trapp when she should return. The neighbor did not deliver the message until after midday of June 3d. The information was received too late to enable Mrs. Trapp to secure the good position, and she brought this suit for actual and punitive damages. The cause was tried before his honor, Judge Gage, and a jury. The jury rendered a verdict for both actual and punitive damages.

The exceptions are as follows: "(1) Because, it is respectfully submitted, the presiding judge erred in refusing the motion by the defendant, at the close of all the testimony, to direct a verdict for the said defendant with reference to punitive damages, there being absolutely no testimony to show willfulness or wantonness on the part of the defendant, the testimony showing, on the contrary, that the defendant made an earnest, honest effort to deliver the telegram. (2) Because, it is respectfully submitted, that the presiding judge erred in refusing to grant a new trial, or to set aside so much of the verdict as finds punitive damages for the plaintiff, when there is absolutely no testimony to sustain such a finding. (3) Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in admitting, against the objection of the defendant, so much of the testimony of Dr. Ham, as follows: 'The party desiring said services stated that the position would continue 10 or 12 weeks at $25 per month and board.' It being respectfully submitted that said testimony was hearsay, and should have been rejected. (4) Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'There is no evidence that anybody told him to deliver it to Mrs. Peterson. Is there any evidence to justify the jury in concluding that by implication the boy was authorized to deliver it to Mrs. Peterson? If not, then the delivery to Mrs. Peterson was a wrongful delivery, and just as if it had not been delivered at all. If a telegraph boy takes and delivers a telegram addressed to one person to another person unauthorized to receive it, he might as well go and put it in a stump.' The error being that in so charging the jury the circuit judge charged upon the facts as to the breach of duty on the part of the defendant when he should have left it for the jury to say from all of the facts and circumstances as to whether or not the defendant made an honest effort to deliver the message." The first and second exceptions will be considered together.

[2] There was evidence to carry the case to the jury on the question of willfulness. In the case of Glover v. Telegraph Co., 87 S. C. 509, 59 S. E. 529, this court says: "It was for the jury to say whether the delivery to Royal under misleading information as to the contents of the message was mere inadvertence or was the result of a willful disregard of duty. A telegraph company having delivered a message to a person not authorized by the sender or addressee to receive it is responsible for the consequence of any delay by such person in delivering to the addressee, just as if such third person had been authorized by the company to deliver it as its agent." This court has never said that a telegraph company may search for the addressee until it knows where to find him, and then abandon all efforts to deliver, and rely upon its previous efforts as a protection from punishment for its conduct, which from that time on may become willful. All this court decides is that there was some evidence to go to the jury.

I think the fourth exception ought to be sustained. This was equivalent to saying that defendant was guilty of a willful disregard of duty in not delivering the telegram itself to the addressee and therefore a charge on the facts.

[3] The third exception is overruled. The question was: "What was the nature of this position, for what length of time was it to continue, and what compensation was Mrs. Trapp to receive?" There was no intimation that the offer of employment was in writing, and the only possible answer to the question was what the employer said.

I think the judgment of circuit court ought to be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

In an action by a railway company to establish a lien against property transported for the difference between the charge demanded and paid and the rate fixed by law, where a third party intervened and claimed to have purchased the property, and the evidence showed that the sale was kept quiet, and that the seller, with the connivance of the buyer, continued to enjoy the privileges of ownership, a finding that there was no sale was supported by the evidence, and hence the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; T. H. Spain, Judge.

Action by the Southern Railway Company against D. A. Weaver, in which H. E. Yorke intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, the intervener appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Lyles & Lyles, of Columbia, for appellant. J. Waites Thomas, of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The defendant, D. A. Weaver, shipped two horses, one a stallion and the other a filly, from Fairfield, Ill., to Columbia, S. C., and paid the sum of $48.65, the freight demanded for two horses. It seems that the freight charges fixed by the commission on stallions was higher, and it was agreed that the correct charges were $132.80. The transportation company brought this action for $84.15, the difference, as they are required to do by law, and attached the filly as Weaver was a nonresident. The horses were shipped as the property of Weaver, but the stallion belonged to H. E. Yorke, and it is claimed that, just after the arrival of the horses, Weaver sold the filly to Yorke, and gave him a written bill of sale for it. Yorke entered the stallion as his own with the racing association, and entered the filly as the property of Weaver. Yorke then got two owner's badges, one for himself and one for Weaver. Weaver used his badge. The action was brought against Weaver alone, but Yorke intervened. The action was tried before a magistrate, who found as follows: "I find judgment for plaintiff against defendant for eighty-four and 15/100 ($84.15) dollars, and that the filly Ina Lee, claimed by H. E. Yorke, so far as this judgment is concerned, is the property of the defendant, D. A. Weaver, and that plaintiff has a lien thereon for freight; the plaintiff never having parted with possession unconditionally." The magistrate's report of the case contains the following: "The claimant, H. E. Yorke, put in evidence an alleged bill of sale, but from an inspection of the same and from the evidence submitted I found as a matter of fact that the bill of sale was not supported by the evidence and the circumstances surrounding the transaction."

The circuit judge sustained the magistrate. The intervenor, Yorke, appeals to this court with the following exceptions: "(1) That his honor erred, because the evidence admitted only of the inference that there had been a bona fide transfer of title and possession of the filly Ina Lee from D. A. Weaver to H. E. Yorke on December 14, 1911, free and clear of any lien in favor of the Southern Railway Company, without any notice to the said H. E. Yorke of any claim by the Southern Railway Company, and he should have adjudged that as such the said filly Ina Lee was not subject to attachment as the property of D. A. Weaver, and he should have reversed the magistrate's judgment in so far as the same held that the said filly could be so attached. (2) That his honor should have held that the evidence admitted only of the inference that the Southern Railway Company had voluntarily parted with possession of the said filly before December 14, 1911, and had thereby lost its lien, and that there was a bona fide transfer of title and possession of the said filly, without notice of any claim of the Southern Railway Company, to H. E. Yorke, on the 14th day of December, 1911; and he should have adjudged that the said filly was not subject to attachment as the property of the said D. A. Weaver. (3) That his honor should have held that the evidence admitted only of the inference that the Southern Railway Company had lost its lien on the said filly Ina Lee by issuing the process of attachment, and attaching her, and he should have adjudged that the filly was the property of the said H. E. Yorke, and not subject to attachment as the property of the said D. A. Weaver." All of these exceptions are overruled.

As soon as this court finds that there is any evidence to support the judgment in a case like this, its jurisdiction is at an end. When the owner of personal property sells it and gives written evidence of the sale, and keeps it quiet and continues to enjoy the privileges of ownership until it is to his and the buyer's advantage to disclaim ownership, and the buyer secures the insignia of ownership for the seller and connives at its use, then neither the buyer nor the seller can successfully maintain that there is no evidence that there has been a sale. It is not even claimed that the "bill of sale" is a correct statement of the facts.

There being some evidence to support the finding, the appeal is dismissed.

C. P. Sims and Nicholls & Nicholls, all of Spartanburg, for appellant. J. C. Otts, Sol., of Spartanburg, for the State.

WATTS, J. The defendant-appellant was indicted and convicted at November term of court, 1911, for Spartanburg county, for violation of the dispensary law (Acts 1909 and 1910) upon three counts, to wit: First, for the sale of alcoholic liquor in violation of section 1 of the act of 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 60); second, for maintaining a common nuisance in violation of section 1 of the act of 1910 (26 St. at Large, p. 572); third, for storing alcoholic liquors for unlawful purposes in violation of section 1 of the act of 1909, and sentenced by his honor, Judge Ernest Gary, to be confined at hard labor on the public works of Spartanburg county, or in the state penitentiary, for one year on the first count of the indictment, and at the expiration of that time to be confined at hard labor on the public works for a period of six months each, respectively, on the second and third counts of the indictment.

[1] Thereupon defendant appealed, and asks reversal of the same upon four grounds, to wit: (1) The court erred in admitting a record purporting to be a record showing that the defendant had been convicted and sentenced in 1901 for selling liquor, over objection of defendant's counsel, without proving by the proper officer that the said record was a record in the office of the clerk of the court of general sessions of Spartanburg county, or any other county in the state. (2) The court erred in overruling objection of defendant's counsel to the admission of the record, purporting to be a record showing that the defendant was convicted and sentenced in 1901 for violation of the dispensary laws; the error being that the introduction of said record was incompetent by way of reply. (3) The introduction of the record purporting to show that defendant was convicted and sentenced in 1901 for violation of the dispensary laws was erroneous, in that (a) it was an improper method of attacking defendant's character as a witness, and (b) was irrelevant to the issue involved in the case, for the reason that evidence of a conviction prior to 1909 had no bearing upon the prosecution for an offense against which an indictment had been preferred, based on the act of 1909; and (c) it was never proven that the record in question disclosed a prior conviction of the defendant at bar, in that the record of 1901 disclosed the conviction of one "W. E. Wooten," whereas the defendant in the instant case was indicted under the name of "Ed Wooten," who denied that the conviction of W. E. Wooten applied to him. (4) The court erred in imposing upon the defendant the increased sentence which section 11 of the act of 1909 provides in case of a second conviction of violation of the dispensary laws, the error being that there was no evidence of a previous conviction of defendant under the act of 1909, which evidence was the sine qua non to the application of the increased penalty of the act.

As to exceptions 1, 2, and 3, which question his honor's ruling in admitting in evidence the record of the court of general sessions, purporting to be a former conviction of the defendant-appellant, the record shows the following: "The solicitor offered to introduce a record of sentence against the defendant of 1901. Mr. Sims, for the defense, objected to its being introduced in evidence in reply." After ruling by the court that it was competent, "Mr. Sims objects on the ground that the indictment referred to is against W. E. Wooten, and not Ed Wooten." These are the only grounds of objection made and the only one ruled upon by his honor, and the exceptions cannot be sustained, as an examination of the record will disclose that the introduction of what purports to be the record of a former conviction was directly in reply to the evidence given by the defendant in his examination in chief, brought out by his attorney. But, further, his honor allowed the defendant to go back on the stand and testify, after this record had been introduced in reply by the state, and defendant has no right to complain. It is very difficult for the trial judge to carry all of the testimony in a case in his head, and frequently he is in doubt as to what is strictly in reply, and valuable time would be consumed in ascertaining what has been testified to when that is the case. I see no reason why the judge should not allow the testimony to be introduced and the other side allowed to reply to it. This certainly would cure any objection to it and render the admission to it harmless, as to it being in reply. The defendant when recalled to the witness stand admitted that one of the records introduced was against him and that he had paid the fine.

[2] As to exception 4, the acts of the Legislature leave it discretionary with the trial judge in sentencing a party convicted as to whether he will impose a fine or sentence of imprisonment, and his honor imposed a sentence that was within his wise discretion, and this exception must be overruled. State v. Boyd, 35 S. C. 269, 14 S. E. 620.

Judgment affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). I dissent. It seems to me that the records of former convictions were not admissible. The names were similar, but it is necessary to show that the persons were the same. Records of a court prove themselves, but they do not and cannot identify the person on trial with the defendant in former trials, and until some evidence is introduced to show that the two were the same, the records are not admissible. In this case there was not a word of proof until the defendant, after evidence was already in, was practically forced to be a witness against himself. Besides this, the defendant was not charged with a second offense. I do not think it is good practice to allow the state, while the presumption of innocence is still with the defendant, to prove that some one with the same name, and assumed to be the defendant, is an old offender.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; T. H. Spain, Judge.

Action by B. D. Hughes against the Southern Railway Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint reads as follows:

"The plaintiff above named, complaining of the defendants above named, alleges:

"(1) That upon information and belief the defendant Southern Railway Company is now, and was at the times hereinafter mentioned, a corporation duly chartered and organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Virginia, and at the times hereinafter mentioned owned and operated, and now owns and operates, a certain line of railroad, together with tracks, trains, engines, and other appurtenances thereto belonging, railroad yards, roundhouses, machine shops, situated in the city of Columbia, in the said county and state of South Carolina; and that the defendant R. B. Watts was at the times hereinafter mentioned, and is now, a resident and citizen of the state of South Carolina, county of Richland.

"(2) That on the 4th day of November, 1907, the plaintiff, B. D. Hughes, was in the employ of the said defendant Southern Railway Company as assistant foreman of the roundhouse in the said yard of the defendant, situated, as aforesaid, in the city of Columbia; and that on the said date above mentioned, while in the discharge of his duty as assistant foreman, an engine belonging to the said defendant Southern Railway Company, and in charge of and operated by the defendant the said R. B. Watts, an agent, servant, and employé of the said railway company, approached and ran into the said roundhouse in a careless, negligent, and reckless manner and knocked down one of the posts or pillars thereof, precipitating upon the plaintiff portions of the said roundhouse, throwing him to the ground, cutting a long gash across the top of his head, bruising his back, neck, shoulder, chest, side, and head, and causing a number of bruises on different parts of his body, and seriously and permanently injuring him so that he became ill and sick, and has suffered intense pain from his injuries, and has been put to great expense for medicine and medical attention, and has been informed and believes that he will never be well again.

"(3) That the said engine of the defendant Southern Railway Company was being run into the roundhouse for repairs by the defendant R. B. Watts, who was at the time the agent, servant, and employé of the defendant Southern Railway Company. That, as said engine moved along the track into the roundhouse, a bar of iron or other obstruction extending outward from said engine struck with violent force against an upright post which was standing near the said track and supported the ceiling and roof of the roundhouse. That the said upright post was of defective material, the same being unsound and rotten; and the said roundhouse being old and worn and of defective material; and in maintaining a defective turntable; and the upright post being placed too close to the track leading into the roundhouse; and the construction of the said building being unsuitable, out of date, and too small to allow the large modern engines now owned and used by the defendant Southern Railway Company to pass in and out of the said building with safety. That by reason of the upright post being struck as aforesaid, and it being unsound and too close to the track, it was broken and knocked to the ground, and the ceiling and roof being thus left unsupported, fell with it. That the ceiling and roof, consisting of girders, beams, and other materials and debris, came down and fell without warning upon the plaintiff and knocked him senseless, bruised and injured him in his head and body, and inflicted upon him permanent bodily injuries, as above described. That the said injuries received by the plaintiff were caused by the joint and concurrent negligence, carelessness, recklessness, and wanton conduct of the defendants, in causing said engine to be run into the roundhouse with a bar of iron or other obstruction extending outward therefrom; in causing said bar or other obstruction to strike with violent force against said post; and in not providing a post of good material; and in causing said post to be broken; and in causing the ceiling and roof, girders, beams, and other materials and debris to be precipitated downward without warning upon the plaintiff, as aforesaid; and in not providing a safe place for plaintiff to work; and in maintaining and operating an old and worn turntable; and in maintaining and operating a defective roundhouse; and in allowing the upright post to remain too close to the track leading into the roundhouse, to take in and out the large modern engines with safety.

"(4) That by reason of the said joint and concurrent carelessness, negligence, reckless and wanton conduct of the defendant Southern Railway Company, and the said R. B. Watts, agent and employé, as aforesaid, in causing the said engine to be run into the roundhouse with the bar of iron or other obstruction extending outward therefrom; and in causing said bar of iron or other obstruction to strike with violent force against said post; and in not providing a post of good material; and in causing said post to be broken; in causing the ceiling and roof, girders, beams, and other materials and debris to be precipitated downward, without warning, upon the plaintiff as aforesaid; and in not providing a safe place for plaintiff to work; and in allowing the upright post of the roundhouse to remain too close to the track leading into the roundhouse and in maintaining and keeping an old, defective, out of date roundhouse, too small to allow the large, modern engines, owned by the defendant Southern Railway Company, to go in and out with safety; and in maintaining and operating a defective turntable.

"(5) That as a result of the said joint and concurrent carelessness, negligence, recklessness and wantonness of the defendants, as aforesaid, the plaintiff has been injured in the sum of twenty thousand ($20,000.00) dollars.

"Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment in the sum of twenty thousand ($20,000.00) dollars, and for the costs of this action.

The following is the answer of the defendant Southern Railway Company, together with exhibits attached thereto:

"The defendant Southern Railway Company, answering the complaint herein:

"For a first defense:

"(1) Admits the allegations of paragraph 1.

"(2) As to the allegations of paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 5, this defendant admits that on the date named in the complaint the plaintiff, B. D. Hughes, was in the employ of this defendant as acting assistant foreman of the roundhouse, and that on said date the plaintiff received some injuries by reason of one of the posts of the said roundhouse being knocked down by one of the defendant's engines, for which accident plaintiff was responsible. As to the extent of the injuries, this defendant alleges, upon information and belief, that they were slight and temporary. Denies each and every allegation of said paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 5 not hereinabove admitted.

"(3) Denies each and every allegation in said complaint contained not herein above specifically admitted or denied.

"For a second defense:

"Alleges that the plaintiff, at the time of entering upon said services as alleged in the complaint, and thereafter, knew of the risks ordinary or otherwise incident thereto, including the alleged risk alleged to have resulted in the injury of which he complains, and that with said knowledge he fully assumed the said risks and thereby waived any right on his part to hold this defendant liable to him therefor.

"For a third defense:

"Alleges, on information and belief, that, on the occasion referred to in the complaint, plaintiff was himself guilty of carelessness, negligence, and recklessness in giving signals to the engineer in charge of said engine, said engineer being at the time under the direct control and management of the plaintiff herein, and in carelessly, negligently, and recklessly allowing the said engineer to proceed with the said engine into the said roundhouse when he knew the same could not be done without injury to himself and others, and that such carelessness, negligence, and recklessness on his part contributed to a proximate cause of his injury, without which same would not have occurred.

"For a fourth defense:

"(1) The defendant alleges that after the time of the alleged injury and before the commencement of this action, to wit, on the 18th day of November, 1907, in consideration of the payment of $1 to the plaintiff by this defendant, the said plaintiff executed and delivered to this defendant a written release in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims for damages resulting from the injury alleged in the complaint herein.

"(2) This defendant further alleges that subsequent to the execution of the said release, to wit, on the 28d day of April, 1908, the plaintiff herein, B. D. Hughes, commenced in the court of common pleas for Richland county an action against the said defendant Southern Railway Company, as will appear by the record in said cause, and in said complaint alleged substantially the same facts as to the said accident as are set out in the above-entitled action, and further alleged plaintiff's injury in said accident and the execution and delivery of a release to the defendant Southern Railway Company by plaintiff of all claims against it on account of said alleged injuries. Said complaint was duly answered, and thereafter, on the 15th day of June, 1910, the said cause proceeded regularly to trial in said court before his honor, J. W. De Vore, presiding judge, and a jury, resulting in an order of nonsuit. Attached hereto, and made a part hereof, are the complaint, answer, and order of nonsuit, marked, respectively, Exhibits 'A,' 'B,' and 'C.' That no appeal was ever taken from said order of nonsuit. This defendant now pleads that the validity of said release has been adjudicated in the aforesaid action and plaintiff is now estopped from maintaining this action.

Exhibit A.

"The plaintiff above named, complaining of the defendant above named, alleges:

"(1) Upon information and belief, that the defendant Southern Railway Company is now, and was at the times hereinafter mentioned, a corporation duly chartered and organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Virginia, and at the times hereinafter mentioned, owned and operated, and now owns and operates, a certain line of railroad, together with tracks, trains, engines, and other appurtenances thereto belonging, railroad yards, roundhouses, machine shop, situated in the city of Columbia, in the said county of Richland, in the said state of South Carolina.

"(2) That on or about the 4th day of November, 1907, the plaintiff, B. D. Hughes, was in the employ of the said defendant as assistant foreman of the roundhouse in the said yard of the said defendant, situated as aforesaid, in the city of Columbia. That while in the discharge of his duties as assistant foreman, an engine belonging to the said defendant ran into the said roundhouse and knocked down one of the pillars thereof, precipitating upon the plaintiff portions of the said roundhouse, thereby seriously injuring him. That on or about the 16th day of November, 1907, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendant that he would release to the defendant all claims he had against the defendant, resulting from the said injuries to him; and the said defendant, in consideration of the said release, would pay to the plaintiff the sum of $1, and restore the plaintiff, without any loss of time, to his said position as assistant foreman of the said roundhouse.

"(3) That in performance of the said agreement, the plaintiff did on or about the said 18th day of November, 1907, execute and deliver unto the said defendant a release of all claims against the said defendant on account of the said injuries, and the defendant in part performance of the said agreement, paid to the plaintiff the said sum of $1 and soon thereafter restored the plaintiff to his said position as assistant foreman of the said roundhouse; and the plaintiff duly entered into the performance of said duties as said assistant foreman, on or about the 19th day of November, 1907.

"(4) That soon after entering upon the performance of his said duties, to wit, about one week thereafter, the plaintiff was removed from said position by the defendant, without cause and with intent to violate said agreement, and said position given to another person. That plaintiff thereupon demanded that the said position be restored to him under the terms of said agreement, but the said defendant wantonly and willfully failed and refused and still refuses to restore the same to him under the terms of the said agreement, and the plaintiff alleges that by reason of the refusal of the said defendant to carry out the terms of the said agreement, and on account of the breach thereof, as aforesaid, he has been damaged in the sum of $17,000.

"Wherefore, plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant in the sum of $17,000.

Exhibit B.

"The defendant Southern Railway Company, answering the complaint herein:

"(1) Admits the allegations of paragraph 1, unless the property or any part thereof referred to is included in the lease from Southern Railway, Carolina Division to Southern Railway Company, of date June 30, 1902, in which event it denies the allegations as to ownership of same.

"(2) As to the allegations of paragraph 2, admits that on the date mentioned, plaintiff, while in the employ of the defendant in the capacity of acting assistant foreman of the roundhouse, was injured in consequence of an engine running into said roundhouse (for which accident plaintiff was responsible). It denies that said injuries were serious; on the contrary, alleged in information and belief that they were very slight. It admits further that plaintiff thereafter executed a written release to defendant of all claims arising against it or growing out of the said accident, and that plaintiff thereupon resumed his duties as acting assistant foreman of the roundhouse, without any loss of time; in other words, no reduction was made from his salary or wages on account of two weeks' time lost in consequence of said accident. Denies each and every allegation of said paragraph 2, not hereinabove specifically admitted or denied.

"(3) As to allegations of paragraph 3, admits that plaintiff executed a release to defendant on or about the date stated in full of all claims against defendant on account of said injuries; and that plaintiff thereafter, on the 19th day of November, 1907, resumed his duties as acting assistant foreman of the roundhouse. Denies each and every allegation of said paragraph 3 not herein specifically admitted.

"(4) As to the allegations of paragraph 4, admits that about a week after plaintiff had resumed his work as acting assistant foreman of the roundhouse, on account of his unsatisfactory work and failure to perform the duties of that position, he was given a position of machinist, having had several years' experience as machinist. Defendant alleges that plaintiff, after a week's work as machinist, quit its service. Denies each and every allegation of said paragraph 4, not above specifically admitted.

"(5) As to each and every allegation of said complaint not hereinabove specifically admitted or denied, defendant denies the same.

"For a second defense:

"The defendant alleges that although the alleged agreement upon which this action was brought by its terms was not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, neither said agreement nor any note or memorandum thereof was ever in writing and subscribed by the said Southern Railway Company, which it ought to be charged therewith, or some person thereto by its lawful authority.

Exhibit C.

"This case came on for trial June 15, 1910.

"After the plaintiff had been sworn and commenced his testimony, it was sought by his attorneys to prove a parol agreement about the same subject-matter made prior to the execution of the written agreement referred to in the complaint. The written agreement (release) was exhibited to the plaintiff by defendant's attorney and plaintiff admitted the execution thereof and the receipt of the consideration, viz., $1, and said release was admitted in evidence. Defendant's attorney then objected to any testimony tending to show the alleged prior oral agreement referred to in the complaint, on the grounds taken down by the court stenographer: First, that if there is such an oral agreement it was merged in the written release; second, that it was obvious to the statute of frauds; and, third, that it was void, being indefinite as to time, terms, or conditions.

"After hearing argument the objections were sustained; plaintiff's attorney thereupon stated that they would have to submit to a nonsuit in view of such ruling, and a nonsuit is accordingly granted.

"J. W. De Vore, Presiding Judge.

"Columbia, S. C., June 16, 1910."

The answer of the defendant R. B. Watts is practically identical with that of the Southern Railway Company, with exception that the allegations of the fourth defense are made on information and belief.

W. Boyd Evans, of Columbia, for appellant. E. M. Thomson, of Columbia, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This was an action in the court of common pleas for Richland county to recover the sum of $20,000 damages for alleged careless, reckless, and wanton conduct of defendants for alleged injuries received by the plaintiff on November 4, 1907, while in the employment of the Southern Railway Company. The defendants answer, and in their fourth defense allege that on the 22d day of April, 1908, the plaintiff, Hughes, commenced an action in the court of common pleas for Richland county against the defendant, Southern Railway Company, as will appear by the record in said cause, and in that complaint alleged substantially the same facts as to the said accident as are now set out in the pending action, and allege further plaintiff's injury in said accident and the execution and delivery of a release to the Southern Railway Company by the plaintiff to all claims against it on account of said alleged injuries. Complaint was duly answered, and on June 15, 1910, the cause proceeded regularly to trial before Judge De Vore and a jury, resulting in an order of nonsuit. Attached to this answer and made a part thereof are the complaint, answer, and order of nonsuit, marked "Exhibits A, B, and C"; that no appeal was taken from this order of nonsuit. The defendant pleads that the validity of said release has been adjudicated in the former action and plaintiff is now estopped from maintaining this action. For a proper understanding of the issues, the complaint in this case, together with the answer and exhibits, will be reported with the case. The plaintiff interposed a demurrer to the fourth defense in the case at bar on the following grounds: The plaintiff above named demurs to the allegations of paragraph 2 in the above-entitled action: That upon the face thereof, together with Exhibits A, B, and C, annexed to the answer, and a part thereof, it does not constitute a defense to this action upon the grounds: (1) That the complaint herein does not allege substantially the same facts as the said complaint in the former action. (2) That this action is entirely a different cause of action than the one sued on in the former action. The cause of action sued on in this cause being one founded upon the delict wrong done by the defendant to plaintiff, where the former action was founded upon and growing out of a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, and therefore that action or action in the former suit cannot be pleaded in bar of this action. (3) That the question of validity of the said release was unadjudicated in the former action and does not constitute an estoppel herein. The demurrer was heard and overruled by Judge Spain, and the plaintiff appealed on the following grounds: That his honor erred in overruling the demurrer: (1) Because his honor held the allegations of the fourth defense constituted a bar to the action herein, whereas he should have held that the complaint herein does not allege substantially the same facts as set forth in the former action. (2) That he should have held that this action is entirely a different cause of action than the one sued on in the former action; that the action sued on in this action is one founded upon the delict and wrong done by the defendants to the plaintiff, and that the former action was founded and grew out of a breach of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant Southern Railway Company, and therefore the former action could not be pleaded a bar to this action. (3) That he should have held that the validity of the said release was not adjudicated in the former action, and does not constitute an estoppel herein.

The question raised by the order overruling the demurrer and exceptions thereto is whether the order of nonsuit in the former action constitutes an estoppel in this action and rendered the matter res adjudicata and constitutes a bar to the present action. In the former action plaintiff elected to treat the contract of release as valid and based his right to recover upon its validity and admitted it when exhibited to him on trial. In the present action he attempts to treat the release as invalid and avoid it and bases his right to recover upon the invalidity of the release. In one action plaintiff alleges the release is valid, and in the second action he alleges it is invalid. In the first action Judge De Vore construed the written contract of release as concluding the plaintiff from claiming that the terms of the contract were in any way different from those in writing and barring the right of action for the alleged breach, or that the evidence showed no breach of the written contract. The plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit, which was ordered, and that order was not appealed from. After that this action was commenced to recover damages which the plaintiff in the former action alleged he had released. The commencement of the first action based on the validity of the contract of the release, was a decisive act and constituted an election on the part of the plaintiff to test the validity or invalidity of that release, and it seems to us that the contract of release was conclusively adjudicated in that action between the parties to it to be valid, and is such an adjudication of the subject-matter of controversy in both actions to bar the plaintiff's recovery of the damages released. "A nonsuit is not usually a judgment upon the merits. It was originally given against the plaintiff when he introduced insufficient evidence to support a verdict or when he refused or neglected to proceed to the trial of the cause after it had been put at issue. It is different, however, where the plaintiff is nonsuited or a verdict is directed because the evidence introduced by the plaintiff proves affirmatively as a matter of law that he is not entitled to recover. The difference is that in one instance the plaintiff fails to make out his case; in the other instance, he proves affirmatively facts which as a matter of law show that he is not entitled to recover. Jenkins v. A. C. L. R. R. Co., 89 S. C. 408, 71 S. E. 1010, and cases cited therein; Morrow v. Railway Co., 84 S. C. 224, 66 S. E. 186, 19 Ann. Cas. 1009. "So a nonsuit based upon the construction of a deed and unappealed from is res adjudicata in a subsequent action involving the same matter." Cartin v. Railroad Co., 43 S. C. 221, 20 S. E. 979, 49 Am. St. Rep. 829; Hodge v. Lumber Co., 90 S. C. 231, 71 S. E. 1009. "A matter involved in a cause and finally disposed of by a circuit decree from which no appeal is taken becomes res adjudicata." Symmes v. Symmes, 18 S. C. 602. The plaintiff by his former action asserted that the release was valid. Defendant admitted that it was. Plaintiff claimed damages under it, but lost his case by being nonsuited. The validity of the contract of release is res adjudicata.

Judgment affirmed.

The following are the exceptions:

"(1) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in overruling defendant's objection to the question: 'Q. Describe the tracks and what the blood hounds did?' (b) The circuit court further erred in refusing defendant's motion to restore the whole testimony as to the tracks and drawing subject to defendant's objection as a whole.

"(3) The circuit court erred in overruling the following objection to the testimony of the witness U. S. Way. We object to the witness testifying on the ground that he says that he does not know what it means to swear in court.

"(4) Circuit court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the following questions: 'Q. You live on one side of the school grounds and she lives on this side?' Objected to on the ground the same as leading. The circuit court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the following question and answer thereto: 'Q. You have got a water-closet back there where you go out? A. Yes, sir. Jacob Mooror, Esq.: We do not think that ought to go in, your honor. How is that relevant to this case?' We object to the testimony on the ground that it is not in line with the crime charged. This is not the character of offense which is before the court, and, where testimony of one's previous conduct is attempted to be shown, it must be in line with previous acts of the same kind. Going in a closet is not in line with the kind of crime charged here.

"(5) The court erred in overruling the following objections: 'We object to the testimony about the tracks, your honor has ruled that out? The Court: I ruled just the other way.'

"(6) The circuit court erred in overruling the following motion: 'The motion, your honor, is to direct a verdict of not guilty on the ground that the defendant has not been identified as the party who committed the crime charged, and that there is no evidence to connect him, or to show whose tracks the dogs trailed from this house. The evidence is insufficient to sustain any verdict against him whatever.

"(7) The circuit court erred in permitting solicitor to draw to the attention of the jury the fact that there was no testimony introduced by the defense.

"(8) The circuit court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now a reasonable doubt, as I have stated time and again in this courtroom, don't mean some fanciful or imaginary doubt, like a person might doubt whether the sun would rise to-morrow morning and not be able to give any reason for it—it does not mean that kind of a doubt, it means a good, strong, substantial doubt.' This definition of a reasonable doubt misled the jury and fixed the limits for finding a reasonable doubt beyond reason."

Moorer & Summers, of St. George, for appellant. Solicitor Hildebrand, of Orangeburg, for the State.

GARY, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court imposing the sentence of death upon the defendant, who was convicted of assault with intent to ravish. The appellant's exceptions will be reported and considered in their regular order.

[1] First, second, third, fourth, and fifth exceptions: In the first place, the appellant has failed to show that there was error; and in the second place, even if there was error, it has not been made to appear that it was prejudicial.

Sixth exception: We do not deem it necessary to discuss the testimony in detail to show that this exception is not well founded.

[2] Seventh exception: It is only necessary to refer to the following charge of his honor, the presiding judge, to show that this exception cannot be sustained: "Mr. Foreman and gentlemen—At the outset I wish to say to you that it should not weigh one iota with you that the defendant did not take the stand and testify. Counsel for the defense seems to be under the impression that the solicitor commented on that fact, but I did not so understand it. He did not refer to the defendant. If you should be under the impression that he did comment on it, it should not weigh with you. According to my judgment, he did not comment on it under the meaning of the law. If you think that he did, you should not let it weigh with you, and you should not let it weigh that he did not go on the stand."

[3] Eighth exception: We are unable to discover in what respects this charge was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant.

The next question for consideration is whether there was error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in overruling the motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. The contention of the appellant that there was no testimony to support the verdict of the jury has already been disposed of.

[4] The contention that the act of 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 206) is unconstitutional on the ground that it is in violation of article 3, § 17, of the Constitution, cannot be sustained for the reasons stated in the case of Jellico v. Commissioners, 83 S. C. 481, 65 S. E. 725.

[5] The ground that said act is unconstitutional because it requires the destruction of the record in such cases, whether the defendant be convicted or acquitted, cannot be sustained, as the provisions of the statute have no application to this case, as will appear from the following statement of his honor, the presiding judge, in overruling this ground of the motion: "As to the second ground, it will be necessary to state the facts as they occurred in the court at trial. The prosecutrix and party, upon whom the assault was alleged to have been committed, was put upon the witness stand in open court and in public, just as all witnesses are sworn, and examined; in other words, the provisions of the act of 1909 were not resorted to or taken advantage of, hence there is no reason for passing on the constitutionality of the act unless defendant's contention is that, if a part of the act is unconstitutional, the whole act is. If this be his position and contention, it cannot be sustained, for the reason that the first section of the act fixes the punishment, and that section is independent of the balance of said act and can stand alone, even if the other portion of said act be unconstitutional, about which I express no opinion, as it is not necessary in this case to do so." The ruling of the circuit judge is sustained by the case of Ex parte Florence School, 43 S. C. 11, 20 S. E. 794. The appellant has failed to show in what respects the other constitutional provisions mentioned by him have been violated.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of having another day assigned for the execution of the sentence of the court.

PASCHALL & GRESHAM v. GILLISS.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. BROKERS (§ 88*)—COMMISSIONS—TERMINATION OF AUTHORITY—BAD FAITH—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where plaintiff was employed to sell certain timber land for $200,000 on a commission of 5 per cent., and the land was subsequently sold to a purchaser whom plaintiff had procured for $180,000, because the purchaser claimed plaintiff had misrepresented the amount of the timber on the land, plaintiff's bad faith, if any, was a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 121, 123-130; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. WORK AND LABOR (§ 29*)—EXPRESS CONTRACT—QUANTUM MERUIT.

Where plaintiff was employed to sell certain timber land for $200,000 on a 5 per cent. commission, and the owners thereafter sold the land to a purchaser procured by plaintiff for $180,000, the plaintiff's right of action to recover commissions was not limited to an action on the express contract; but he was entitled to sue on a quantum meruit and prove the express contract as evidence of the value of his services.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 56-58; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. BROKERS (§ 69*)—COMMISSIONS—INTEREST.

Where, after a broker had been employed to sell timber land, the owners sold the land for a less price than the broker was authorized to accept to a purchaser procured by the broker, and then wrote the broker that the land had been sold and that he was not entitled to commissions, his right of action for commissions then accrued, and he was entitled to interest on the amount found to represent the reasonable value of his services from that date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

4. BROKERS (§ 69*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—SALE AT DIFFERENT PRICE.

Where a broker contracts to furnish a purchaser for timber lands at a stipulated price, and furnishes a purchaser to whom the owner sells at a less price, the broker is entitled to recover such compensation for his services as would be reasonable under all the facts and circumstances of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by J. I. Gilliss against J. R. Paschall and Thomas Gresham, partners as Paschall & Gresham. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The following are the instructions given for plaintiff:

1. "If the jury believe from the evidence (1) that the defendants employed the plaintiff, Gilliss, to sell the timber on the Lofton tract; (2) that the plaintiff, Gilliss, brought the said property to the attention of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson; (3) that the defendants, in the absence of the plaintiff (Gilliss), attempted to sell said property to the said Johnsons; (4) that the said Johnsons told the defendants that the plaintiff, Gilliss, had informed them (the said Johnsons) that he (Gilliss) thought the aforesaid tract of land contained not more than 90,000,000 feet of timber; (5) that the said Johnsons also told the defendants that they, the said Johnsons, were unwilling to pay more than $2 a thousand feet, based on the aforesaid estimate of the plaintiff, Gilliss, or a total sum of $180,000; (6) that the said Johnsons offered the defendants the sum of $180,000 for the aforesaid timber, and informed the defendants that the amount of said offer was calculated by allowing $2 a thousand feet for the quantity of timber stated in the aforesaid estimate of the plaintiff, Gilliss; (7) that, after receiving the aforesaid information, the defendants accepted the aforesaid offer of the said Johnsons, and sold and conveyed said property to said Johnsons; (8) that the plaintiff, Gilliss, although absent at the time such sale was actually made, had originally brought said property to the attention of said Johnsons, and was the procuring cause of said sale—then the court instructs the jury that, even though they may believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Gilliss, had not been authorized to sell said property for any sum less than $200,000, nevertheless the plaintiff Gilliss is entitled to recover from the defendants, unless the jury believe it is shown, by a preponderance of the evidence to the satisfaction of the jury, that prior to the aforesaid sale the plaintiff, Gilliss, informed the defendant Paschall, expressly or in substance, that he (Gilliss) abandoned the aforesaid employment by the defendants to sell said timber for them, or unless the jury believe from the evidence that Gilliss, although claiming to act for Paschall & Gresham, was the actual representative of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson."

2. "That the plaintiff was the procuring cause of said sale, if said sale was brought about by the plaintiff's exertions in presenting the property to the attention of the purchasers, or by his introducing the purchasers to the defendants, or by his giving to the defendants as possible purchasers the names of the said Mrs. Jessie C. Johnson and Ira Johnson."

3. "That if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was authorized or requested by the defendants to sell the Lofton tract for them, and that pursuant thereto the plaintiff brought the property to the attention of the purchasers, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, and was the means of putting the defendants into communication with them, then the jury are instructed that it was not necessary that the plaintiff should have personally participated in the actual negotiations which ended in the sale, and his right to recover commissions cannot be defeated because of his failure to personally participate in said negotiation."

4. "If the jury find for the plaintiff, Gilliss, they should award him the principal sum of $9,000, and should state, in their verdict, that the said sum is to bear interest from September 10, 1909."

5. "The court instructs the jury that, even though they believe from the evidence that at one time J. I. Gilliss, the plaintiff in this case, had a contract with the defendants for the sale of their property, known as the 'Lofton tract,' nevertheless, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff abandoned the said contract and ceased in his efforts to sell the same, and informed Mr. Paschall expressly or in substance that he (Gilliss) abandoned the employment by the defendants to sell the Lofton timber for them to Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, they must find for the defendants."

6. "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that said J. I. Gilliss, while claiming to represent the said Paschall & Gresham, the defendants in this case, was actually representing Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, the purchasers of said timber, they must find for the defendants. But the fact that Gilliss was the estimator and agent of the Greenleaf Johnson Company, a corporation in which Mrs. Johnson and her son were stockholders, would not constitute Gilliss as personally representing Mr. and Mrs. Johnson as the purchasers of said timber in the meaning of these instructions; for, to defeat the claim of Gilliss to his commissions on this ground, the jury must be satisfied from the preponderance of the evidence, either direct or circumstantial, that Gilliss was actually the personal representative of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson in the transaction of the negotiations for the sale of the timber, although claiming to represent Paschall & Gresham."

The following are those refused to defendant:

1. "The court instructs the jury that the contract entered into between the parties in this suit was a contract for the payment of a commission in the event of a sale at the fixed price of $200,000; and if they believe from the evidence that said timber was sold for less than $200,000, then they must find for the defendants."

2. "The court instructs the jury that for the plaintiff, J. I. Gilliss, to recover in this case, he must show by a preponderance of evidence that he found a purchaser ready and willing to purchase the timber of the defendants upon the terms and price at which the defendants authorized him to sell; and if they believe from the evidence that J. I. Gilliss failed to produce such a purchaser, they must find for the defendants."

3. "The court instructs the jury that, even though they believe from the evidence that at one time J. I. Gilliss, the plaintiff in this case, had a contract with the defendants for the sale of their property, known as the 'Lofton tract,' nevertheless, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff abandoned the said contract and ceased in his efforts to sell the same, they must find for the defendants."

4. "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that said J. I. Gilliss, while claiming to represent the said Paschall & Gresham, the defendants in this case, was actually representing Mrs. Johnson, the purchaser of said timber, then they must find for the defendants."

5. "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the said J. I. Gilliss had estimated said Lofton tract of timber, and had made a written estimate thereof showing 112,000,000 feet of timber thereon, and that, while claiming to act as the agent of said Paschall & Gresham, he represented to a proposed purchaser that there was only 90,000,000 feet of timber on said tract, then the said Gilliss acted contrary to his duty to the said Paschall & Gresham, and they must find for the defendants."

6. "The court instructs the jury that the utmost good faith is required of an agent or broker, and if they believe from the evidence that the said J. I. Gilliss, plaintiff herein, at the time it is alleged he was acting as the agent of Paschall & Gresham, the defendants herein, was likewise acting for the vendees, the Johnsons, or that he gave the said Johnsons private information without the knowledge of Paschall & Gresham, or that Paschall & Gresham were prevented from receiving their price through the misrepresentation of the said Gilliss, they must find for the defendants."

7. "The court instructs the jury that the relation of principal and agent is a confidential one, and requires the utmost good faith from the agent to his principal, and that it is the duty of an agent to disclose to his principal promptly, frankly, and fully his (the agent's) relations to the subject of his agency, and all information coming to his knowledge affecting the subject of his agency, and that if they believe from the evidence that the said J. I. Gilliss, while claiming to act as agent for the said Paschall & Gresham, did not exercise towards them the utmost good faith, or did not disclose promptly, fully, and frankly to said Paschall & Gresham his relations to, or information in his possession materially affecting, the sale of said Lofton property to Mrs. Johnson, or the information or reports given or made by him to the said Mrs. Johnson in regard to said property, then the said Gilliss forfeited any right he may have had to commissions, and they must find for the defendants."

8. "The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the said Gilliss, if they believe he was acting as an agent of the defendants, to make a full, frank, and prompt disclosure of his relations to the transaction, and of any information furnished by him to the Johnsons, and the said Gilliss had no right to leave these matters to conjecture and inference, and that unless he made such full, frank, and prompt disclosure to Paschall & Gresham, the defendants in this case, then he forfeited any right to commissions that he might have had, and they should find for the defendants. And the court further instructs the jury that the law does not inquire whether or not a principal was injured by reason of such failure on the part of the agent to disclose his relations to the subject of his agency, but that it is only sufficient to show such failure to deprive the agent of any right to commissions."

9. "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff is entitled to recovery, not under the contract, but on account of services, then such amount must be based upon the value of the plaintiff's services, less any loss that may have been caused by the failure of the plaintiff to carry out the special contract proved in this case."

Williams & Mullen, for plaintiffs in error.
Braxton & Eggleston and R. W. Tomlin, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This action of assumpsit was brought by the plaintiff, J. I. Gilliss, to recover of the defendants, J. R. Paschall and Thomas Gresham, partners in business under the firm name of Paschall & Gresham, commissions alleged to be due the plaintiff upon a sale alleged to have been made by him, or through his instrumentality, of a certain tract of timbered land belonging to the defendants. The declaration filed contains a special count, and also the common counts in assumpsit, to which the defendants pleaded the general issue of non assumpsit, and to a judgment for $9,000 in favor of the plaintiff this writ of error was awarded.

The material facts in the case are as follows:

In May, 1909, the defendants were the owners of a certain tract of timbered land, situated in Charleston county, S. C., containing about 10,000 acres, and known as the "Lofton tract." At that time the defendants were engaged in negotiating with one Bolce and associates, of Ashville, N. C., for the sale of said land and timber, and, at the request of Bolce, Paschall employed for Bolce and associates Gilliss, who was a resident of Norfolk, Va., to estimate said tract of timber. Bolce met Gilliss in Charleston, and took him upon the property, where he instructed Gilliss to make and furnish him (Bolce) an estimate of the standing timber thereon. After remaining on the land for a week or more, Gilliss went to Savannah and furnished Bolce a written estimate of said timber, putting it at 112,000,000 feet.

Gilliss, being impressed with the fine quality of the timber, asked Paschall, if for any reason Boice did not buy it, to let him (Gilliss) try to sell it, and inquired upon what price he would allow him a commission, to which Paschall replied that, if the pending deal did not go through, he would let him (Gilliss) make an attempt to sell it, and in the event of a sale at the price of $200,000 his commission should be 5 per cent. Boice and associates were unable to make their financial arrangements to purchase the property, and about the 1st of July, 1909, Gilliss asked Paschall to meet, in Suffolk, Va., one W. B. Phillips with a view of a sale to him; but Phillips wanted an option on the property at $180,000, which Paschall refused to give, nor would he lower his price of $200,000, and thereupon the negotiations with Phillips also terminated.

About the middle of August, 1909, Gilliss asked Paschall to put in writing their agreement, and in compliance with this request Paschall, on August 14, 1909, wrote Gilliss a letter in which he said: "Confirming my conversation with you, I hereby agree to pay you five per cent. commission for the sale of the tract of timber known as the 'Lofton tract,' for the price of $200,000. Your commissions to be paid at such time and in such manner as I receive the money from said sale. I am at Ocean View Hotel, and would like to see you. If this letter reaches you in time, please call me about 7 o'clock this p. m. and I will come up to Norfolk to see you."

Gilliss was, and had been for 12 or more years, in the employ of the Greenleaf Johnson Lumber Company, of Norfolk, Va., as its timber estimator and buyer, which corporation was owned or controlled by a Mrs. J. C. Johnson and her son, Ira Johnson, both of Baltimore, Md.; she being the secretary and treasurer and he the general manager of the company. Soon after Gilliss received the above-mentioned letter from Paschall, Mrs. Johnson wrote Paschall, whom she knew and had had business transactions with for several years, stating that she had understood this (the "Lofton tract") to be a very fine body of timber, and requesting Paschall to come to see her about purchasing it. Prior to this Gilliss had taken up with Mrs. Johnson the question of her purchasing the said tract of timber, advising her that it was for her interest to buy it, and had written her letters with respect to the timber.

Paschall, upon being requested to do so by Mrs. Johnson, went at the end of August, 1909, to Baltimore to see her, stating to her there were 112,000,000 or 120,000,000 feet of timber on the property, and that his price was $200,000. Mrs. Johnson was interested in the property, saying she was willing to purchase it if the timber proved as fine quality as represented, and that she would send her son (Ira Johnson) and Gilliss to look at the timber at an early date. She did not, it seems, at that time, raise any question about the price or the estimate of the timber, or disclose to Paschall any information that had been furnished her by Gilliss or anyone as to the quantity of timber upon the land.

During the first week in September following, Mrs. Johnson sent her son and Gilliss down to look at the property, and after spending a day or two upon it Ira Johnson returned to Baltimore, and Paschall, who had met Johnson and Gilliss in South Carolina, went to Atlanta, Ga. Paschall states that he first told Gilliss of his intention to go to Baltimore the next week to close the transaction with the Johnsons, and requested Gilliss to accompany him for that purpose; that Gilliss notified him (Paschall) that he did not wish to have anything to do with the transaction and was through with it, and that Gilliss got out of reach and kept out until he (Paschall) went to Baltimore; but this statement was flatly contradicted by the plaintiff, Gilliss. At all events, Paschall and Gresham went to Baltimore on September 8, 1909, for the purpose of closing up the transaction at the price they had named, $200,000, as they (according to their version of what had transpired) understood that the quality of the timber had shown up all right, but, as they claim, were there (in the absence of the plaintiff, Gilliss) told by the Johnsons that they would only give $180,000 for the timber, for the reason that Gilliss had advised them that there were only from 85,000,000 to 90,000,000 feet of timber on the property, and that $2 per 1,000 feet was the best price that could be given by them for that timber, and that they would not give any more because of said estimate. Paschall & Gresham then refused to sell at the price offered by the Johnsons, and returned to their hotel and endeavored (as they say) to get into communication with Gilliss over the long-distance telephone, to notify him of the situation and that he had not produced a purchaser according to his contract, but found that Gilliss was out of Norfolk and could not be reached. That night, however, Paschall & Gresham, still in the absence of and without communication with Gilliss, traded said property to the Johnsons at a valuation of $180,000, receiving from them a satisfactory settlement of the purchase price agreed upon. Gilliss knew nothing of the price for which the property was actually sold until the sale had been consummated, and Paschall wrote him as to what had occurred and claimed that he was entitled to no commission on the sale. Gilliss also flatly denies that he made the statements and estimate which Paschall claims that Mrs. Johnson used in inducing the defendants to take a less price for the property than that originally fixed upon it by them.

There is no room to question that the plaintiff, Gilliss, pursuant to his contract with the defendants, was the "efficient" or "procuring" cause of the consummated sale of the property to the Johnsons—indeed, there is practically no conflicting testimony on this point; and the contention that the plaintiff abandoned his employment to find a purchaser of the property before the sale thereof was consummated by the defendants is equally groundless.

The contention of the defendants is that the letter of August 14, 1909, evidences the contract between them and the plaintiff, and provides, in effect, that the plaintiff was to receive no commission or compensation, even though the property was actually sold, because the sale was not at the price of $200,000, but at the price of $180,000. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that, as he procured the purchasers of the property, ready, and willing to purchase, and the defendants accepted said purchasers and concluded a sale of the property to them, though at a less price than $200,000, he, the plaintiff, is entitled to the stipulated commission of 5 per cent. on the price agreed upon and received by the defendants from said sale.

[1] The question as to bad faith on the part of the plaintiff, urged by the defendants, was one of fact, fairly to be submitted to the jury, which was done, and was determined by the jury adversely to the defendants' contention, and need not be here further considered.

[2] The first assignment of error by the defendants is to the refusal of the court to exclude from the jury all evidence introduced by the plaintiff to prove a claim under the common counts, or quantum meruit, in his declaration.

We do not see any merit in this assignment of error. The action is to recover compensation earned and due for services that had been rendered, and the declaration was so framed, and in accordance with a common practice in such cases, as to support a recovery in favor of the plaintiff for the price and value of the work he had done, either upon the theory that the money was due on an express contract or on an implied contract. Brown & Rives v. Ralston, etc., 36 Va. 532; 4 Minor (3d Ed.) 695, 699, 700.

Moreover, the express contract alleged provided for a commission of 5 per cent., and the verdict and judgment below was for the amount of 5 per cent. of the price—$180,000—at which the property was sold, and every witness testifying as to the value of the plaintiff's services stated that the value of the services was at least equal to the amount at which the jury fixed it. None put it at less, and some put it higher.

In Smith v. Sharp, 162 Ala. 433, 50 South. 381, 136 Am. St. Rep. 52, a case very similar to the case at bar, the contract of employment was written and under seal, giving the broker or agent the exclusive right to sell the land within a given time at a fixed price per acre, and fixed the pay of the agent for making the sale. The agent, as in this case, introduced to the owners of the land a prospective purchaser, and the owners, conducting the negotiations for themselves, concluded a sale of the land to the said purchaser for a less consideration than that fixed in the agreement with the agent authorized to sell the land; and the court, after determining that Smith, the agent, upon the facts of the case, was entitled to some compensation, held that the written contract of employment was competent evidence to be introduced "as a guide for the jury in arriving at what is reasonable compensation." In other words, the court held that while the agent, Smith, was not entitled to recover compensation by reason of his express employment in writing by the owners of the property, he was entitled to recover, upon a quantum meruit, the value of his services, and that the express contract was competent evidence to be considered by the jury, along with all other evidence, as a guide in arriving at what was reasonable compensation for services of the kind rendered, and as an indication of what the parties considered would be reasonable. Smith v. Packard, 94 Va. 733, 27 S. E. 586, and authorities cited.

[3] On September 9, 1909, Paschall wrote the plaintiff, Gilliss, that the "Lofton tract" had been sold, but he (Gilliss) would receive no commission. If, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to a commission on said sale at all, a right of action therefor accrued to him when defendants denied that right, and we are unable to see any force whatever in the defendants' contention that it was error to allow the plaintiff interest on the amount of the jury's verdict in his favor from September 10, 1909, instead of, if at all, from a later date.

[4] We do not deem it necessary to consider, seriatim, the instructions to the jury given by the trial court (which will be set out with the official report of this opinion), or those refused. The six instructions asked by the plaintiff, and given, and the one asked by the defendants, amended, and given, correctly propounded the law applicable to the facts which the evidence in the case tended to prove, and submitted fully and fairly each and every phase thereof to the jury. They proceed upon the theory that as a matter of law, where an agent contracts to furnish a purchaser for lands at a stipulated price, and such agent does furnish a purchaser, whom the owner accepts, and, in the negotiation of the transaction, the owner agrees upon and accepts a different price from that at which the agent was instructed to sell, still such agent would be entitled to his commission, or to such compensation for his services as would be reasonable, fair, and just under all the facts and circumstances of the case.

The cases cited for the defendants, seemingly supporting the converse of the proposition, Crockett v. Grayson, 98 Va. 357, 36 S. E. 477, citing McGarock v. Woodlief, 20 How. 221, 15 L. Ed. 884, belong to the class of cases in which no sale was made, cases in which the broker secured an offer of a price or on terms other than his employment stipulated, which offer his employer rejected, and in which cases the court, in denying the right of the broker to compensation, said that the broker was required to produce a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to purchase at the price and on the terms prescribed by the principal. In the case here, the property was actually sold, conveyed, and paid for.

The distinction between the authorities supporting the propositions of law propounded by the court's instructions and those relied on by the defendants is very clearly stated in Coleman v. Meade (Ky.) 13 Bush, 358, as follows: "The true doctrine we take to be this: The broker undertakes to furnish a purchaser, and is bound to act in good faith in presenting a person as such, and when one is presented the employer is not bound to accept him or to pay the commission, unless he is ready and able to perform the contract on his part according to the terms proposed; but if the principal accepts him, either upon the terms previously proposed, or upon modified terms then agreed upon, and a valid contract is entered into between the principal and the person presented by the broker, the commission is earned. But if, as was the case in McGavock v. Woodlief, 20 How. 221, 15 L. Ed. 884, the principal rejects the purchaser, and the broker claims his commission, he must show, not only that the person furnished was willing to accept the offer precisely as made, but, in addition, that he was an eligible purchaser, and such as the principal was bound, as between himself and the broker, to accept."

In Arents v. Casselman, 110 Va. 509, 66 S. E. 820, Thos. F. Jeffress, agent for the defendant, George Arents, requested in writing the real estate firm of Casselman & Co., composed of J. R. Hockaday and Lawrence Casselman, to "please list for sale" the farm of the defendant, Arents, in Henrico county, Va., known as "Bloomingdale," containing 280 acres, "for $50,000." After describing the farm, the said writing continued: "My price is fifty thousand dollars ($50,000). $20,000 of said amount I want in cash, and the balance on one and two years. Now, if this property is sold by you or through your instrumentality, I will pay you three (3) per cent. commission, to be taken out of the cash payment." The Bloomingdale farm was sold by Arents' agent to a purchaser procured through the instrumentality of Casselman, for $30,000 instead of $50,000, and the cash payment was only $5,000, instead of $20,000. After the firm of Casselman & Co. was authorized, as stated, to find a purchaser for Bloomingdale, and before said sale thereof was made, J. R. Hockaday withdrew from said firm, and Casselman continued business under the same firm name; so that, in the suit of Casselman against Arents to recover his commission on said sale, one of the questions involved was whether said contract, originally made with the firm of Casselman & Co., as then constituted, continued in force after Hockaday's retirement and became a contract between the new firm and the defendant, Arents; but with that question we have no concern here, except in so far as the statement of the fact will serve to make more intelligible the instruction in the case to which we will now advert.

In dealing with instruction No. 1, given to the jury in that case for the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant, this court said it was "free from reasonable objection." It told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the aforesaid contract with Hockaday, Casselman & Co. was continued in force, so as to become a contract with the new firm aforesaid, "and that thereby the plaintiffs were authorized to sell said farm under the contract with Hockaday, Casselman & Co., you must find for the plaintiffs, if you believe from the evidence they sold or were instrumental in selling to W. R. Smith, as a purchaser of said farm, and that he actually purchased the same, even though you believe from the evidence the said Jeffress closed with said purchaser at the reduced price of $30,000."

In that case the verdict and judgment were for 3 per cent. commissions in favor of the plaintiff on $30,000, the amount for which Bloomingdale farm was actually sold, which judgment this court affirmed.

The same principle is recognized and approved in Ice v. Maxwell, 61 W. Va. 9, 55 S. E. 899, cited in Arents v. Casselman with approval. The material facts in the case were very similar to facts in this case, and the opinion of the court discusses fully the principles of law applicable to the facts, citing a great number of authorities, and affirms the judgment of the trial court in favor of the broker or agent for the commission claimed by him on the amount of the sale of the property as actually made by the owner.

In Hovey v. Aaron, 183 Mo. App. 573, 113 S. W. 718, the defendant sought to maintain the principle of law contended for by the defendants in this case, and in holding that instructions sanctioning the principle were erroneous, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to a recovery, the opinion of the court said: "The principle of law declared in all these instructions is not supported either upon reason or the weight of authority. * * * On the hypothesis of fact that Braley was not willing to buy at the price plaintiffs were authorized to offer, but for $1,000 less, it would result in the grossest injustice should we say, as was said in the instructions under consideration, that such fact would preclude a recovery by the plaintiffs. If defendant, while plaintiffs' authority to sell stood unrevoked, chose to sell the property, either in person or through another agent, to a customer procured by the efforts of plaintiffs, for a less price than that which plaintiffs were authorized to offer, that was his privilege; but he will not be permitted to reap the fruits of plaintiffs' labor, and then deny them their just reward." See, also, Glade v. Mining Co., 129 Mo. App. 443, 107 S. W. 1002; Hogan v. Slade, 98 Mo. App. 44, 71 S. W. 1104, and cases cited; Kock v. Emmerling, 22 How. 72, 16 L. Ed. 292; Carnes v. Finigan, 198 Mass. 128, 84 N. E. 324; Dexter v. Campbell, 137 Mass. 198; Henry v. Stewart, 185 Ill. 448, 57 N. E. 190; Hafner v. Harron, 165 Ill. 242, 46 N. E. 211, and cases cited; Hubachek v. Hazzard, 83 Minn. 437, 86 N. W. 426.

In Lawson v. Black, etc., Co., 53 Wash. 614, 102 Pac. 759, the court said: "It is not disputed that the appellant actually agreed to pay 5 per cent. on $1,500,000 in the event of a sale at that price. When it afterwards voluntarily reduced the selling price, the respondents were entitled to a ratable commission on such reduced price. In Martin v. Silliman, 53 N. Y. 615, the second syllabus reads as follows: 'Where a broker, who who is employed to sell property at a given price and for an agreed commission, has opened a negotiation with a purchaser, and the principal, without terminating the agency or the negotiations so commenced, takes it into his own hands and concludes a sale for a less sum than the price fixed, the broker is entitled, at least, to a ratable proportion of the agreed commission.'"

The following cases are also in point: Morris v. Francis, 75 Kan. 580, 89 Pac. 901; Jones v. Adler, 34 Md. 440; Pierce v. Nichols, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 110 S. W. 206; Hoadley v. Savings Bank, 71 Conn. 640, 42 Atl. 667; Stewart v. Mather, 32 Wis. 344; Welch v. Young (Iowa) 79 N. W. 59; Levy v. Wolf, 2 Cal. App. 491, 84 Pac. 313; Keys v. Johnson, 68 Pa. 42.

In the last-named case, the court, after showing, by the great weight of authority, the right of the broker or agent to the compensation he claimed, upon a state of facts similar to those in the case we have under consideration, said in its opinion, inter alia: "If 'vendors were permitted,' said Woodruff, J., 'to employ brokers to look up purchasers, and call the attention of buyers to property which they desired to sell, limiting them as to terms of sale, and then, when such purchasers were negotiating, take the matter in their own hands, avail themselves of the labor, services, and expenses of the broker in bringing the property into market, and accomplish a sale by an abatement in the price, and yet refuse to pay the broker anything, the business of a broker would not be worth pursuing. Gross injustice would be done. Every unfair and illiberal vendor would limit his property at a price slightly above the market, and make use of the broker to bring it into notice, and then make his own terms with the buyers, who were in reality procured by the efforts of the agent.'"

The case of Long v. Flory & Garber, 72 S. E. 723, recently decided by this court, was very different from the case we now have in hand. In the former case the contract between the owner and the agent fixed a minimum price at which the property was to be sold, and the agent failed to find a purchaser or to effect a sale at the stipulated price. Moreover, there was no evidence tending to prove that the principal had wrongfully prevented the agent from making a sale at such price, or had waived the strict performance of the contract.

Other questions raised in the petition for this writ of error, and argued, we have not discussed, because deemed immaterial or wholly without merit.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that as the trial court fully, fairly, and correctly instructed the jury as to the law upon every phase thereof presented in the pleadings and evidence, it did not err in refusing the instructions asked for by the defendants, which were rejected, and that the evidence was ample to sustain the jury's verdict. Therefore the judgment upon the verdict is affirmed.

Affirmed.

GRAY v. ATLANTIC TRUST & DEPOSIT CO., Inc., et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 37*)—PLEADING—BILL.

A bill to set aside a trust deed or chattel mortgage on the ground that it was invalid and fraudulent per se need not allege facts showing a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor or grantee, the gravamen being that the mortgage was not sufficient as a matter of law, and so intentional or actual fraud is unnecessary to its invalidity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 66-80; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 9*)—INVALIDITY—ACTUAL FRAUD.

Actual or intentional fraud need not be imputed to the grantee, the trustee, or any one else concerned, to hold a mortgage or deed of trust of personal property fraudulent in law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 10-14; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 188*)—INVALIDITY—FRAUD AS A MATTER OF LAW.

Where a deed of trust given on a stock of china, which was an exhibit at a fair building, to secure a note, recited that the party of the first part granted unto the trustee the stock of china, but that the grantor should remain in quiet possession and take the profits thereof to his own use until default should be made in the payment of the note, it was fraudulent in law and void, because giving the grantor and debtor a means to defraud his other creditors, and so it could not be enforced by the beneficiary against other creditors of the grantor.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Bill by Earl S. Gray, as assignee, against the Atlantic Trust & Deposit Company, Incorporated, and another. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Morris, Garnett & Cotten, for appellant. Jeffries, Wolcott, Wolcott & Lankford, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. The controlling question to be decided in this case is whether or not the deed of trust, validity of which is attacked by appellant, is fraudulent per se.

During the year 1907 an exposition, known as the Jamestown Ter-Centennial Exposition, was held in or near the city of Norfolk, Va., and incident to the operation of the said exposition one C. M. Rosenthal, a nonresident of the state, came to Norfolk and leased a certain space in one of the buildings of the Exposition Company, for the purpose of conducting therein what was termed the "Austrian Exhibit." Pursuant to his purpose, Rosenthal purchased of several business concerns of New York City large quantities of crockery, china, glassware, and other fancy articles made of china and glass, such purchases being made by Rosenthal on credit, and among them a large bill of goods from the firm of Lazarus, Rosenfeld & Leyman, the assignors of appellant, Gray, amounting to $1,639.32, which sum Rosenthal neglected to pay.

With the stock of china, glassware, and fancy goods, etc., acquired by Rosenthal to make up his "Austrian Exhibit," he proceeded to establish an imposing place of business in the building of the Exposition Company, occupying the space in the building set apart to him, employing a force of clerks, and proceeded to dispose of his supply of goods, etc., as is usually done in the conduct of a retail store or other mercantile business, replacing the articles sold with others bought from time to time.

About 60 days after the opening of the Exposition, and apparently before his said business could have become successful, Rosenthal borrowed $1,000 from appellee, the Atlantic Trust & Deposit Company, executing his negotiable note therefor, payable 60 days after date, and to secure its payment, and of "any note or notes given in curtail or renewal of same," he conveyed his stock of china, glassware, etc., to Floyd Hughes, trustee; the language of the deed, so far as pertinent to the issue here, being as follows:

"The said party of the first part doth grant unto the said trustee the following property, to wit: All that certain exhibit stock of china, glassware, pottery, and similar articles, now situate, lying, and being in that section of the Liberal Arts and Manufactures Building of the Jamestown Ter-Centennial Exposition, in the county of Norfolk, in the state of Virginia, assigned by the governors of said Exposition Company to the said Charles M. Rosenthal in said building at said Exposition, including all articles as are now in said exhibit, or that may be hereafter placed there during said Exposition. * * * And upon the further trust that the said grantor shall remain in quiet possession of the above granted and described property, and take the profits thereof to his own use, until default is made in the payment of the debt aforesaid," etc.

After this trust deed was executed, Rosenthal continued to conduct his business as before, selling by himself and with the assistance of his clerks the articles going to make up his said exhibit, replacing some, at least, of the articles sold with others purchased, and in the course usually pursued in the ordinary conduct of any retail business. In November, 1907, before the close of the Exposition, Rosenthal, who had been unsuccessful in his venture, absconded from the state, and Lazarus, Rosenfeld & Leyman proceeded to bring suit and to obtain an attachment on his assets, consisting only of his said exhibit, which had been greatly reduced in quantity and value. Other creditors of Rosenthal then proceeded to file an involuntary petition in bankruptcy against him, but these proceedings were dismissed and need not be further referred to.

Lazarus, Rosenfeld & Leyman obtained final judgment on their attachment, which judgment they assigned to the appellant, Gray, who thereupon instituted this suit in equity for the collection of his said judgment, and to that end to have set aside as void in law the said deed of trust to Floyd Hughes, trustee.

Prior to the filing of the bill in this cause the assets of Rosenthal were, by consent of parties interested, disposed of, and the net proceeds of their sale, amounting to $1,625.86 deposited in the National Bank of Commerce, in Norfolk city, to await a final adjudication of the rights of the parties interested therein. The court below denied the prayer of appellant's bill, and dismissed the same, and from the decree carrying out said ruling this appeal was taken.

[1, 2] It is the contention of appellees that as "there is no allegation of fraudulent intent made in the bill, and no facts set out to show this deed operates as a fraud upon the creditors of said Rosenthal," the bill is insufficient to support the relief prayed, and, therefore, no other decree in the cause than that complained of could have been entered.

This contention proceeds, and erroneously, as we view the case, upon the theory that, as the bill does not allege fraudulent intent, no relief could be granted upon it, although the deed itself showed upon its face that the powers reserved to the grantor over the property conveyed were adequate to defeat its avowed purposes.

The gravamen of the averments in the bill is, not that the deed was made with fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor, with knowledge on the part of the trustee or beneficiary of such fraudulent intent, and was therefore void as to other creditors of the grantor, but that the deed, upon its face, is fraudulent and void per se. The issue presented is not one of fact, wherein all the facts requisite to constitute the fraud charged must be set out in the bill and proved, but a question of law, to be determined by judicial construction of the deed itself, which is exhibited with the bill as a part thereof.

To hold a mortgage or deed of trust fraudulent in law, it is not necessary to impute actual or intentional fraud to the grantor, the trustee, or, indeed, to any one concerned. Catt, Trustee, v. Knabe & Co., 93 Va. 736, 26 S. E. 246.

[3] The case made by the bill in this cause must stand or fall by that line of cases to which belong Hughes, Effinger & Co. v. Eppling, 93 Va. 424, 25 S. E. 105 and Catt, Trustee, v. Knabe & Co., supra, where the issue decided was whether or not the powers over the property reserved to the grantor in the conveyance were incompatible with the avowed purposes of the trust and adequate to the defeat thereof. It is true that in the first named of these cases the grantor was in the business of a retail merchant; but the principle of law upheld was that where a deed of trust, executed to secure the payment of a debt, or to indemnify the surety of the principal debtor, reserves to the grantor the right to remain in the possession and enjoyment of the property conveyed until default is made in the payment of the debt secured, where such a reservation is inconsistent with the purposes of the conveyance and adequate to defeat them, such a deed is fraudulent per se.

The opinion by Buchanan, J., after advertent to the fact that there was not only no provision in the deed that the grantor was to account to the trustees for the proceeds of sales made by him while in possession of the trust property, but no recognition that such sales were to be for their benefit, and the terms of the trust excluded any such idea, and necessarily implied that he had the right to dispose of the goods in his business for his own benefit, and to continue to do so as long as the negotiable notes intended to be secured could be renewed, and the party secured was content not to require a sale, says: "The law does not authorize such agreements. A creditor, in securing himself, must be careful that the contract by which he is secured does not contain provisions which do not benefit him, but which benefit the debtor, and were so intended, and are prejudicial to other creditors. It does not allow the creditor to make use of his own debt for any other purpose than his own indemnity. When he goes beyond this, and puts into the contract provisions which have the effect of shielding his debtor, by allowing him to dispose of the trust subject for his own purposes, and by which other creditors are hindered and delayed in the collection of their debts, the contract cannot be upheld. The power retained was incompatible with the avowed purpose of the grantor to furnish indemnity to his creditor and indorser, and is fully adequate to the defeat of the provision of the deed of trust"—citing Lang v. Lee, 24 Va. 410, and Addington v. Etheridge, 53 Va. 436, where it was held that similar reservations of power and control over the trust subject to the grantor, renders his conveyance fraudulent per se and void as to other creditors. Speaking of the two cases cited, Judge Buchanan further said: "The doctrine laid down in those cases has been uniformly recognized and followed by this court"—citing a large number of the cases referred to.

In Catt, Trustee, v. Knabe & Co., supra, the principle is fully recognized and followed, and because the deed in that case, conveying to a trustee real and personal property, consisting of buildings and furniture and appliances suitable for the conduct of a school, authorized the trustee to conduct a school for a period of 18 months, and to that end to employ all necessary tutors and other agents, and to pay them out of the trust fund, preferring the salaries of such tutors and agents and the running expenses of the school to the creditors secured, it was considered that such a reservation of power and control over the trust subject was incompatible with the purposes of the conveyance and adequate to defeat its purposes, and the conveyance was held to be fraudulent per se.

The dissent in that case by Judges Riely and Buchanan was not because they were of opinion that the principle of law considered and approved did not apply in that class of cases, but because, in their opinion, the deed did not expressly charge the corpus with the debts that might be incurred by the trustee in continuing the school, and were doubtful as to whether the law would necessarily imply the charge from the language of the deed.

Among the cases relied on by appellees here is Norris v. Lake, 89 Va. 516, 16 S. E. 663. In that case the court does say that fraud in such a case is never presumed, unless the terms of the instrument attacked preclude any other inference, and that fraud is not an irresistible inference from a provision in a deed of trust postponing a sale for a reasonable length of time and reserving the use of the property to the grantor in the meantime; but in the opinion by Lewis, P., stress is laid upon the fact that the deed in question did not reserve to the grantor, as in Lang v. Lee and other cases, power of sale, or any other power incompatible with the avowed purposes of the trust.

In Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 72 Va. 580, the opinion by Burks, J., quotes from Dance v. Seaman, 52 Va. 778, that "the presumption of law is in favor of honesty, and the court cannot presume fraud, unless the terms of the instrument preclude any other inference"; but the opinion also says: "There is no doubt that the provisions of a mortgage or deed of trust may be of such a character as of themselves to furnish evidence sufficient to justify the inference of fraudulent intent. Such is the case where the grantor reserves a power over the conveyed property incompatible with the avowed purposes of the trust, adequate to the defeat thereof." The grantor, John W. Brockenbrough, executed the three deeds under consideration in that case, covering chiefly real estate, but in one of them, the one deemed of the most importance, in addition to the large amount of real estate described therein, certain personal property was conveyed, consisting for the most part of crops and stock of horses, mules, and cattle. There was nothing in the main deed to show any power whatever in the grantor to dispose of the subject-matter, and, while he was allowed to remain in possession of the real estate, together with the farming implements, horses, mules, and cattle that constituted the complement of the farm, and to have the use thereof, the language of the conveyance reserving in the grantor possession and use of the property admitted of no construction that authorized or could have resulted in the sale of the corpus itself, and the opinion of the court very plainly points out that the only effect of the reservations that could possibly have accrued to the benefit of the grantor was a mere postponement of the sale of the property.

The wise policy of the law and the distinction it makes between that class of cases in which the mortgage or deed of trust reserves to the grantor power over the property conveyed incompatible with the avowed purposes of the trust, adequate to the defeat thereof, and those cases in which the effect of the reservations that could only accrue to the grantor was a mere postponement of the sale of the property, the use and control of it until default in the payment of the debt secured, and reservations of like import, is clearly pointed out in Catt, Trustee, v. Knabe & Co., supra. In that case the effect of the court's ruling is that a deed of trust on personal property, regardless of whether or not it is a shifting stock of merchandise, containing reservations in favor of the grantor, or in favor of the trustee charged with the duty of executing the trust, which are sufficient to defeat the purposes of the trust, renders the deed void as to the creditors of the grantor.

In the case now in judgment the reservation in the deed in favor of the grantor is that he shall remain "in quiet and peaceable possession of the above granted and described property and take the profits thereof to his own use until default is made in the payment of the debt aforesaid," etc.; while the very nature of the property conveyed—"stock of china, glassware, and similar articles now situate * * * constituting the exhibit of the said Charles M. Rosenthal in said building at said Exposition"—would exclude any idea of profits to inure to the grantor other than such as he might realize from a sale or sales of the property, which was the construction put upon the reservation and actually pursued by the grantor. It will not do for the beneficiary in the deed to say that the sales made by the grantor were without its knowledge, and were made contrary to an agreement between him and the trustee, or the beneficiary in the deed. The question is: Did the deed reserve to the grantor the power to make the sales, and thereby defeat the purposes of the deed? In other words, were the agreements or conditions contained in the deed of trust of such a character that, if carried out, they would be sufficient to defeat the purposes of the deed, independent of what the intention of the parties might have been by reason of some extrinsic agreement?

As we view the language of the deed, in the light of the authorities to which we have adverted, such powers and control of the property conveyed were reserved to the grantor therein as were adequate to defeat the avowed purpose of the trust, and, therefore, the deed is fraudulent per se.

There is no merit in the final contention of appellees that because the property conveyed in the trust deed was "an exhibit," and not a stock of merchandise, the decisions of this and other courts, relied on by appellant in support of his contention that the deed is null and void because fraudulent in law upon its face, do not apply. The deed calls the property conveyed both an exhibit and a stock of goods, and, whether it be called the one or the other, the grantor reserved to himself absolute control over the goods and the power to sell and dispose of them, which reservations were adequate to defeat the very purposes of the deed, and rendered it fraudulent per se.

It follows that we are of opinion that the deed of trust in question was fraudulent per se, and should have been declared null and void by the trial court, as to appellant and other creditors of the grantor who established their debts in the cause. Therefore the decree appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded in in accordance with this opinion.

HUGHES v. BURWELL.

1. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 34*)—CONTRACT—EXECUTION.

Where a contract for the sale of an account against an insolvent firm by plaintiff to defendant was fully arranged, and the details agreed on, so that nothing remained to be done, except to have the account assigned, the fact that the assignment was not made or the contract reduced to writing, because defendant elected to withdraw before the assignment had been prepared, did not indicate that the contract was incomplete, nor preclude plaintiff from suing for breach thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-71; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

2. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 34*)—CONTRACT—BREACH—CONSTRUCTION.

In an action for breach of a contract to take an assignment of an account against an insolvent, a request to charge that if there was an agreement by defendant to buy plaintiff's claim against the insolvent, with the further understanding that the agreement should be reduced to writing, and the parties failed to reduce it to writing, then the agreement was not perfected, and the jury must find for defendant, was erroneous, and properly refused, as charging that, although there might have been a completed contract, yet if there was an understanding that it should be expressed in writing, and the parties failed to do so, plaintiff could not recover; there being no evidence that it was agreed that the contract should not be final until reduced to writing.

Error to Corporation Court of Danville.

Action by M. P. Burwell against John E. Hughes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Julian Meade, for plaintiff in error. William Leigh and Harris & Harris, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. The defendant in error, M. P. Burwell, brought this action of assumpsit and recovered a judgment in the corporation court of the city of Danville against the plaintiff in error, John E. Hughes, for the sum of $2,570.57, which the plaintiff alleged that the defendant agreed to pay him for an open account which the plaintiff held and owned against Swain & Wyllie, a partnership which had but recently made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors.

We are asked to review and reverse this judgment because of error of the court in failing properly to instruct the jury, and in refusing to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence.

It appears that Swain & Wyllie were dealers in leaf tobacco at Danville, Va., while the plaintiff, Burwell, was engaged in a like business at Warrenton, N. C., and in April, 1910, Burwell sold to Swain & Wyllie a certain lot of tobacco, estimated at 41,000 pounds, at a certain price, which tobacco was shipped to the purchasers on or about June 16, 1910, and was duly received by them. There was no question as to the tobacco being received by Swain & Wyllie; but on July 29, 1910, they addressed a letter to Burwell, in which they expressed regret at being unable to pay for the tobacco, and gave excuses for not doing so, and added, "We are willing to pay you interest on your invoice for the delay," and further added, "In reweighing the tare, we notice that your hhd's. weigh from 10 to 13 lbs. heavier than you have them, which we will deduct." On August 25, 1910, Swain & Wyllie paid Burwell by check on account the sum of $2,000, leaving a balance due of $5,035.12, exclusive of interest. Some time in September, 1910, the firm of Swain & Wyllie failed in business and made an assignment, the date of which does not appear in the record, and the debt then due to Burwell from that firm was $5,035.12, with interest.

On the 26th day of September, 1910, after the assignment had been made by Swain & Wyllie, Burwell came from his home in Warrenton, N. C., to Danville to see after the debt due him by this firm, arriving in Danville at an early hour the following morning. After being in Danville several hours, he came upon the defendant, Hughes, and a conversation between them in regard to his debt against Swain & Wyllie took place at the Hotel Burton. At this conversation Burwell discussed with Hughes the subject of the failure of Swain & Wyllie, and in the conversation Hughes told Burwell that he had an account against that firm. Then followed a discussion between Burwell and Hughes about the assets of Swain & Wyllie, and whether the assets were sufficient to pay their indebtedness; Hughes expressing the opinion that they would eventually pay out in full, or nearly so. Burwell, having little idea of what the insolvent firm would pay, said that he would be satisfied to accept 60 cents on the dollar of his account; whereupon Hughes asked Burwell if he would take 50 cents on the dollar for his claim, and, upon being asked by Burwell if he wanted to pay him that price, Hughes said: "Yes; I will give you that." Whereupon Burwell asked Hughes to give him until 5 o'clock to consider the matter, and to decide whether or not he would accept the offer, to which Hughes agreed. Between that time and 5 o'clock, Burwell went to see a number of people. Among the number was Mr. Leigh, at his law office, and he discussed particularly with Mr. Leigh the offer which Hughes had made him for his claim against Swain & Wylie; but, as Mr. Leigh was not sufficiently posted to advise him, he went to see others, with like results. He went again to see Mr. Leigh, when Mr. Leigh advised him to accept Hughes' offer, and thereupon Burwell went to see Hughes, reaching his office just before 5 o'clock; Hughes having said that he would be at his office at that hour and invited Burwell to see him there. Upon reaching Hughes' office, Burwell told Hughes that he had decided to accept his offer of 50 cents on the dollar of his account against Swain & Wylie, to which Hughes replied, "All right." Burwell then showed Hughes his account against Swain & Wylie. He also showed him a contract, evidenced by a letter, showing that the tobacco he had sold Swain & Wylie was sold to be paid for in cash, and shipment was to be made f. o. b. Warrenton, N. C., and then showed Hughes another letter from Swain & Wylie, saying that they could not pay cash, but that they would allow him interest until they could pay it. Hughes then stated that that was all right, and expressed himself as finding it satisfactory, whereupon Burwell proposed to transfer the account to Hughes, and Hughes said: "Burwell, the trade is made. I have just started for a horseback ride. If you are not in a hurry, we will make the transfer of the account in the morning. I want to go out horseback riding." Burwell then told Hughes that he wanted to leave town on the early morning train, and asked, if convenient, that the transfer be made that evening, to which Hughes replied that, if Burwell would go up to Jones' drug store, on Main street, he (Hughes) would meet him there. Burwell was walking, while Hughes had his horse at his office. Upon Burwell arriving at the drug store, he had to wait some little while for Hughes; but Hughes came and said that his lawyer had told him that he did not think much of the trade, to which Burwell replied, "Mr. Hughes, the trade is already made; just a question of transferring the account;" to which Hughes replied, "All right, I am going to stand up to the trade, and we will go up and have the account transferred." They then went up into an office, and Hughes introduced Burwell to Mr. Meade, who he said was an attorney, and requested Mr. Meade to make the transfer of the account; and Hughes then turned to Burwell and said, "Burwell, if you will excuse me I will finish my horseback ride; I will meet you at supper with the bill and transfer, and I will settle up with you." Burwell told him that it would not take but a few minutes. Hughes said he could not stay longer at that time, as it would knock him out of his ride, as it was getting late, whereupon Burwell said, "All right, we will meet at supper and fix it up." Mr. Meade started to write the transfer on Burwell's account against Swain & Wylie; but there was some little interruption, and it turned out when the transfer was written that it did not have the interest calculated on the account, as had been previously agreed upon, and Burwell called Mr. Meade's attention to that, to which Mr. Meade replied that he did not understand from Mr. Hughes that interest was to be added. Upon Burwell's insisting that that was the understanding between him and Hughes, the attorney made the calculation and entered it on the account, and read the account over to Burwell, whereupon Burwell told Mr. Meade that it was satisfactory to him, except that he did not think Mr. Hughes wanted it to show what it cost him, and the assignment did go on to show that it was 50 cents on the dollar. Some further conversation took place between the attorney and Burwell, which need not be related, and the matter of completing the transfer was delayed until the following morning.

Burwell and Hughes met according to appointment at the hotel about supper time, when Burwell told Hughes that Mr. Meade did not understand that interest was to be added to the account, and that he was to receive 50 cents on the dollar of interest, to which Hughes replied, "Certainly, I intended to include that;" and, upon being told by Burwell that the transfer showed the amount he was to pay for the account, Hughes said he did not intend it to show that amount. There was no disagreement as to the terms of the agreement between Burwell and Hughes at that time, and they then agreed to meet at Mr. Meade's office at 8 o'clock the following morning to carry out the contract they had made by having a proper assignment of the account to Hughes.

The following morning Burwell met Hughes at the Hotel Burton, when Hughes asked him to let him off with the trade they had made the night before, stating that he had found out that the assignment of Swain & Wylie was "rotten"; but Burwell declined to do so, and insisted on Hughes complying with his contract, whereupon Hughes went off and consulted an attorney, and came back and stated that he was not bound to stand up to the trade, and that he was going to be released, and then and there refused to carry out the contract.

It seems very clear from the evidence that all matters of detail were discussed between Burwell and Hughes, and that they finally agreed upon the sale by Burwell and the purchase by Hughes of Burwell's claim against Swain & Wylie. Burwell stipulated that interest was to be added; Hughes agreed to it. The account was to be transferred without recourse; Hughes agreed to it. Subsequently Hughes stipulated that Burwell should guarantee the correctness of the account, and to this Burwell agreed, and declared himself ready to do so. The question of interest, and the question as to the correctness of the account, had all been settled and agreed to before Hughes attempted to repudiate his agreement on the morning of September 28, 1910.

[1] There is practically no controversy as to what took place between Burwell and Hughes with respect to the contract they entered into, which was in all respects complete, leaving nothing to be done except to have it properly transferred from Burwell to Hughes—that is, as Hughes stated, “transferred satisfactorily and legally.”

After the evidence had gone to the jury, the court gave, at the request of the plaintiff and without objection on the part of the defendant, the following instruction:

“The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this cause that the late firm of Swain & Wyllie, of Danville, Va., was on the 25th day of September, 1910, indebted to the plaintiff, M. P. Burwell, in the sum of $5,141.15, that upon the failure of the said Swain & Wyllie the said M. P. Burwell came to the city of Danville to look after his interest as one of the creditors of the said firm, that while so in Danville the plaintiff met with the said defendant, and that the matter of the failure of the said Swain & Wyllie was discussed between them, and that the defendant, Hughes, offered the said plaintiff, M. P. Burwell, 50 cents on the dollar for his said claim against the said firm of Swain & Wyllie, and that the offer of said Hughes so made was accepted by the said Burwell, and that the said Burwell was willing and offered to make proper assignment and transfer of said claim to said Hughes, that this made and constituted a binding contract and sale between them, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover of and from the said Hughes the sum of 50 per centum of his said debt and claim of $5,141.15 against said Swain & Wyllie, to wit, the sum of $2,570.57½, with interest thereon from the 27th day of September, 1910, and the jury should so find.”

Whereupon the defendant, by counsel, moved the court to give the jury three instructions, and the court gave the second of these, but refused to give the first and third.

Instruction No. 2, given, is as follows: “The court instructs the jury that in order for the offer of plaintiff to sell his claim against Swain & Wyllie, and the alleged acceptance of that offer by defendant, to constitute a binding contract, they must believe from the evidence that the said offer was completely accepted, in every particular, and that nothing remained for future determination or settlement between the parties to the alleged agreement; and if they do not believe from the evidence that the offer of plaintiff to sell his said claim was accepted by defendant completely and in every particular, with nothing left for future settlement or arrangement between the parties, then they must find for the defendant.”

[2] Defendant's instruction No. 1, refused, sought to have the jury told that if they believed from the evidence that there was an agreement between the parties to this suit whereby the defendant was to buy plaintiff's claim against Swain & Wyllie, with the further understanding that the terms of the agreement were to be expressed in writing, and said parties failed to reduce the terms of their said agreement to writing, then the agreement was not perfected, and they must find for the defendant. This instruction is plainly defective, in that it stated the proposition that, although there might have been a complete contract between Hughes and Burwell, yet if there was an understanding that the terms of the agreement were to be expressed in writing, and said parties failed to reduce the terms of their agreement to writing, then an agreement was not perfected, and the jury must find for the defendant. There was no evidence tending to show that the agreement between the parties was not to be final until reduced to writing; nor was there any evidence tending to show an agreement that the contract was not to be binding until reduced to writing. On the contrary, the evidence very plainly shows that nothing was to be drawn up in Mr. Meade's office but a suitable assignment of the account from Burwell to Hughes, pursuant to the contract between them previously entered into.

Defendant's instruction No. 3 is substantially the same as defendant's instruction No. 1, in that it sought to tell the jury that if they believed from the evidence that there was an agreement between the parties to this action, whereby the defendant was to buy plaintiff's claim against Swain & Wyllie, with the further understanding that the terms of the agreement were to be expressed in writing, and when they sought to express the terms of said agreement in writing they could not agree upon the terms to be inserted in said writing, then the agreement of purchase and sale was not complete. Again we say there was not evidence to justify the giving of this instruction. The assignment and delivery of the account was not the contract. It was only the act of delivery of the subject of the contract. It was not necessary, nor was it ever intended, that the assignment should embrace the contract, for the contract was distinct from the assignment, and both parties understood that in the usual course of business an account and a right to it was passed by an assignment on the account; but neither understood that the assignment was to set out all the terms of sale, binding Hughes to take and Burwell to sell the account, as all that had been agreed upon between the parties, and when they went to Mr. Meade's office the formal and usual assignment of the account was all that was to be done, except the payment of the money therefor by Hughes, or the giving of his note for it, which was a matter of accommodation to Hughes and which Burwell had agreed to.

The contract entered into between the parties contained all the essentials of a contract on the part of Burwell to sell his account against Swain & Wyllie to Hughes, and on the part of Hughes to buy the said account, at a price agreed upon. Benjamin on Sales (4th Am. Ed.) § 39.

The case of Lyman v. Robinson, 96 Mass. 242, cited by plaintiff in error, has no application to the facts of this case. That case was one in which there was a mistake as to what was offered and what was bought—that is, there was a mistake as to the subject-matter of the contract, which is by no means the case here. Nor does what is said in Clark on Contracts, p. 37, apply to the facts of this case.

In Sanders v. Pottlitzer, etc., Co., 144 N. Y. 209, 39 N. E. 75, 29 L. R. A. 431, 43 Am. St. Rep. 757, the principles applicable to a case like the one under consideration are discussed, and it was there held that a stipulation to reduce a valid written contract to some other form does not affect its validity, and the stipulation may not be used by either of the parties for the purpose of imposing upon the other additional burdens or obligations, or of evading the performance of any of the provisions of the contract. This rule applies where, by means of letters and telegrams exchanged between the parties, a clear and definite proposition, containing all the requirements of a completed contract, is made by one and accepted by the other, with an understanding that the agreement shall be expressed in a formal writing. "Where, therefore, in such a case, one of the parties refuses to execute the formal agreement, unless certain material conditions and provisions are inserted therein not contemplated or embraced in the correspondence, to which modification the other party declines to assent, the former is still bound by the contract as made by the correspondence." In other words, it was held in that case that, a valid and binding contract having been entered into between the parties, the obligation of the parties thereunder was not affected by the failure to execute the formal instrument, and that for the damages resulting from defendant's breach of the contract he was liable. See, also, Pratt v. Hudson River R. Co., 21 N. Y. 305.

We have adverted to enough of the evidence to show that we think that the jury were warranted in their finding of a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and there was no error in the judgment of the trial court refusing to set aside that verdict. Therefore the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

LOYD'S EXECUTORIAL TRUSTEES v. CITY OF LYNCHBURG.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. TAXATION (§ 254*)—INTANGIBLE PROPERTY—WHERE TAXABLE.

Generally intangible property has no situs of its own for taxation, and is therefore assessable only at the owner's domicile.

2. TAXATION (§ 275*)—CORPORATIONS—DOMICILE.

Generally a corporation, for the purposes of taxation, has its domicile where its principal office is located.

3. TAXATION (§ 275*)—CORPORATIONS—DOMICILE—CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION.

A recital in a certificate of incorporation that the corporation's principal office is at a particular place is conclusive as affecting the right to tax stocks, bonds, etc., in another city, though the principal office be fixed at a place other than where the corporation's principal business is done, for the purpose of getting a lower rate of taxation.

Error to Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Application by Lloyd's Executorial Trustees against the City of Lynchburg for relief from taxes. Judgment dismissing the application, and petitioners bring error. Reversed.

Kirkpatrick & Howard and J. Irby Hurt, for plaintiffs in error. Robert D. Yancey, Wilson & Manson, and the Attorney General, for defendants in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an application of the plaintiffs in error, who were the plaintiffs in the trial court, to be relieved from certain state and city taxes assessed against them in the city of Lynchburg.

The ground upon which they based their right to the relief sought was that the property upon which the tax had been assessed consisted entirely of stocks, bonds, etc.—intangible personal property—which had been, prior to the beginning of the tax year, transferred and assigned to the Loyd Corporation, a corporation organized and chartered under the laws of this state, with its principal office in the town of Abingdon, in the county of Washington; that the said corporation had been assessed with all taxes properly leviable and assessable against it for that year (1910), and had paid the same to the commonwealth, the county of Washington, and the town of Abingdon, where its principal office was located.

The corporation court of Lynchburg was of opinion that the petitioners were not entitled to the relief sought, and dismissed their petition.

Section 1105a, Code 1904, which prescribes what a certificate of incorporation shall contain, provides among other things (subsection 2, cl. "b") that it shall set forth "the name of the county, city or town wherein its principal office in this state is to be located."

Section 492 of the Code, among other things, provides that property belonging to a corporation, which property is not otherwise taxed, shall be listed for taxation "to the corporation by the principal accounting officer and at the principal place of business of such corporation; but if not so listed it shall be listed and taxed in the place where the property is."

[1] The general rule is that property of an intangible nature has no situs of its own for the purposes of taxation, and is therefore assessable only at the place of its owner's domicile. State Bank of Virginia v. City of Richmond, 79 Va. 113; Cooley on Taxation, 63.

[2] The general rule also is that a corporation, for the purposes of taxation, has its domicile at the place where its principal office is located. Atlantic & Danville Ry. Co. v. Lyons, Treas., 101 Va. 1, 42 S. E. 932; Orange & Alex. R. Co. v. City Council of Alexandria, 58 Va. 176, 185, 186; Cooley on Taxation, p. —.

Mr. Black, in his article on Taxation, 37 Cyc. 959, says that, "if the law requires the certificate of incorporation to state where such principal office shall be located, it is ordinarily conclusive on this point, and fixes the place for taxing the company's property, unless its residence has been changed by some statute, although some decisions hold that if no business is transacted at the nominal principal office, except the meetings of stockholders and directors, while all the company's executive and financial business is done at another place, it is to be taxed at the latter place. * * *"

[3] Among the contentions made by the city of Lynchburg in maintaining its right to tax the property in question is the fact that the office of the Loyd Corporation at Abingdon is merely nominal, and all of its executive and financial business is done in Lynchburg, and that the principal office was fixed in the certificate of incorporation at Abingdon to obtain a lower rate of taxation than existed in Lynchburg. It becomes material, therefore, to consider and decide whether the declaration in the certificate of incorporation of that company as to the location of its principal office, as required by the statute, is conclusive on that point, and fixes the place for taxing the property in question; for, if the matter is open to parol proof, it is clearly shown—indeed, it is conceded—that practically all the business of the corporation is transacted at its office in Lynchburg.

[4] Independent of statute, it is not essential to the existence of a corporation that its principal office shall be fixed, or, indeed, that it shall have a principal office; yet for some purposes and for obvious reasons it is important that every corporation chartered under the laws of the state should have a principal office in the state, and that its location should be definite and certain, for the location of such office, among other things, affects the jurisdiction of the courts (Code, § 3214), the service of process (Code, §§ 3227, 3225), and the place of taxation.

Unless the General Assembly intended that the statement in the certificate of incorporation should be conclusive as to the location of the company's principal office, there does not seem to be any good reason for requiring such statement to be made; for if that statement is not conclusive of the place where the company's principal office is located, but its location may be elsewhere, either by the act of the company alone, or because its business is chiefly conducted at some other office, then the requirement will be of little value, and may be hurtful. If the question of where its principal office is located is to be determined, not by its certificate of incorporation, but by parol proof, serious difficulties and embarrassments will often arise, not only in the courts, but with litigants in instituting suits, sheriffs and other officers in executing process, and commissioners of the revenue in assessing taxes.

These considerations and others which might be mentioned would seem to indicate pretty clearly that the object of the Legislature in requiring the certificate of incorporation to state where the principal office of the company was to be located was to bring about that certainty on the subject which could not otherwise be attained, and to make the statement in the certificate conclusive of the fact required to be stated.

Whether such a statement is conclusive, or is open to parol proof, has been considered in other jurisdictions.

The Court of Appeals of New York, in the case of Western Transportation Company v. Scheu, 19 N. Y. 408, held that the statement in the certificate of incorporation was conclusive as to the location of the principal office as therein designated. The act for the incorporation of companies to navigate the lakes and rivers, which was construed in that case, required the certificate of incorporation to designate the city or the town and county in which the principal office for the management of the company's affairs was to be located. That action was instituted for the purpose of determining where the plaintiff, a corporation having a capital stock of over $900,000 was taxable—whether in the town of Tonawanda, designated by the certificate of incorporation as the place where its principal office was located, but at which scarcely any business was done, or in the city of Buffalo, where it had an office, and where its president, secretary, and treasurer lived and the business of the company was largely transacted. It also appeared in that case, as in this, that the object of the corporation in locating its principal office at a place where it did little business, instead of at a place where its business was largely or principally done, was to escape a higher rate of taxation. "Under these circumstances," said the judge delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, "it is evident that unless the certificate filed pursuant to the statute is conclusive upon the question of location, if the matter is open to parol proof at all, it is established beyond controversy that the principal office 'for transacting the financial concerns of the company' is not at Tonawanda, but either at New York or Buffalo, probably the latter. The only question then is in regard to the effect as evidence of the statement in the certificate. There are some considerations which seem to me decisive of this question. Unless the Legislature intended that the certificate should be conclusive as to the location of the principal office, it is difficult to see any adequate motive for requiring the statement to be made. It is in no manner essential to the existence of a corporation that the place of its principal office, should be fixed, or even that it should have any such office. We can, however, see obvious reasons why it is expedient that corporations should be deemed to have a location for certain purposes, among which is that of taxation, and that this should be definite and certain, and not subject to fluctuation or doubt. When the question is left open to parol proof, serious difficulties and embarrassments must often arise. What makes the office of a corporation its principal office? Is it the residence of its officers? Or does it depend upon the amount of business done, or the number of clerks kept, at a particular office? These and other like questions are of difficult solution, where the question is left open and at large, and necessarily tend to produce controversies and litigation. To avoid disputes upon the subject was, I apprehend, one motive for requiring the location to be fixed by the certificate. It is not important that a corporation should be taxed where it does the greatest amount of its business; but it is important that the place where it is liable to be taxed should be known."

In reply to the argument that the motive of the company in placing its principal office at the place designated in the certificate was to escape taxation, the judge said: "But it is no more immoral or inequitable for a corporation to do this than for an individual to do precisely the same. A person may keep his office in Buffalo, and transact business there to an unlimited amount, enjoying all the facilities and advantages which the enterprise and expenditures of the city have afforded, and yet by residing without the city bounds avoid all municipal taxation. When this shall be practiced, either by individuals or corporations, to an extent which renders it a serious evil, it will be for the Legislature to interfere."

The decision in that case was approved and followed in later cases in that state. See Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449; Union Steamboat Co. v. City of Buffalo, 82 N. Y. 351.

In the last-named case it is said, in reference to the two preceding cases, that "in those cases the whole subject was considered and discussed. We held that for the purpose of taxation the principal office of the company was fixed conclusively by the certificate of incorporation, and that in the county thus designated, and there alone, it could be lawfully taxed. We determined that such was the legal effect of the statute, presenting the manner of taxation, and the reasons for that conclusion, drawn from the law itself, and the manifold ills and inconsistencies which would result from a contrary construction, were so plainly and forcibly stated as to make repetition or further discussion unnecessary. * * * It is urged, also, that the purpose for which the principal office of the plaintiff was located in the county of Rockland was to avoid taxation. That may be, although no such fact is embraced in the findings of the trial court. We held that to be immaterial in the case of Western Transportation Company v. Schen. We have nothing to do with the motive. We can only deal with the fact. If such an evil exists, another authority than ours must provide for its correction."

In Pelton v. Transportation Company, 87 Ohio St. 450, it was held that a certificate of incorporation, which under the statute specifies the place where the principal office is to be located, is conclusive as to the location of such office. Such office is to be regarded as the residence of the corporation, within the meaning of section 4 of the tax law of April 5, 1859 (56 Ohio Laws, p. 178), as amended April 8, 1865 (62 Ohio Laws, p. 106), which provides that certain personal property "shall be entered for taxation in the township or town in which the person to be charged with taxes thereon resides at the time of listing the same by the assessor."

There are cases which hold that the designation of the location of the principal office or place of business of the company in its certificate or articles of incorporation is not conclusive of that fact for purposes of taxation; but some of them are cases where the law under which the incorporation was had did not require that the principal office or place of business of the company should be so stated (Milwaukee Steamship Co. v. Milwaukee, 83 Wis. 590, 53 N. W. 839, 18 L. R. A. 353; Georgia Fire Ins. Co. v. Cedartown, 134 Ga. 87, 67 S. E. 410, 19 Ann. Cas. 954), and others where the decision turned upon the special provisions of the statutes involved, as in Michigan. In that state it seems that the taxation statute provides that the place where the principal office of a corporation is located in its articles of incorporation shall be deemed its residence, provided its business is actually transacted at such office; but if it establishes its principal office at a place elsewhere than at the place designated, then the place where it transacts its principal business shall be deemed its residence for purposes of the act. See Teagan Transportation Co. v. Detroit, 139 Mich. 1, 102 N. W. 273, 69 L. R. A. 431, 111 Am. St. Rep. 391.

No case has been cited, nor have we found one in our investigation, where it has been held, in construing a statute similar to ours, that the statement in the articles of incorporation of the location of the company's principal office was not conclusive of that fact.

Counsel for the city of Lynchburg insists that this court held, in refusing an appeal in the case of Harrison & Long, Trustees, v. West Lynchburg Furniture Co., on April 2, 1896, that such a statement in the articles of incorporation was not conclusive of the fact. In that case, which involved the question whether or not the claim of a mechanic's lienor had been recorded in the proper clerk's office, under sections 2485 and 2486 of the Code of 1887 (pages 1246 and 1249, Code 1904), it was found by the commissioner that at the time the contract of the lien claimant was entered into and the materials furnished the corporation had abandoned the office named in its charter as its principal office and transferred it to its factory in Campbell county, and at that time had but the one office, and never afterwards had any other, and that the memorandum of the claim asserted as a lien was filed in the clerk's office of the county court of Campbell county in which the only office the company had was located. Upon that state of facts the trial court and this court were of opinion that the memorandum required had been filed in the proper clerk's office and the lien duly perfected. Under the peculiar circumstances of that case, we do not think that the conclusion reached established a precedent which should control the decision of this case.

We are of opinion that the proper place for the taxation of the property sought to be released from taxation was in the town and county where its principal office was fixed by the corporation's charter, and not in the city of Lynchburg; that its motive in fixing its principal office in a place other than where its principal business was done, for the purpose of getting a lower rate of taxation, is not material in construing the statutes in question. "We have," as was said by the Court of Appeals of New York in Union Steamship Co. v. Buffalo, supra, "nothing to do with the motive. We can deal only with the fact. If such an evil exists, another authority then ours must provide for its correction."

The order complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the corporation court, with direction to enter the proper order, exonerating and discharging the appellants from the payment of said taxes assessed against them in the city of Lynchburg. Reversed.

CORPORATIONS (§ 545*)—INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES—WAIVER OR LOSS OF RIGHT.

Stockholders of a corporation, who were accommodation makers and indorsers of the company's notes, which were secured by a deed of trust, paid a number of the notes, which were destroyed, and new notes issued to the stockholders therefor. An agreement was subsequently made between the corporation and its creditors, by which the creditors agreed to postpone payment of their debts in consideration of the stockholders' agreement that the creditors should be preferred in the distribution of profits or the assets of the company in the event of a sale; and, pursuant to such agreement, the property of the corporation was conveyed to trustees, who took charge of the business for the creditors. The trustees having failed to make a success of the business, the deed of trust was foreclosed, and the property purchased by one of the stockholders, who claimed the right to offset against the purchase price the notes issued in exchange for those secured by the deed of trust and paid by the stockholders. Held, that whatever right the stockholders had to offset their indebtedness, or to be subrogated to the rights of the holders of the secured notes, was waived by the agreement that the other creditors should be preferred; and hence the entire purchase price should be distributed to the general creditors.

ard Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, against the last-named company, George A. Frick, trustee under a deed of trust executed by the Standard Manufacturing Company on August 22, 1906, the National Bank of Commerce, of Norfolk, Va., the beneficiary under said deed to Frick, trustee, G. W. Truitt and others, trustees under a deed of trust executed by the Standard Manufacturing Company on February 24, 1908, and George H. Lewis, Frederick Lewis, and W. H. Robinson, stockholders and creditors of the Standard Manufacturing Company.

It appears from the pleadings and evidence in the record that the Standard Manufacturing Company, organized for the operation of a large timber and lumber plant situated at Suffolk, Va., was admittedly a close corporation, having originally but five stockholders, viz., George H. Lewis, Frederick Lewis, W. H. Robinson, George L. Barton, and J. C. Foster, who subscribed the nominal capital stock of $15,000 in the sum of $3,000 each. Subsequently, and before any of the stock subscriptions were paid, all of the stock was acquired by the two Lewises and Robinson. The subscriptions to the stock were not paid in money, but by the demand notes of the several subscribers, payable to the company, which were discounted at the National Bank of Commerce, and the proceeds paid into the treasury of the company and used in the course of its business. It soon became apparent that more capital was needed in the company's business, and certain advancements were made by the Lewises and Robinson, either in the form of notes given by themselves to the company, or their indorsement of the company's notes, all of which were likewise discounted, and the proceeds thereof paid into the company's treasury; George H. Lewis claiming that, altogether, the above-named stockholders paid into the company, for the company's purposes, in the neighborhood of $64,000.

Notwithstanding these large advancements, the company was financially unsuccessful in its business, steadily losing money, whereupon the Bank of Commerce demanded of the company and of the Lewises and Robinson, who were indorsers on the paper of the company discounted by the bank, additional security, and this was given, in part, by a deed of trust conveying all of the company's property to George A. Frick, trustee, dated August 22, 1906, the said conveyance having been authorized by formal resolutions adopted by the directors and stockholders at a meeting held on that day; but the deed of trust was not acknowledged until November 1, 1906, or recorded until November 14, 1906. This deed was to secure four notes, for the sum of $4,500 each, due in six months from date, one of which was indorsed by each of the then stockholders, the Lewises, Robinson, and Barton; the latter two notes being given priority over the former two. The aggregate amount of these notes, $18,000, was fixed upon, because it was the limit to which the Bank of Commerce would extend credit.

The Lewises, who it seems were regarded as people of means, claim to have made other advancements to the company, either in cash, notes, or indorsements of notes to or for the company; but it is not deemed necessary that these advancements be set out at length.

On January 30, 1908, the company, being hopelessly involved and desiring to obtain from its creditors, other than the stockholders, an extension of credit for one year, prepared and urged upon the general creditors an agreement providing the desired extension, wherein, by way of consideration to the general creditors for the indulgence, the following clause was inserted: "The said stockholders, who are also creditors, agree that all other creditors shall be preferred in the distribution of such profits as may be made from the operation of the plant, or the assets of the company in the event of sale." The plan of the agreement was that the plant and effects of the company were to be turned over to five trustees, viz., George W. Truitt, Claude Dennis, Charles H. Hutchins, George H. Lewis, and William H. Robinson, and said trustees, acting as a committee, a majority of whom were to constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, were to manage the affairs of the company during the entire period covered by the agreement, as authorized and directed by the provisions of the agreement.

The general creditors having agreed to the plan and terms of said agreement, pursuant thereto a deed of trust was executed, conveying to said Truitt and others, trustees, the company's property, which deed, bearing date February, 1908, was executed by the said company and George H. Lewis, Frederick Lewis, and William H. Robinson, individually.

The trustees were able to pay a dividend of 15 per cent. on the indebtedness due the creditors who had accepted notes payable in one year from the date of said agreement; but they, too, were unable to make a success of the business, and on February 24, 1909, they closed their accounts and did nothing further, and the company assumed possession of its property. Whereupon, in March, 1909, George A. Frick, trustee in the deed of August 22, 1906, being required so to do by the National Bank of Commerce, the holder of the notes secured by said deed, advertised the company's property for sale thereunder; and thereupon the bill in this cause was filed, asking that a sale by Frick be enjoined, that a receiver be appointed by the court, etc., and alleging, inter alia, that the Lewises and Robinson had never paid their stock subscriptions, but that the deed of trust to the National Bank of Commerce had been executed to secure notes of the company, which were substituted for the stock subscription notes of the subscribers, and that the Lewises and Robinson should be required to pay their stock subscriptions.

The prayer for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver was denied by the court, and Frick, trustee, was directed to sell the property, which he did at public auction on April 7, 1909, at which sale the property was bid in by George H. Lewis for the sum of $21,000, which bid was reported to the court and approved, and Frick, as trustee, conveyed the property to Lewis. It appears, however, that Lewis was not required to pay the whole of the purchase money to Frick, trustee, and paid only a sufficient sum to pay the costs of sale and of this suit; the balance being left in Lewis' hands to await a final decision as to whether he was entitled to the same, or any part thereof, or whether said balance belonged to the general creditors of the company.

An amended bill was filed in the cause, to which, as well as to the original bill, there was a demurrer by the defendants, which was overruled, and answers were thereupon filed, and the cause was referred to a master commissioner to make certain inquiries and to state certain accounts, as set out in the court's decree.

In the taking of the evidence before the commissioner, it developed that the subscriptions to the capital stock of the defendant company made by the defendants the Lewises and Robinson, as alleged in the bill, had not been paid at the time of the institution of the suit; that the notes of these individual stockholders in evidence of their stock subscriptions had been given to the defendant company, and by it discounted at the National Bank of Commerce; and that said notes were outstanding at the time of the institution of this suit, but that some time after the institution of the suit, and after the sale of said property by Frick, trustee, the said stockholders had paid at the bank their notes, and thereby paid their stock subscriptions. It was likewise developed that the National Bank of Commerce had not in reality loaned anything to the defendant company in return for the four notes aggregating $18,000, secured by the deed of trust to Frick, trustee, but that, although the resolution of the stockholders showed the deed of trust given to secure a loan to be made, as a matter of fact these notes were deposited with the said bank as collateral security for certain notes theretofore held by it, other than the notes of the stockholders given by them for their stock subscriptions.

The commissioner reported that there were held by said bank at the time of the delivery of these collateral notes, and for which collaterals were given as security, notes made or indorsed by the defendant company, and made or indorsed by the stockholders of the company, aggregating in principal $21,000, and that between November 1, 1906, the date that these collateral notes were delivered to the bank, and December 3, 1906, the Lewises, as indorsers or makers, paid to the bank notes aggregating in principal $15,400; so that on January 30, 1908, when the said agreement between the defendant company and its creditors, to which its stockholders were parties, was made, the said bank held only $6,500 of the notes made or indorsed by the defendant company, which were secured by the collateral notes aggregating $18,000, which in turn were secured by the deed of trust to Frick, trustee, and this $6,500 was the only amount that had been held by the said bank secured by said collateral notes since the 3d day of December, 1906. Therefore it appears that the amount due to said bank secured by the deed of trust to Frick, trustee, on January 30, 1908, was $6,500 in principal, with some interest thereon, which interest, as calculated by the commissioner, makes the aggregate amount due on said collateral notes, principal and interest, $7,509.84, the result being that if, as the general creditors contend, George H. Lewis (who is authorized by Fred Lewis to use the notes taken up by them at the bank as offsets against the purchase money due to Frick, trustee, by virtue of the agreement of January 30, 1908, and the deed of assignment to Truitt and others, trustees, of February 24, 1908, executed pursuant to said agreement) agreed to allow the general creditors preference over all of his claims held against the company at that time, in the distribution of the company's assets arising from a sale of its property and plant, then he, George H. Lewis, is entitled to receive credit on his purchase of the property from Frick, trustee, for the amount only of said notes, aggregating, principal and interest, the sum of $7,509.84, leaving a balance of $14,310.95 due by him to Frick, trustee, for distribution among the general creditors of the defendant company. On the other hand, if Lewis is allowed to offset all the notes he claims to have paid the bank and now asserts in this suit as debts due to him from the defendant company, he will receive practically all of the company's assets, and its general creditors will get little or nothing.

The master commissioner made an elaborate and carefully prepared report in the cause, and upon the main question, stated by him to be, "Did Lewis waive his right to priority as a secured creditor under the first deed of trust, dated August 22, 1906, in favor of the general creditors?" he reported that "the two Lewises and Robinson did not, by the agreement of January 30, 1908, and the deed of assignment of February 24, 1908, in which they joined, waive their rights as secured creditors under the first deed of trust (to Frick, trustee), and that George Lewis has a right now to offset the notes held by him, which were covered by the collateral notes secured under the first deed of trust, against the balance of the purchase money which he owes to George Frick, trustee, to the extent of the amount which may be due on said collateral notes." He then proceeds to calculate the amount due to Lewis on the original notes, to secure which the notes secured by the deed of trust to Frick, trustee, were delivered to the bank as collateral, and ascertained the amount to be, principal and interest, $21,171, and the amount then due by Lewis to Frick, trustee, including interest, $21,820.79, so that the balance due from Lewis to the trustee was only $649.79; but in this calculation the commissioner disregarded whether or not the said original notes, to secure which the collateral notes were delivered to the bank, were paid by the Lewises and Robinson before or after the agreement of January 30, 1908.

The plaintiff, S. M. Price Machinery Company, Incorporated, filed six exceptions to said report; but in the view that the learned judge of the circuit court took of the case he deemed it necessary to consider only the fourth and sixth of said exceptions, relating to the controlling question as stated in the commissioner's report, and in a written opinion made a part of the record, in which the facts stated above in this opinion and other facts appearing in the record are adverted to, laying stress upon the fact that after being urged to do so by the said bank the Lewises paid off some $14,000 or more of the deed of trust indebtedness due the bank, taking no assignment of these notes, which apparently were canceled and destroyed, and had the company issue to them its ordinary notes for the amount so advanced, payable on demand, it is said in conclusion: "So it seems to me it would be a great injustice upon the general creditors, as well as a wresting of the language contained both in the contract and deed of trust from its plain and unambiguous meaning, to allow the Lewises to hold this secret lien for some $14,000 or more, which amount is of necessity included in the $40,000 which they held out to the creditors they were yielding in order to induce their co-operation and consent to the plan which had been devised by these defendants themselves—a device and plan which they believed would work itself out, giving them back the property clear of all liabilities to the general creditors, and thereby save them, not only the amount they had paid the bank, but the entire indebtedness which the company owed them. It is neither unreasonable nor unnatural, therefore, that the Lewises, strong in the confidence of the successful termination of the plan which had been devised, should have postponed the payment of their debts in order to please the creditors, who were insisting upon payment and were threatening proceedings looking to the liquidation of the company. They felt reasonably satisfied that by so doing both the general creditors and themselves would be ultimately paid in full. But, however that may be, the fact is they entered into this solemn contract with the creditors for a consideration which to them seemed sufficient in law, as well as in fact, that their claims should be postponed, and I find nothing, either in the contract or the deed of trust, which seems to me to be in conflict with this view of language too plain to need construction, and I, therefore, feel obliged to sustain the exceptions 4 and 6 to the commissioner's report, and as these views will, when carried into effect, probably result in the payment of all the general creditors, it seems unnecessary to consider the other questions raised upon the exceptions to the report." From a decree carrying into effect the views of the learned judge, as expressed in his written opinion, this appeal was allowed.

The assignments of error in the petition for the appeal, relating to the rulings of the court below in permitting an amended bill to be filed in the cause, and overruling the demurrer to the original and amended bills, were not insisted on in the oral argument before this court, and will, therefore, not be further considered here.

The main question, as considered by the court, and rightly, is: "Did not the Lewises, by the agreement of January 30, 1908, and deed of February 24, 1909, waive their rights to participate in the security of the deed of trust to Frick, trustee, even if they had such a right at the time of the execution of the said agreement and deed of trust?"

A discussion as to the law with respect to the rights of subrogation in one who stands in the relation of surety to a principal debtor, and who has paid the debt of the principal, and to enforce every remedy and every security the creditor had against the principal debtor, would serve no good purpose in the consideration of this case, upon the indisputable facts to which we have adverted. The trial court of opinion that, however it might be as to the subrogation of the Lewises to the rights of the National Bank of Commerce, they had by the two written instruments (the agreement of January 30, 1908, and the deed of assignment executed pursuant to the agreement), in "language too plain to need construction," waived whatever right they may have had to demand payment of the indebtedness due them by the defendant company until its other creditors were paid in full. If more were needed to make plain the meaning and intent of the parties than the language itself used in said agreement and deed of assignment, it is to be found in the interpretation given to it by appellant George H. Lewis when testifying in this cause:

"Q. Under what circumstances was the agreement with the creditors by which this plant was turned over to George W. Truitt and others executed? A. Under the agreement that we should surrender the amount that the company owed us, provided the creditors accepted the terms of that agreement, and accepted the plant to be run under the management of the trustees for the benefit of the creditors."

Further testifying, the witness Lewis said: "They all agreed to take notes, with the understanding that the plant should be turned over to the said trustees, who would operate the plant for the creditors, and we believed that would be a final settlement of the whole matter, and we agreed not to expect the indebtedness to us, but surrendered that indebtedness; otherwise, we would not have gone into any such agreement."

In view of the facts and circumstances appearing from the proof in the record, the appellant George H. Lewis could not be heard to say in a court of equity that although he and his associates, in the negotiations with the general creditors of the company for an indulgence on their demands past due, and which led to the agreement providing for the indulgence asked and the deed of assignment of February 24, 1908, executed pursuant to the agreement, agreed to subordinate their rights to be paid any indebtedness due to them from the company, whose president and principal owner he was, until the other creditors of the company were paid in full, and then, more than two years later, and after this suit was instituted, say that "we did not surrender certain rights which we at the time of said agreement did not disclose to the general creditors, but now assert, and which entitles me to practically all of the assets of the company, and leaves little or nothing thereof for its general creditors."

We are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court is right, and it will therefore be affirmed; but the cause has to be remanded for further necessary proceedings therein, or that may be expedient, to carry out the views expressed in this opinion.

Affirmed.

WORLEY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 309*) — INSTRUCTIONS — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

Under the evidence in the case, the court did not err in refusing to charge upon the subject of voluntary or involuntary manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649, 650, 652-655; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 340*) — INSTRUCTIONS — PROVOCATION.

The court gave to the jury the following charge: "If you should find, for instance, in this case, that these defendants, or either of them, if they were acting jointly, delivered upon the person named in the indictment a blow with a deadly weapon which produced death, and there was no provocation, no sufficient provocation, provocation sufficient enough to reduce it to some other offense, nor justification, and the person named in the indictment died in consequence of that blow, delivered under those circumstances by that character of weapon, that, under the law of Georgia, would be murder." This does not afford the defendant ground for a new trial, although in view of the ruling above made, that neither the law of voluntary nor involuntary manslaughter was involved in the case, the instruction just quoted is somewhat inapt, because it embodies the unnecessary expression, "provocation sufficient enough to reduce it to some other offense."

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1134*) — APPEAL — REVIEW.

It is unnecessary to pass upon the exception relative to the alleged disqualification of a named juror.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2587, 2653, 2986-2998, 3056, 3067-3071; Dec. Dig. § 1134.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 163*) — EVIDENCE — CHARACTER OF DECEDENT.

The court erred in admitting, over objection duly made, evidence of the character of the decedent for peaceableness; no evidence having been introduced by the defendant on trial putting the decedent's character in issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 310-317; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

Lumpkin and Hill, JJ., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

J. W. Worley was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Robt. L. Colding, of Savannah, and Denny & Wright, of Rome, for plaintiff in error. W. O. Hartridge, Sol. Gen., of Savannah, and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, J. John Worley and Hugh Boggs were jointly indicted for the murder of Jasper Turner. Worley was put upon trial, and convicted of the offense of murder, and a recommendation was made by the jury that he be imprisoned for life in the penitentiary. The defendant thereupon made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

The state introduced evidence tending to show that the homicide was willful and unprovoked murder, committed by the defendants for the probable purpose of securing possession of an automobile which belonged to the decedent and which they had hired for the evening, ostensibly for the purpose of taking a ride into the country; the decedent acting as chauffeur. The state having exercised its right to sever, and Worley being on trial, Boggs, the other defendant, was introduced as a witness by the defense. According to his testimony, he and Worley came to Savannah upon an excursion. They were in and about Savannah several days. On the day of the homicide, July 31, 1911, desiring to take a ride in an automobile, they hired the car of the decedent and engaged him to carry them for a ride, for $2.50 an hour. After they had been riding for two hours on a country road, witness told the owner of the car they had gone far enough, and to turn back. At this point the defendants and the decedent engaged in a controversy as to the amount of fare due; the decedent insisting that they owed him $10, while they contended that only $5 was due. The witness emphatically stated to the decedent that he would not be robbed in that way. Thereupon the decedent drew a pistol, pointed it at the witness Boggs, and then Worley hit the decedent with a hammer. Witness jumped from the car, and the decedent turned on Worley, and both of them fell out of the car. Decedent had Worley on the ground, and Worley called loudly for help; whereupon decedent started towards Boggs, who thereupon seized the hammer and hit his assailant over the head with it. Decedent had dropped the pistol in the car when Worley hit him. When the decedent turned from Worley, who was upon the ground, to assail Boggs, the latter hit at him twice, hit him a glancing blow at first, and then, as decedent came on, hit him again. The witness then stated how they placed the body of the decedent in the car, started back to the city of Savannah with him, and then, finding him to be dead, became alarmed, and started away from the city of Savannah, and finally placed the body in a well. The witness testified at length as to many other particulars and details tending to explain the conduct of himself and his joint defendant, which it is not necessary to set forth here.

The defendant made a statement, which, in so far as it is material to the issues made in the record, is substantially as follows: They hired Turner's automobile, as stated by Boggs, and went out on the country road. When the altercation as to the fare arose, as detailed by Boggs, and Boggs said, "I will not stand to be robbed like that," the decedent, Turner, said, "You will give me $10 or I will blow your brains out," and he drew a pistol and pointed it at Boggs. The defendant on trial thereupon, in order to protect himself and companion, picked up the hammer, which was in the bottom of the car, and hit Turner on the side of the head. The latter fell over and dropped the pistol in the car. The accused hit him, because he thought he was going to shoot Boggs and then kill him, the defendant on trial. After Turner was hit, he turned over and grabbed Worley, and they fell out of the side of the car. "He and I rolled out of the car, and we struggled there on the ground. He commenced choking me, and reached his hands in his pocket like this (indicating), trying to get something out of his pocket. I hollered to Boggs to come and help me; and as he was coming the negro turned me loose and started after Boggs in a sort of crouching position; and when he got close to Boggs, Boggs hit him, it seems like a glancing blow, and, the negro still coming on, Boggs hit him again, and the negro rolled on the ground." Worley further declared, "The negro had the pistol pointed at my partner, and I was afraid he was going to shoot us both." The statement continues with details relating to the disposition of the body and the reason for the flight.

[1] 1. The court did not err in refusing to charge the jury on the subject of voluntary or involuntary manslaughter. If the defendant's statement and the testimony of the witness Boggs, who was jointly indicted with him, be true, the plaintiff in error was not guilty of any offense against the law. When he struck the decedent, he did it because, according to his statement and the testimony of his companion, Boggs, the decedent had a deadly weapon leveled at Boggs, and the defendant acted under the fear that the life of himself and his companion was about to be taken by the decedent, to whom they had given no other provocation for a deadly assault than by refusing to pay as hire for a car a sum which they insisted was greater than the amount which they had contracted to pay. Under these circumstances the assault by the decedent upon the defendant Worley and Boggs was of a felonious character; and if Worley acted, when he struck the deceased, in defense of himself or his companion against such an assault, the blow was justifiable, and if that blow caused the death of Turner, the homicide was justifiable. If the blow stricken by Worley did not cause the death of Turner, but left him with strength enough, after dropping the pistol, to make further assault upon Worley and to hurl him to the ground, or to throw himself upon Worley after the latter had fallen upon the ground, and he desisted from the last attack only when Worley's cries for help brought his companion, Boggs, to his aid, and Boggs, as Turner approached him in a crouching position, struck him twice, the first blow being a glancing one, Boggs would have been justifiable in striking this blow, and, if death resulted from it, neither Boggs nor Worley would have been guilty of any offense. Or if it could be held that Boggs, coming up in response to the cries for help from his companion, who was upon the ground and in the grasp of an assailant, who but a few moments before had tried to murder them, used more force than was necessary in repelling the attack of Turner, who approached him in a crouching position, and that this was done not to repel a felonious attack, inasmuch as Turner was then unarmed, and having struck a blow with more force than was necessary to repel the attack, was guilty of voluntary manslaughter, as death resulted from his last blow, still that would not render Worley guilty of voluntary manslaughter. For, according to the testimony of Boggs and the statement of Worley himself, Worley had done nothing more in the first instance than to strike in order to save his own and his companion's life, and then, when he was on the ground, with the assailant on him, he had cried for help. If the one who came to his help under these circumstances, when attacked in turn by Worley's assailant, struck with more force than was absolutely necessary, Worley was in no way responsible for the violence of the blow, and did not share in the guilt of the man who struck it, if there was any guilt at all upon the part of the latter.

The evidence for the state, largely circumstantial, tended to show an unprovoked murder. The statement of the defendant on trial, and the testimony of his companion, Boggs, if they were to be believed, showed no acts upon this defendant's part that were not entirely justifiable; and the jury, therefore, were called upon to determine whether the defendant on trial was guilty of murder, or not guilty of any offense. And instructions upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter could find no proper place in the court's charge upon the real issues made by the evidence.

[2] 2. Error is assigned upon the following charge of the court: "If you should find, for instance, in this case, that these defendants, or either of them, if they were acting jointly, delivered upon the person named in the indictment a blow with a deadly weapon which produced death, and there was no provocation, no sufficient provocation, provocation sufficient enough to reduce it to some other offense, nor justification, and the person named in the indictment died in consequence of that blow, delivered under those circumstances by that character of weapon, that, under the law of Georgia, would be murder." Having shown that the law of manslaughter was not involved in this case, the charge just quoted affords the plaintiff in error no ground of complaint, because, after having charged as above quoted, the court "failed and refused to charge upon any theory of the case whereby provocation would be sufficient to reduce it to some other offense." For, as we have attempted to demonstrate, there was no evidence in the case tending to show that the defendant was guilty of any offense, if he was not guilty of murder.

[3] 3. It is unnecessary to determine the question raised on the ground of the motion based upon the alleged disqualification of a named juror, as this question will not arise upon the next trial; a reversal being granted upon another ground of the motion.

[4] 4. Error is assigned in the motion for a new trial upon the ruling of the court admitting, over objection duly made, evidence of the good character of the decedent. The admission of this testimony was error, and it was of such a nature as to require the grant of a new trial. In the trial of a criminal case, it is the privilege, in the first instance, of the defendant to put in issue his own character, and under circumstances that of the deceased. But until the defendant takes the initiative, and puts in issue the character of the deceased, it is not competent for the state to adduce evidence to prove the good character of the deceased for peaceableness, or in other respects. We do not think that proof of the attack by the deceased upon the defendant at the time of the homicide is sufficient to warrant proof of his peaceable character. Our attention has been called to one or two decisions laying down a contrary doctrine; but we think that the rule as we have stated it is the sounder rule. In the case of Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 129, it was said: "If the character of the deceased for violence is put in issue by the evidence offered for the accused, then the right to rebut such evidence is invoked, as a matter of right; but only then, and not till then." And in that case it was held that it was error upon the part of the court below to admit, over objection by the prisoner, evidence of the character of the accused for violence, and also of the deceased for peaceableness; the same not being in rebuttal. In the case just cited, and from which the above excerpt is taken, there was evidence tending to show that the deceased was about to cross a fence for the purpose of making an assault upon the defendant with an ax; and in view of these facts the court laid down the rule which we have stated, and we are unable to find any case in this state changing or modifying it.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except LUMPKIN and HILL, JJ., dissenting.

LUMPKIN, J. (dissenting). Conceding that the admission of the evidence of a witness as to the peaceable character of the deceased was erroneous, I do not think a reversal should result. It would not be advisable to enter into a full discussion of the evidence, as the case is to be returned for a new trial. Suffice it to say that the evidence showed a shocking case of murder. Testimony on behalf of the defendant showed that he and his comrade rode into the country in a hired automobile at night, killed the owner, sold the automobile, concealed their identity, and fled, and that at the time the deceased was killed he had gotten out of the automobile on the ground and had no weapon then with him. As to these facts there was no real dispute, though the accused and his witness insisted that the deceased was the assailant. A single witness testified that "the general character [of the deceased] for peaceableness or violence was good; that his reputation was that of a peaceable, honest negro." To upset the verdict for this alone seems to me to be wrong.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Associate Justice HILL concurs in this dissent.

BROWDER-MANGET CO. v. CALHOUN BRICK CO.

(Syllabus by the Court.)ANIMALS (§ 85)—INJURIES TO OTHER ANIMALS—LIABILITY.

Where a railroad company permitted shippers and consignees to use a driveway in its yard for the purpose of loading and unloading cars, and a foreman of a person who had cars to unload, while engaged in the performance of his duties, hitched a horse to one of the cars, and left it standing and eating feed which had been given it, if the horse kicked a mule of another shipper which was driven behind it, this did not make out a prima facie case for recovery, without proof of viciousness and scienter, although the railroad company had given no permission to feed horses in that place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Cent. Dig. §§ 297-308; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by the Browder-Manget Company against the Calhoun Brick Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hewlett & Dennis, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Candler, Thomson & Hirsch, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The Browder-Manget Company brought suit against the Calhoun Brick Company, alleging in substance as follows: The defendant was engaged in the manufacturing and selling of brick, owned mules and horses, operated wagons and drays, and employed drivers, and also a foreman to superintend and look after the management of its business in the county where the injury took place. It owned and furnished to its foreman a certain horse for the better performance of his duties. The horse was used "as an industrial appliance," and was vicious and unsafe, and this was known to the defendant, or should have been so known. The foreman hitched the horse to a car on the track of the railway company, at a place known as "a team track," which was used by the public for loading and unloading cars from the tracks of the railway. The defendant knew that the place was used by the public, and frequented by persons, vehicles, and animals for the purposes mentioned. A drayman of the plaintiff endeavored to pass in the rear of the horse, when the horse kicked the mule attached to the dray and broke its foreleg. It was the duty of the foreman to feed and care for the horse, and he was acting in the scope of his employment. He was negligent in tying the horse in a place so frequented by persons, vehicles, and animals. Such place was not designed or used for the purpose of feeding horses, and "the said defendant did thus wrongfully place the said horse therein to petitioner's injury and damage."

On the trial the evidence tended to show the hitching of the horse to the car by the defendant's foreman, the driving behind him by the plaintiff's driver, and the kicking and injury of the plaintiff's mule. On the subject of the place where this occurred, the testimony of the agent of the railroad company was to the effect that the driveway was for the purpose alone of loading and unloading shipments of freight, and no one was authorized to tie horses to a car and feed them; that ordinarily that particular track was assigned to the defendant for the unloading of brick, as a matter of convenience; that he did not know that people fed their stock there while unloading cars; that it might have been done, but was not authorized; and that there were no instructions posted in the yards or given to shippers that they must not feed their horses there. There was no evidence of any previous viciousness on the part of the horse, or of notice thereof to the defendant. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

If the plaintiff sought to recover only because of the act of a vicious horse, it would be sufficient to say that there was no evidence of previous viciousness or scienter. But as there were allegations in certain paragraphs of the petition to the effect that the defendant's foreman was negligent in tying the horse in a frequented place, and that the driveway was not designed or used for the purpose of feeding horses, and the defendant thus wrongfully placed the horse therein, and as counsel for the plaintiff in error, in his able brief, insists that, without proof of viciousness or of the scienter, the case should have been submitted to the jury, we will discuss the question somewhat further. The common-law rule as to the liability of an owner of domestic animals allowed to run at large, and committing damages on the premises of another, or the status of the law on that subject, prior to or under the statutes providing for local elections as to fences, need not be discussed. The horse of the defendant was not running at large or on the land of the plaintiff.

Two cases will suffice as illustrations of recoveries which have been allowed on account of negligence of the owner or person in control of a domestic animal, regardless of any vicious disposition on its part. In Jones v. Owen, 24 L. T. R. N. S. 587, two greyhounds coupled together with a chain or piece of rope were allowed to go upon the highway at night. They ran on each side of a passer, and he was thrown down, in consequence of the chain or rope coming in contact with his legs, and was injured. The owner was held liable because of negligence in permitting the dogs to go coupled together upon the highroad, without any proof of viciousness in them. In Phillips v.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Dewald, 79 Ga. 732, 7 S. E. 151, 11 Am. St. Rep. 458, a horse was negligently left standing unhitched in a street, in front of its owner's door. It moved off, and, being frightened by persons who sought to capture it, ran away, ran upon the sidewalk, and injured a passer. It was held that the question of negligence was for the jury, and a recovery by the plaintiff was sustained, without proof of viciousness in the horse.

As to injuries done by vicious animals in the exercise of their vicious propensities, a number of courts in England and in America have held that the gist of the action is keeping the animal after notice of its vicious character. Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 696; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 353, 354, and note. Of course, where this rule prevails, proof of the scienter is necessary. Other courts have held that the gist of the action is not in the fact of keeping the vicious animal after notice of its vicious propensity, but negligence in the manner of such keeping. Friedman v. Goodman, 124 Ga. 532, 52 S. E. 892. But whether the fact of keeping after knowledge of the viciousness be treated as the gist of the action, or whether it is sought to impose upon the owner a certain duty by reason of knowledge of the viciousness, in either event, as to such actions, proof of the scienter will be necessary. In some cases it has been declared that, if a domestic animal is rightfully in the place where it inflicts an injury, the owner will not be liable unless he had knowledge of the vicious propensities of such animal; but, if the animal was wrongfully in such place, proof of the scienter is unnecessary. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 364, and citations; 2 Cyc. 368; Eddy v. Union R. Co., 25 R. I. 451, 56 Atl. 677, 105 Am. St. Rep. 897, 1 Ann. Cas. 204. The statement was cited in Reed v. Southern Express Co., 95 Ga. 108, 22 S. E. 133, 51 Am. St. Rep. 62.

To the mind of the writer of this opinion, the generic words "rightfully" and "wrongfully," as applied to places and animals, may possibly be subject to misconstruction. Some of the cases mentioned deal with trespasses; but others go further, and hold that the owner may subject himself to liability on the basis of wrongfully putting his domestic animal in a certain place, although there was no trespass upon the premises of another, without proof of the scienter. Thus in New Jersey one whose servant led his horse by a halter along a sidewalk in a city was held liable to a person lawfully passing upon the sidewalk and who was kicked by the horse, without requiring proof of scienter. Healey v. Ballantine & Sons, 66 N. J. Law, 339, 49 Atl. 511. In Massachusetts, where a wagon was stuck in the mud, and one of the horses was made nervous by the effort to pull it out and by being brutally beaten, and was then left standing partially on the sidewalk while eating from a feed bag, and kicked a person passing on the sidewalk, the owner was held liable. Referring to the necessity for knowledge of previous viciousness, Holmes, J., sententiously said: "It used to be said in England, under the rule requiring notice of the habits of an animal, that every dog was entitled to one worry; but it is not universally true that every horse is entitled to one kick." Hardiman v. Wholley, 172 Mass. 411, 52 N. E. 518, 70 Am. St. Rep. 292. See, also, Dickson v. McCoy, 39 N. Y. 400; Goodman v. Gay, 15 Pa. 188, 53 Am. Dec. 589; Ingham's Law of Animals, §§ 74, 93. For the purpose of the present case, it is unnecessary to determine how far these rulings will be followed here. In Reed v. Southern Express Co., 95 Ga. 108, 22 S. E. 133, 51 Am. St. Rep. 62, supra, an ordinary draft horse, attached to a vehicle, was momentarily left standing in a street adjacent to a sidewalk, and bit one passing by on the sidewalk. It was held that the horse was in its rightful place in the street, and that, there being no evidence that it was vicious or had a tendency to bite persons, the injury was not one which the defendant was bound to anticipate and guard against and the leaving of the horse unattended was not such negligence as would entitle the plaintiff to recover. In Corcoran v. Kelly, 61 Misc. Rep. 323, 113 N. Y. Supp. 686, the Supreme Court of New York held that, where a horse was negligently left standing in a street while eating and bit a passer-by, the vicious propensity of the horse was the proximate cause of the injury, and proof of the scienter was necessary.

Turning, now, to the facts of the case before us, the place where the injury occurred was in a railroad freightyard. Shippers and consignees were allowed by the company to use a driveway for the purpose of loading and unloading freight. An agent of the company testified that the company did not authorize horses to be tied to cars and fed in the driveway; that ordinarily the particular track on which the car was standing where the horse was hitched while eating was assigned to the defendant company for unloading brick, as a matter of convenience; that he did not know that others fed their stock there while unloading cars, but that no instructions were posted in the yards or given to shippers that they must not feed their horses there. The horse kicked a mule which was driven behind it by the driver of the plaintiff. The defendant's "riding boss" rode the horse there in the discharge of his duties in connection with the unloading of the cars. If the tying of the horse and feeding him amounted to a misuse of the license of the railroad company, such company is not complaining. Relatively to the plaintiff, which was also a licensee, it cannot be held that the horse was unlawfully at that place, regardless of any vicious characteristics. The place was a passway which shippers and consignees were permitted to use. As to the licensees, it was somewhat analogous to a road or street which various persons may lawfully use. It was thus quite similar to the Reed Case, in which a horse was in the street, but temporarily stopped near the sidewalk. In the absence of any proof of viciousness and scienter, there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

JOHNSON v. OLIVER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 796*)—LIEN—SALE OF LAND—RETENTION OF POSSESSION BY GRANTOR.

Where a man who owned a two-fifths undivided interest in a tract of land, his children owning the other three-fifths undivided interest, sold and conveyed his interest, and thereupon became the tenant of the purchaser, giving rent notes and paying rent, and the purchaser, through his tenant, remained in possession for four years, the interest so conveyed was discharged from the lien of a judgment against the maker of the deed, if the purchase was bona fide and for a valuable consideration. Civil Code, § 5950; Edwards v. Stinson, 59 Ga. 443; Blalock v. Denham, 85 Ga. 646, 11 S. E. 1038.

(a) That the grantor remained in possession as tenant of the grantee as to the interest conveyed is a circumstance for the consideration of the jury in determining the bona fides of the transaction, but will not per se prevent it from falling within the rule above stated.

(b) The request that the decision in Edwards v. Stinson, 59 Ga. 443, be reviewed and overruled, is denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1395; Dec. Dig. § 796.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 796*)—LIEN—SALE OF LAND—TRANSACTIONS—CONSIDERATION.

If a debtor bona fide conveys land to his creditor in payment and discharge of an existing debt, this constitutes such a valuable consideration as falls within the provision of Civil Code, § 5950.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1395; Dec. Dig. § 796.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 203*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES.

In a claim case, where neither the pleading nor the evidence put in issue the adequacy or inadequacy of the consideration paid to the defendant in fi. fa. by a purchaser from him for a valuable consideration, there was no error in charging the jury in effect that no such issue was before them.

(a) Such a charge furnishes no ground for a reversal, whether or not it was accurate to state that upon proof of a valuable consideration it would be presumed to be sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 477-479; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 102*)—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

There was no error in overruling the ground of the motion for a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence, which consisted merely of a letter written to the attorney of the movant after the trial, by a person who must have been known before the trial to have been connected with the transaction, and who resided only a few miles distant from the place of the hearing.

NELSON v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 141*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

Where a city lawfully constructs a viaduct in the extension of one of its streets, which interferes with an abutter's right of ingress and egress, in a suit by the abutter against the city for consequential damages, the measure of damages is the diminished market value of the property. If the market value of the abutter's property has not been decreased, there can be no recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-376; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 140*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

In ascertaining the extent of any injury to the land and buildings of the abutter, the physical property is to be considered as a unit. Easement of access, and its value for a particular use, are not to be considered as independent items of damage to be separately compensated, but as component parts of the entire damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 146*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

Consequential damages to contiguous property resulting from a change in the grade of a street may be diminished or extinguished by special benefits to the property growing out of the improvement. The fact that other property in the vicinity may also be increased in value from the same cause will not justify excluding special benefits to the particular property in determining whether or not it has been damaged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 390-393; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 141*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

In the process of ascertaining whether contiguous property has suffered consequential damage from the change of the grade of a street, the market value of the property before and after the change of the grade is to be compared.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-376; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 141*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

In estimating the market value of the property, its adaptability to business or other advantageous uses made possible by the construction of the viaduct, as well as the capabilities of the property, and all the uses to which it may be applied or to which it is adapted, may be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-376; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 299*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

But evidence of the existence of structures on the viaduct, erected by third persons after its completion and before the trial, is inadmissible, because the city cannot diminish the amount of the wrong by benefits which other people may give to the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 808, 809; Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 299*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

Nor is testimony admissible that, since the erection of the viaduct, bawdyhouses on the street along and over which ran the viaduct had been abandoned, and their abandonment was attributable by the witness to the construction of the viaduct. This result is too speculative and conjectural.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 808, 809; Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

8. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 299*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

The issue was the difference in market value of the property before and after the improvement in the manner in which the work was constructed, and evidence that the city had consented to the closing of Waverly Way, upon condition that it was to be relocated on or near by land to be furnished by a railroad company, was irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 808, 809; Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by C. K. Nelson, trustee, against the City of Atlanta. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Jno. L. Hopkins & Sons, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Atlanta, an ecclesiastical corporation, is the owner of a lot of land on the corner of Washington and Hunter streets, in the city of Atlanta, fronting about 235 feet on Washington street and about 183 feet on Hunter street. On the corner of the lot facing Washington street is constructed a building known as St. Philip's Cathedral, and to the north of the church, facing Washington street, are the deanery and Sunday school house, and in their rear sits the parish house. Several years ago Washington street, which runs north and south, stopped at its northern terminus at the railroad yards, and travel along that street from Hunter street was by means of a street called Waverly Way, which led into another street of the city parallel with Washington street. In this condition of affairs the city constructed a viaduct, extending Washington street northward over the railroad yards and two or three blocks to Gilmer street. The viaduct was built of the same width as Washington street, and extended longitudinally over Collins street from the railroad yards to its northern end. The grade of the viaduct began to ascend just off of Hunter street. The approach to the Cathedral was on a level, but at the northern limits of the church lot the viaduct was elevated 12 or 15 feet above the land surface. Waverly Way was closed. The owner of the church property sued the city of Atlanta for damages claimed to have resulted from the construction of the viaduct. The city pleaded that the plaintiff should not recover damages, because the consequential benefits to the plaintiff's property exceeded any injury occasioned by the construction of the viaduct. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, the court refused a new trial, and the plaintiff brings error.

[1] 1. It is not contended that the city was without authority in constructing this street improvement, or that any property of the plaintiff was actually taken by the city. The suit is only for consequential damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the construction of the viaduct. The ultimate and only measure of damages to contiguous property resulting from the construction of a public improvement is the diminished market value of the property. In arriving at the effect of the improvement on the market value, the consequent injury and benefit are to be compared. If the market value of the property has not been diminished, in legal contemplation it has not been damaged, and there can be no recovery. Streyer v. Georgia Southern, etc., Railroad Co., 90 Ga. 56, 15 S. E. 637; Hurt v. Atlanta, 100 Ga. 274, 28 S. E. 65.

[2] 2. In ascertaining the extent of the injury to the land and buildings, the physical property is to be considered as a unit. The various elements as affecting the market value of this unit in its relation to the improvement are to be treated as component parts of the entire damage, and not as independent items to be separately compensated for. The easement of access to the property from the street is not to be considered as having a separate value, independently of the property itself; but the property and the easement of access are to be treated as parts of one and the same estate. Likewise the devotion of the property to a particular use, and its value for that use, are relevant only as an element entering into the consideration of the ultimate fact of diminution of market value. Streyer and Hurt Cases, supra; Selma R. Co. v. Keith, 53 Ga. 178; Moore v. Atlanta, 70 Ga. 611.

[3] 3. As the measure of damages is the difference in market value before the proposed construction and afterwards, the effects flowing from the proposed public improvement are to be considered. While it has been sometimes broadly stated that the benefit to the particular property must be special, in contradistinction to general benefits shared by it in common with the generality of property, it is a misconception of the principle to eliminate a consideration of any special benefit to the particular property because other property in the vicinity may also be specially benefited. The illustration given in 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 279, strongly brings out this point. There it is said that "it seems clear that if a narrow alley should be widened to a broad street, and connections thus made with much-traveled streets, the abutters on the alley would, in the increased value of their property, supposing, of course, that the widening of the alley does add to the value of the property, receive a benefit not common to the public, but peculiar to the owners of the lots abutting on the alley widened into a street." The effect of the extension of Washington street by means of this viaduct may be to enhance the value of the property on either side of it. The purpose of this inquiry is to ascertain the effect of its construction on the church property, so as to find out if its market value has been diminished. Manifestly an added value to the particular property must not be rejected in the computation of values solely because other property in the immediate vicinity may also be benefited by the public improvement. Metropolitan West Side R. Co. v. Stickney, 150 Ill. 362, 37 N. E. 1098, 26 L. R. A. 773.

[4] 4. Prior to the Constitution of 1877 municipal corporations were not liable to property owners for raising or lowering the grades of streets; but this rule was changed by that provision in the fundamental law that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being first paid." City of Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 386. The adjustment of values may be made before the completion of the public improvement or afterwards. Irrespective of the time when judicial estimation of the damage is invoked, whether before or after the construction of the public improvement, the range of elements affecting the market value of the property is essentially the same. In all cases the enhancement of the value of the property must spring alone from the improvement made. The time for the estimation of the market value of the property, as affected by the improvement, in cases where condemnation is necessary, is the day of the award. Gate City Terminal Co. v. Thrower, 136 Ga. 456, 71 S. E. 906. This results from the interpretation of the constitutional provision above quoted, that, except in cases where damage results from the improvement of streets by a municipality, the payment of consequential damages must precede the construction of the public improvement. Athens Terminal Co. v. Athens Foundry, 129 Ga. 393, 58 S. E. 891. But where a city, in pursuance of a plan of street improvement, alters the grade of a street to the injury of abutting property, the owner cannot demand prepayment of consequential damages as a condition to doing the work on the street, but his remedy is an action for damages. Moore v. Atlanta, supra. It is a general rule in tort that an action for damages arises upon the infliction of the injury which causes the damages. Hence the time for the computation of damages in this case is upon the construction of the public improvement. City of Atlanta v. Green, supra.

[5] 5. As we have already said, the question for decision in cases where consequential damages to abutting property is claimed by reason of the change of the grade of the street is the difference in market value of the property before and after the change of the grade of the street. The difficulty of formulating any rule for the estimate of such values is apparent. Mr. Lewis defines market value to be "the price it will bring when it is offered for sale by one who desires, but is not obliged to, sell it, and is bought by one who is under no necessity of having it." Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 706. This definition is but general, and does not undertake to enumerate any specific factors which fix the value, except the absence of necessity to sell or buy. In the absence of a standard of value for property, the law provides no means for ascertaining its value other than by the opinions of witnesses. 13 Enc. Ev. 485. All facts which tend to show damage or benefit to the property by reason of the improvement may be considered. The adaptability to business or other advantageous uses of that portion of the street on the viaduct, made possible by the construction of the viaduct, as bearing on the market value of the church property, may be considered. Likewise all the capabilities of the property, and all the uses to which it may be applied, or to which it is adapted, both before and after the improvement, may be considered. Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga. 30; 2 Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 706.

[6] 6. The trial occurred about four years after the completion of the viaduct. The city was allowed to prove that since the completion of the viaduct certain structures had been erected on it. In admitting the testimony the court ruled that the mere fact of the existence of the structures was irrelevant, but that if it was made to appear that the viaduct made it possible to improve the property in the neighborhood in a way that it could not have been improved without it, the evidence was admissible as illustrative of such possibilities. We think it was error to admit this evidence, because it allowed a consideration of elements of value that came into existence after the time the law fixes for the estimation of the value of the property in the process of ascertaining whether it had been damaged by the improvement, and, further, because any damage which may result to the church property from the construction of the viaduct cannot be diminished by a benefit which might come from the erection of buildings by third persons. The city cannot diminish the amount of the wrong by benefits which other people may give to the property. Chicago v. Le Moyne, 119 Fed. 662, 56 C. C. A. 278.

[7] 7. A similar point is presented in the ruling of the court on the clearance of the bawdyhouses from Collins street. It will be recalled that the railroad yards separated the southern end of Collins street and the northern end of Washington street, and there was no physical connection between these two streets. It will also be recalled that the viaduct extends longitudinally over Collins street for its entire length. The court allowed proof tending to show that the removal of the bawdyhouses was attributable to the erection of the viaduct, and that its effect was to specially enhance the value of the property of petitioner, as well as others, on the viaduct. We think the testimony, even when so restricted in effect as it was by the court, inadmissible.

[8] 8. The defendant offered in evidence a petition of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, which recited the passage of an ordinance relocating Waverly Way, and an ordinance expressing the city's consent to the closing of Waverly Way, and its relocation 90 feet south of the old location, on property to be deeded to the city by the railroad company. The evidence was objected to as irrelevant. The evidence was inadmissible. The issue was not whether Waverly Way was to be permanently closed or relocated, but whether the plaintiff's property had been damaged by the construction of the viaduct in the manner in which it was actually constructed.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN IRON & EQUIPMENT CO. v. VOYLES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEEDS (§ 47*)—SALES (§ 145*)—BILL OF SALE—ATTESTATION—DISQUALIFICATION OF NOTARY.

A notary public is disqualified from attesting a deed or bill of sale, so as to entitle it to record, if he is pecuniarily or beneficially interested in the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 104-110; Dec. Dig. § 47;* Sales, Cent. Dig. § 343; Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

2. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 20*)—DISQUALIFICATION OF NOTARY—STOCKHOLDER.

A stockholder of a corporation bears such financial relation to it that he is disqualified, on account of interest, from attesting as a notary a deed or bill of sale to which the corporation is a party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 104-111; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

3. ATTACHMENT (§ 180*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—INVALID CERTIFICATION—RECORD.

Where a corporation sells property, and takes from the vendee a conditional bill of sale, reserving title in the vendor until the purchase price is paid, and the vendee's signature is attested by a notary public who is a stockholder of the corporation, and where the conditional bill of sale is recorded, in a contest between the conditional bill of sale and a junior lien, such record will not give the conditional bill of sale priority over the younger lien, if the disqualification of the notary was known to the official of the corporation conducting the transaction, although such disqualification may not appear on the face of the paper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 550-575; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

4. ATTACHMENT (§ 180*)—LIEN—JUNIOR ATTACHMENT.

A junior attachment, levied on the property embraced in the conditional sale thus illegally recorded, but founded on a debt antecedent to the conditional bill of sale, has priority of lien over the conditional bill of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 550-575; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

Error from Superior Court, Clark County; Chas. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by George W. Voyles against W. S. Pickett. On levy of attachment, the Southern Iron & Equipment Company interposed a claim. After verdict for claimant, a new trial was granted, and claimant brings error. Affirmed.

Hamilton McWhorter and Lamar Rucker, both of Athens, for plaintiff in error. Thos. F. Green and Cobb & Erwin, all of Athens, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. An attachment issued in favor of George W. Voyles against W. S. Pickett, and was levied, on November 10, 1910, upon two railroad cars. A claim was interposed by the Southern Iron & Equipment Company. On the trial it appeared that the cars were sold by the claimant to the defendant in attachment, who executed to the claimant, on October 31, 1910, an instrument wherein it was contracted that the title to the cars was to remain in the claimant until the entire purchase money was paid. The instrument was attested by two unofficial persons and a notary public. It was recorded on November 18, 1910. The president of the claimant company and the notary public testified that the notary was a stockholder of the claimant at the time of the execution of the instrument, and had been such from the organization of the company in 1903 continuously to the time of the trial. The court directed a verdict for the claimant, and afterwards granted a new trial. The claimant excepted.

The controlling question in the case is whether a conditional bill of sale, attested by a stockholder of the claimant corporation, who is a notary public and recorded within the statutory period, shall prevail over the lien of a subsequent attachment on the property. The statute provides that when personal property is sold and delivered, with the condition affixed to the sale that the title shall remain in the vendor until the purchase price shall have been paid, such conditional sale, in order for the reservation of title to be valid as against third persons, shall be evidenced in writing. The statute further provides that conditional sales shall be recorded within 30 days from their date, and in other respects shall be governed by the laws relating to the registration of mortgages. Civil Code, §§ 3318, 3319. In order for a mortgage to be entitled to registry, it must be executed in the presence of, and attested by, or proved before, a notary public or justice of any court of this state or a clerk of the superior court (and, in case of real property, by one other witness). Civil Code, § 3258. A mortgage recorded without due attestation or probate shall not be held notice to subsequent bona fide purchasers or younger liens. Civil Code, § 3262. The contention is that the conditional bill of sale was illegally attested, in that the notary public was pecuniarily interested in the transaction, and therefore its record is not constructive notice of its existence to the holder of the younger attachment lien.

[1] The rule is universal that an officer cannot take an acknowledgment of his own deed. And "because of the probative force accorded to the certificate, as well as the usually important consequences of the instrument itself, public policy forbids that the act of taking and certifying the acknowledgment should be exercised by a person financially or beneficially interested in the transaction." 1 Cyc. 553. While there may be some diversity of opinion in the application of the rule in determining whether the officer is disqualified by interest in the particular case, the wisdom of the rule has never been doubted. The rule that interest will disqualify does not depend upon any statutory prohibition. It arises out of the fact that it is against public policy to permit a grantee or mortgagee, or other person beneficially interested in the transaction, to take an acknowledgment to an instrument in which he is named as a party or has a beneficial interest. The law contemplates that the attesting notary must not be in such pecuniary relationship to the transaction that there shall exist any temptation for him to be otherwise than impartial between the parties to the conveyance.

[2] It is maintained in a large majority of the decided cases, on this point, that a stockholder of a corporation beneficially interested in an instrument is disqualified from taking an acknowledgment thereof. 1 Devlin on Real Estate, § 477b. See note to the case of Ardmore National Bank v. Briggs Machinery Co., 16 Ann. Cas. 133, where a large number of cases are collected and examined; Betts-Evans Trading Co. v. Bass, 2 Ga. App. 718, 59 S. E. 8. While it is conceded, under the doctrine of corporate entity, that a stockholder has no independent ownership in the corporate property, nevertheless, if the corporate property is enhanced in value, he gets the benefit of the enhancement in the increased value of his shares; and while this benefit may be small, the amount of beneficial interest cannot be made the criterion of disqualification on the ground of interest. His shares of stock entitle him to such aliquot parts of the corporate property as his number of shares bears to the entire capital of the corporation. His holding of stock may be so large that almost any transaction of the corporation may affect the value of his shares. Indeed, a corporation may have only one stockholder (Exchange Bank v. Macon Co., 97 Ga. 1, 25 S. E. 326, 33 L. R. A. 800), and in such a case there would be no difference, even in degree, between the pecuniary interest of the stockholder and the corporation. His pecuniary relation to the corporation is so intimate that it cannot be said that he has no financial interest in a transaction to which the corporation is a party. Both upon reason and authority we consider a stockholder's relation to a corporation such as to disqualify him on the ground of interest from taking the acknowledgment as a notary to a conveyance to which the corporation is a party.

[3] All the authorities agree that, if an instrument discloses on its face that it is not entitled to record, the actual record of it is ineffectual to charge the public with constructive notice. Herndon v. Kimball, 7 Ga. 432, 50 Am. Dec. 406; MacKenzie v. Jackson, 82 Ga. 80, 8 S. E. 77; 1 Cyc. 529. There is a difference of opinion in the American courts as to the effect of a record of an instrument defectively acknowledged, where the defect does not appear on the face of the record. Some courts hold that a defectively acknowledged instrument is not entitled to record, whether the defect is apparent on the face of the instrument or not, and therefore the actual record of such an instrument does not import constructive notice. Smith v. Clark, 100 Iowa, 605, 69 N. W. 1011; Kothe v. Krag-Reynolds Co., 20 Ind. App. 293, 50 N. E. 594. Others hold that, where an instrument bearing a certificate of acknowledgment or proof which is regular on its face is presented to the recording officer, it becomes his duty to record it, and its record operates as constructive notice to third persons, notwithstanding there may be a hidden defect in the acknowledgment. National Bank of Fredericksburg v. Conway, Fed. Cas. No. 10,037; Ardmore National Bank v. Briggs, etc., Co., 20 Okl. 437, 94 Pac. 533, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1074, 129 Am. St. Rep. 747, 16 Ann. Cas. 133; Stevens v. Hampton, 46 Mo. 404; Morrow v. Cole, 58 N. J. Eq. 203, 42 Atl. 673. This court has never considered and adjudged the effect of the record of a defectively acknowledged instrument, where the defect was hidden, and the acknowledgment was regular on the face of the instrument, as between third parties in the determination of their respective rights. Nor do the facts require such adjudication in the instant case. But this court has decided, in at least three cases, that in a contest between a party to a defectively acknowledged instrument and an innocent third party, where the defect was hidden, such innocent third party may go dehors the record, and show by extrinsic proof that the instrument was defectively acknowledged, and that as between them the record is not notice of the existence of the instrument recorded. Nichols v. Hampton, 46 Ga. 253; White v. Magarahan, 87 Ga. 217, 13 S. E. 509; Baxley v. Baxley, 117 Ga. 60, 43 S. E. 436.

The argument is that, when one undertakes to circumvent the rights of others by the assertion of a superior right accruing solely from compliance with a statute conferring superiority, he must show full and complete compliance with the statute. A mortgagee has no natural equity over a subsequent purchaser or lienor without notice; and before he will be given this priority by virtue of the registry laws, he must bring himself within their precise terms. In Nichols v. Hampton, supra, a mortgage on personalty was attested by an unofficial witness. The mortgage was recorded on the probate affidavit of the witness before the attorney of the mortgagee, who was a notary public. The fact that the notary was attorney for the mortgagee did not appear from the probate affidavit or otherwise. The mortgagor sold the property to a subsequent purchaser before actual record of the mortgage. The mortgage was recorded within three months of its execution, and under the statute its record within that time was notice of its existence from the date of its execution. In a proceeding to subject the property to the lien of the mortgage, the court held that an affidavit probating a mortgage, taken before the attorney of the mortgagee, who is a notary public, is not a legal affidavit, and a mortgage recorded on such probate is not legally recorded, and gives no priority over a subsequent purchaser without actual notice. In White v. Magarahan, supra, the point arose in this way: Magarahan was a member of a firm who bought goods from White. As a basis of credit Magarahan represented that he was the owner of certain land, and goods were sold to the firm on the basis of that representation. At a period of the business transactions between Magarahan's firm and White, when the former did not owe the latter anything, Magarahan made a voluntary deed of the land to his wife and children. Subsequently Magarahan's firm bought other goods from White upon the original representation of Magarahan's ownership of the land. These goods were not paid for, and White obtained a judgment for their purchase price. Execution issued and was levied on the land, and a claim was interposed by the wife and children. The deed from Magarahan to his wife and children was in the usual form, and appeared to have been attested by three witnesses, one of whom was the clerk of the superior court. There was nothing on the face of the deed to indicate otherwise than all three witnesses were present and attested the deed when it was executed. On the trial it appeared that, when Magarahan carried the deed to the clerk's office to have it recorded, it was witnessed only by two unofficial witnesses. The clerk observed that the deed was not properly attested for record, and called Magarahan's attention to it. Whereupon Magarahan acknowledged the deed before the clerk; but the clerk, instead of making the statutory certificate, simply signed his name officially to the attestation clause. The court held that the paper was not entitled to record, because the acknowledgment by the maker was not certified as required by the statute, nor was the original attestation good, because of the failure of the clerk to sign at the time the deed was executed, and that the record was not notice of the execution of the deed at the time it bore date, though recorded within the statutory period. The case of Baxley v. Baxley, supra, was an ejectment case. The plaintiff and defendant claimed under a common grantor. Both deeds appeared on their face to have been properly executed for registration, and both were recorded. The plaintiff's deed was inferior in date to the defendant's, but it was made to appear on the trial by extrinsic proof that neither of the so-called attesting witnesses was present when the grantor signed the latter deed. It further appeared that the grantor handed the deed to the defendant's husband, who subsequently obtained the signatures of the witnesses, and in this condition delivered it to his wife. On these facts the court held that "a deed is not duly recorded on the affidavit of one whose name was affixed to the usual attestation clause, but who did not in fact hear the grantor acknowledge, or see him sign, the instrument."

The case in hand comes within the principle of these cases. The circumstances attending the execution of the conditional bill of sale authorize the inference that the managing officials of the corporation knew, at the time of its execution, that the attesting witness was a stockholder of the corporation. Of course, he was bound to know the law that a stockholder, who is a notary, cannot take the acknowledgment to an instrument to which the corporation is a party. Therefore knowledge to the corporation is imputable that the conditional bill of sale was not entitled to go to record, and its procuring the record of an instrument not entitled to record, and known to be such at the time, cannot serve to defeat the lien of one acquired without notice of the existence of the conditional bill of sale.

[4] The claimant further contends that, aside from the defective attestation of its conditional bill of sale, it is entitled to prevail over the attaching creditor, because the latter's lien was based on an indebtedness incurred previously to the execution of its conditional bill of sale. We do not think so. The statute provides that a mortgage or conditional sale recorded without due attestation or probate shall not be held notice to subsequent bona fide purchasers or younger liens. Civil Code, § 3262. This statute makes it the duty of a mortgagee to see that his mortgage is duly attested for record, and, if he fails in this regard, then his mortgage is postponed to younger liens. The question is not an open one; for it has been distinctly decided that "a judgment junior in date to a mortgage illegally recorded for want of probate, but founded on a debt antecedent to the date of the mortgage, has priority of lien to the mortgage." Andrews v. Mathews, 59 Ga. 466; Richards v. Myers, 63 Ga. 762; New England, etc., Co. v. Ober, 84 Ga. 294, 10 S. E. 625; Cottrell v. Merchants' & Mechanics' Bank, 89 Ga. 517, 15 S. E. 944. As the same rules govern the priority of conditional bills of sale, as affected by registry, which govern the registry of mortgages, it follows that, if the conditional bill of sale be illegally recorded, the property therein described is subject to a younger attachment lien founded on an antecedent debt.

McNAUGHTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)
CRIMINAL LAW (§ 945*)—NEW TRIAL—PROBABLE EFFECT OF EVIDENCE.

Where rebutting evidence is submitted by the state on motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence, and the newly discovered evidence, considering the evidence on the trial, would probably not produce a different result, the refusal will be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law. Cent. Dig. §§ 2324-2327, 2336; Dec. Dig. § 945.*]

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

W. J. McNaughton was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

This case was before the Supreme Court on a former occasion. McNaughton v. State, 136 Ga. 600, 71 S. E. 1038. After the judgment of the Supreme Court, affirming the judgment of the superior court in refusing to grant a new trial, was made the judgment of the latter court, the plaintiff in error, at the April term, 1912, made an extraordinary motion for new trial, under the provisions of Civil Code, § 6092, on the ground of certain evidence alleged to have been discovered after the trial, and after the original motion for new trial had been overruled, and immediately preceding the term of court to which the motion for new trial on extraordinary grounds was filed. After considering this evidence, and other evidence offered in rebuttal by the state, the court overruled the motion and refused to grant a new trial. The movant excepted.

A. L. Franklin, of Augusta, F. H. Saffold, of Swainsboro, W. W. Larsen, of Dublin, and Wilson, Bennett & Lambdin, of Waycross, for plaintiff in error. Alfred Herrington, Sol. Gen., of Swainsboro, T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., and Hines & Jordan and R. R. Arnold, all of Atlanta, for the State.

PER CURIAM. This was an extraordinary motion for new trial upon the ground of alleged newly discovered evidence. In view of the rebutting evidence submitted by the state on the hearing of the motion, and the improbability, considering the evidence upon the trial, that the alleged newly discovered evidence would produce a different result on another trial, the judgment refusing a new trial must be affirmed. See Malone v. Hopkins, 49 Ga. 221, and other cases collated in 14 Michie's Dig. 398.

ATKINSON, J. While I am of the opinion that the evidence on the trial was not sufficient to authorize the verdict, I concur in the opinion that the alleged newly discovered evidence would not probably produce a different result.

KIMBRELL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—REMARKS BY COURT—NO ERROR.

There was no merit in the assignment of error upon the rulings of the court in rejecting evidence, or those relative to remarks by the court made when the testimony was excluded.

2. CHARGE OF COURT—OPINION AS TO FACTS—ARGUMENTATIVE CHARGES.

The assignments of error upon excerpts from the charge, to which there were exceptions severally on the ground that they were not authorized by the evidence, that the court expressed an opinion as to the facts, that they were argumentative, and that they did not properly state the contentions of the state and the accused, were without merit.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the only evidence as to the violent character of the deceased was that he was turbulent and violent when drinking, and there was no evidence that he was drinking or under the influence of liquor at the time of the homicide, the failure to charge as to the character of the deceased was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614, 616-620, 622-630; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

4. REQUESTS COVERED BY GENERAL CHARGE.

In so far as the requests to charge embodied correct legal principles applicable to the case as made by the evidence, they were fully, fairly, and specifically covered by the general charge.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

Where the prisoner in his statement claimed that the deceased had made threats to him, there was no error in failing to charge the law applicable to threats, on the basis of such statement, in the absence of a request therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996-2004; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on the trial of one for murder, there was evidence on behalf of the accused of uncommunicated threats made against him by the deceased, the failure to charge, without request, in regard to the law touching such threats, was not error; the court having fully charged the law of murder, manslaughter, and justifiable homicide, including the doctrine of reasonable fears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996-2004; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 761*)—HOMICIDE (§ 286*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTIONS AS TO FACTS—MALICE.

The court charged "that the purchase of a weapon beforehand for the purpose of killing deceased, if the evidence shows that he purchased it beforehand to kill this man, you may take that, if that is shown, as evidence of malice to that extent. It is for you to determine whether or not he purchased it for that purpose. But if he simply purchased it, but not for that purpose, then it would not be evidence of malice, and you would not be authorized to so take it." This charge, when considered in connection with the entire charge, was not error on the ground that it "assumed that the defendant purchased the pistol beforehand for the purpose of killing deceased," or upon the ground "that the purchase of a pistol for self-protection does not show evidence of malice."

8. HOMICIDE (§ 295*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVOCATION.

The court charged "that provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder," as applicable to one phase of the case. The portion of the charge so quoted was not error, on the ground that "provocations by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures may reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter, but in all cases it is a question for jury to decide, and not for the court."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 606-609; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

9. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL—NO ERROR.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Jim Kimbrell was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Jim Kimbrell was indicted for the murder of Jim McCart by shooting him with a pistol. On the trial the jury convicted the accused and recommended him to the mercy of the court. WASHINGTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 828*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

In the absence of a timely written request, it is not erroneous for the court to omit to charge the law upon the subject of the impeachment of witnesses. Brown v. McBride, 129 Ga. 92 (7), 58 S. E. 702; Baker v. State, 121 Ga. 189, 48 S. E. 967; Phillips v. State, 121 Ga. 358, 49 S. E. 290.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was no evidence as to difference in race and social standing of the accused and the woman alleged to have been raped; hence under no view was it error for the judge to fail to charge the doctrine of Dorsey v. State, 108 Ga. 477 (2), 34 S. E. 135, to the effect that such matters may be considered in determining the intent with which the accused acted, etc.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

The woman alleged to have been raped testified to the fact, and her testimony was corroborated by that of other witnesses. Error was assigned upon the failure of the judge to charge, without request, "that the accused should not be convicted upon the woman's testimony alone, however positive it may be, unless her testimony was corroborated by other evidence." Held that, under the facts stated, there was no error in such omission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996-2004; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 918*)—TRIAL—CUSTODY AND DELIBERATIONS OF JURY.

"Where the sheriff deputized a person to take charge of the jury pending the trial of a criminal case, and the appointee acted as bailiff and had charge of the jury, without being sworn, a new trial will be granted." Roberts v. State, 72 Ga. 673.

(a) Accordingly, where, after a jury had retired to consider of their verdict in a felony case, the sheriff deputized a person who was not an officer to take charge of the jury, and the person so deputized, not having been sworn, accompanied them to a boarding house to get supper, and afterwards accompanied them to the courthouse, where they were put in charge of the sheriff, a new trial must be granted, although it appears from the affidavit of such appointee upon the hearing of the motion for new trial that the jury were in his custody "for not more than 40 minutes," and "that affiant guarded said jury, kept them segregated from other persons, and that affiant said nothing in the presence of said jury in reference to said case, and no member of said jury said anything in the presence of affiant in reference to said case, and that no member of said jury had any communication with any other person in said case during said time."

(b) The facts above recited are similar to the facts involved in the case of Roberts v. State, supra, and the ruling there made requires that a new trial should be granted.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; K. J. Hawkins, Judge.

General Washington was convicted of rape, and brings error. Reversed.

General Washington was indicted in Laurens County for the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed on the person of Ada Wright. Both were persons of color, and there was no evidence as to difference in their social standing. The jury convicted the accused, and recommended him to the mercy of the court. A motion for new trial was made, which was afterwards amended. On the hearing the judge overruled the motion and refused a new trial. The defendant excepted.

WALL v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 9, 1912.)

EJECTMENT (§ 95*)—EVIDENCE—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

The rule is that, where the plaintiff in an action for land claims under an administrator's deed, proof that the intestate died seised and possessed of the property, and that it was sold by the administrator of his estate under an order granted by the ordinary, is sufficient evidence of title, without proof of title in the intestate. This rule, however, is not applicable in the case at bar. The action was in the statutory form for the recovery of land. The land sought to be recovered was a narrow strip on each side of the track of the defendant railway company, which ran through what was known as the "Jordan place." The real issue was as to the width of the right of way of the railway company; the plaintiff's contention being that it was only 20 feet wide, that is, 10 feet on each side from the center of the track; the defendant railway company's contention being that the right of way was 100 feet wide, that is, 50 feet on each side from the center of the track. So that the strips in controversy were 40 feet wide, running parallel with the track on each side thereof, and 10 feet therefrom. There was evidence in behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that the intestate, under whom the plaintiff claimed, died "seised and possessed of the 'Jordan place.'" There was uncontradicted evidence to the effect that the railway company had a track in use at the same place through the "Jordan place" during the lifetime of Jordan, and many years prior to the time that the intestate went into the possession of the "Jordan place"; but there was nothing tending to show the width of the right of way of the railway company over the land at that time. It is clear, therefore, that the evidence wholly failed to show that the intestate died seised and possessed of the strips of land sued for. It necessarily follows, as the plaintiff failed to show title from any other source or in any other way, that the verdict in favor of the defendant, the railway company, was demanded under the evidence. It is unnecessary, in view of this fact, to pass upon the assignments of error as to rulings made during the trial.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1170*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW—INACCURACIES—REVERSAL.

While there are some inaccuracies in the charges complained of, when considered separately, yet, taken as a whole in the light of the evidence in the case, there should not be a reversal of the judgment of the court below refusing a new trial.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 108*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The newly discovered evidence was largely, though not entirely, cumulative, and, taken in connection with the affidavits in rebuttal thereto submitted by the defendant in error, was not of such a character as to make it an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge to refuse a new trial on that ground.

WHITAKER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 14, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1124*)—WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

"When no bona fide attempt is made to file a brief of evidence in accordance with the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 6093, but a document is filed, and approved by the trial judge, which includes the oral and documentary evidence without abridgment, in violation of the provisions of such section," the motion for new trial does not stand in the appellate court upon the same footing as if no brief of the evidence at all were filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2939, 2946-2948; Dec. Dig. § 1124.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1124*)—WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

While a brief of evidence is a statutory requisite of a valid motion for new trial, there may, however, be a valid motion for new trial so far as to enable the reviewing court to consider and pass on assignments of error not dependent for determination upon the evidence, although the paper filed as a brief of evidence in connection with the motion shows that in its preparation no bona fide effort was made to comply with the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 6093.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2939, 2946-2948; Dec. Dig. § 1124.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1124*)—WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

(a) Where a paper purporting to be a brief of evidence, but not made up according to the requirements of the Civil Code, § 6093, "is approved by the trial judge, and the motion for a new trial is thereupon overruled and the case is brought to the Court of Appeals upon writ of error complaining of such judgment," the Court of Appeals should not "deal with the case as though no valid motion for new trial had been filed by the movant."

(b) If, in such a case, the Court of Appeals "discovers charges of the court which appear abstractly erroneous, or, in a criminal case, not applicable to the charge made in the indictment, or that there have been errors prima facie committed in the admission or rejection of testimony, and these errors are complained of in the motion for new trial," the judgment overruling the motion for new trial should be reversed, provided that any of the assignments of error on the points above stated can be determined without reference to the evidence, and, furthermore, that the error appears to be such that the plaintiff in error was manifestly thereby injured. Otherwise the judgment should be affirmed.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 1124, 1122*)—WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

(a) "When there is no legal brief of evidence filed with the motion for new trial, but only a document which fails to comply with the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 6093," the Court of Appeals should not look to such a document for the purpose of determining the questions raised in the motion for new trial.

(b) There may be cases wherein it can "be said, * * * without an examination of the evidence, that an instruction of the trial judge, abstractly erroneous, [was] so hurtful to the plaintiff in error as to require a reversal of the judgment" overruling a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2939, 2946–2948, 2940–2945; Dec. Dig. §§ 1124, 1122.*]

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

W. P. Whitaker was convicted of crime, and brings error. Heard on questions certified by the Court of Appeals. Questions answered.

For opinion of Court of Appeals, see 75 S. E. 258.

Gober & Griffin, of Marietta, for plaintiff. J. P. Brooke, Sol. Gen., of Alpharetta, for the State.

FISH, C. J. The Court of Appeals has certified to this court certain questions, which we will state and deal with seriatim.

[1] 1. The first question is: "When no bona fide attempt is made to file a brief of evidence in accordance with the provisions of Civil Code (1910), § 6093, but a document is filed, and approved by the trial judge, which includes the oral and documentary evidence without abridgment, in violation of the provisions of such section, should the motion for new trial stand upon the same footing as though no effort had been made to comply with the provisions of such section of the Code?" We will say in the outset that in one of the briefs filed in this court in behalf of the plaintiff in error, in the case to which the questions relate, the contention is vigorously urged that the evidence introduced upon the trial of such case was briefed in accordance with the requirements of the statute, approved by the trial judge, and duly filed as a part of the motion for new trial. It will appear from an examination of the questions certified that no inquiry is made of this court as to whether or not a legal brief of the evidence was filed in the case. Nor is this court asked in any of the certified questions whether or not any specific assignment of error made in the motion for new trial can be considered and decided by the Court of Appeals without reference to the evidence. Obviously, therefore, it is not in order for this court to deal with such matters. There are many decisions of this court to the effect that a brief of the evidence is an indispensable statutory requisite to a valid motion for new trial. In other words, if there is no brief of evidence, no motion for new trial exists. This is clearly deducible from the Civil Code, § 6080, and from Rule 20 of the superior court embodied in the Civil Code, § 6306. See, also, Civ. Code, § 6090. It is unnecessary to cite the great number of cases wherein the above cited rule has been applied; but we call attention to Baker v. Johnson, 99 Ga. 374, 27 S. E. 706, wherein it was held that the trial judge properly dismissed the motion for new trial because no brief of evidence had been prepared and presented in accordance with the order of the judge, although the sole ground of the motion relied on was the disqualification of one of the jurors who tried the case. A similar ruling was made in Mize v. Americus, etc., Co., 106 Ga. 140, 32 S. E. 22. The rule is recognized in Holloman v. Small, 111 Ga. 812 (1), 35 S. E. 665; Brooks v. Proctor, 111 Ga. 835 (1), 36 S. E. 99; Hyatt v. Cowan, 115 Ga. 608, 41 S. E. 985; Blackburn v. Alabama Midland Ry. Co., 116 Ga. 936, 43 S. E. 366; Blakeman v. State, 121 Ga. 334, 49 S. E. 261; Moxley v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 122 Ga. 493, 50 S. E. 339. Other cases in point will be found collated in 13 Enc. Dig. Ga. R. 223; 15 Enc. Dig. Ga. R. 299. Where, however, a paper purporting to be a brief of evidence has been filed and approved by the trial judge, but from which it appears no bona fide effort has been made to comply with the provisions of Civil Code, § 6093, requiring that briefs of evidence shall be a condensed and succinct brief of the material portions of the oral testimony as well as the documentary evidence, the writ of error should not be dismissed, but, as has been held in numerous cases by this court, if there be in such a case assignments of error which do not involve a consideration of the evidence for their determination, they will be decided. Crumbley v. Brook, 135 Ga. 723, 70 S. E. 655. To the same effect, see the cases cited in 2 Enc. Dig. Ga. R. 612 (D); 13 Enc. Dig. Ga. R. 233 (C2); 15 Enc. Dig. Ga. R. 310 (1V-A-1-a). It follows that the first question must be answered in the negative; that is, that a motion for a new trial, accompanied by a paper purporting to be a brief of the evidence filed and approved by the trial judge, but in the preparation of which it appears that there has been no bona fide effort to comply with the provisions of the Civil Code, § 6093, does not stand upon the same footing as a paper presented as a motion for a new trial unaccompanied by anything purporting to be a brief of the evidence introduced on the trial.

[2] 2. The second question is: "Can there be a valid motion for a new trial in a case where no attempt has been made to file a brief of evidence, and the document filed as a brief of evidence is not in compliance with the provisions of Civil Code (1910), § 6093?" From what we have said in reply to the first question, it follows that the second question must be answered in the affirmative; that is, there may be a valid motion for new trial in a case where a paper purporting to be a brief of the evidence filed as such in connection with the motion for new trial, but not made up in accordance with the Civil Code, § 6093, so far as to authorize the appellate court to consider and decide any point raised in the motion not dependent for determination upon the evidence.

[3] 3. The first inquiry in the third question is as follows: "Where no legal brief of evidence is filed, but a document such as is described in the preceding questions is tendered as a brief of evidence, and is approved by the trial judge, and the motion for a new trial is thereupon overruled and the case is brought to the Court of Appeals upon writ of error complaining of such judgment, should this court deal with the case as though no valid motion for new trial had been filed by the movant?"

(a) In view of what we have already said in answer to the foregoing questions, it is apparent that this inquiry must be answered in the negative; that is, such a case as that stated should not be dealt with by the appellate court as though no valid motion for new trial had been filed by the movant, because unaccompanied by any paper purporting to be a brief of the evidence.

(b) The second inquiry embodied in the third question is as follows: Should the Court of Appeals in such case, as just above stated, "reverse the judgment overruling the motion for new trial if it discovers charges of the court which appear to be abstractly erroneous, or, in a criminal case, not applicable to the charge made in the indictment, or that there have been errors prima facie committed in the admission or rejection of testimony, and these errors are complained of in the motion for new trial?" Our answer is, if it should be apparent from a consideration of the record, other than the so-called brief of evidence, that the plaintiff in error has been manifestly injured by one or more of such errors, without regard to what the evidence on the trial may have been, then there should be a reversal of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial; otherwise the judgment should be affirmed, as it is incumbent upon the plaintiff in error to show, not only error, but that he has thereby been injured. In McPherson v. Chandler, 137 Ga. 129, 72 S. E. 948, where the action was for illegal arrest and malicious prosecution, this court found the brief of evidence so imperfect in omitting essential parts of the evidence that it declined to treat it as made up in compliance with the requirements of Civil Code, § 6093, and held that none of the assignments of error requiring a consideration of the evidence could be passed on, but reversed the judgment of the trial court in overruling a motion for new trial on several assignments of error in the motion, on charges of the court and the exclusion of evidence, which could be considered and determined without reference to the so-called brief of evidence, and which were manifestly prejudicial to the plaintiff in error. In another recent case—Monroe v. Martin, 137 Ga. 262, 73 S. E. 341—the suit was on a promissory note brought by the executor of the payee against the maker, who pleaded a contemporaneous written agreement between himself and the payee, containing a covenant never to sue on the note. The case had formerly been before this court (Martin v. Monroe, 107 Ga. 330, 33 S. E. 62), when it was held that such covenant in effect relieved the maker from liability on the note as to the payee thereof and his legal representative. On the last trial the plaintiff amended his petition by alleging that the defendant on stated occasions "recognized the validity of such note and promised your petitioner to pay the same to him." The court on that trial instructed the jury as to such amendment to the following effect: That if plaintiff's testator, at the time the note was executed, covenanted with the defendant in writing never to sue on the same, yet, if after the testator's death, the defendant expressly agreed to pay the note to plaintiff as executor, the moral obligation resting on the defendant to pay the debt would be sufficient to sustain the new contract and promise to pay the note, and the defendant would be liable to pay the same, notwithstanding such previous covenant with the plaintiff's testator. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled, and he excepted. Upon the hearing before this court, counsel for the defendant in error contended that the brief of evidence which had been duly approved and certified to this court should be disregarded, for the reason that it was not made up in compliance with the provisions of the Civil Code, § 6093. Presiding Justice Evans, who delivered the opinion, said: "This court has frequently pointed out the necessity of a compliance with the act of the General Assembly in the preparation of briefs of evidence. Only relevant and material evidence should be included, and repetitions should be avoided. We do not find it necessary to examine the brief of evidence in ruling upon the controlling points in this case. Where points of law are made in the record, and they can be passed on without reference to the evidence, this court will decide them. The instruction, which we hold to be erroneous, does not require a consideration of the evidence to demonstrate the necessity of another trial." In that case it was apparent from the pleadings in the case without reference to the evidence that the erroneous instruction was palpably injurious to the defendant. Another case where this court passed on legal questions not dependent for determination on the evidence, which were raised in a motion for a new trial, and where the evidence was not briefed in compliance with the statute, is Equitable Mortgage Co. v. Bell, 115 Ga. 651 (2), 42 S. E. 82. Other cases where the same rule was followed, but in which there was no motion for new trial, are St. Amand v. Lehman, 120 Ga. 253 (3, 4), 47 S. E. 949; De Loach v. Planters, etc., of Georgia, 122 Ga. 335 (2), 50 S. E. 141; Crumbley v. Brook, 135 Ga. 723, 70 S. E. 655. It is impracticable for this court to make up a catalogue of instances wherein the case stated by the Court of Appeals in the second division of the third question, the judgment of the trial court in refusing a new trial should be reversed or affirmed on account of one or more of the errors committed by the trial court as stated in the second division of the question under consideration. The appellate court must, when such cases come before it, determine in each case whether the assignment of error can be passed on and determined from the record without reference to the evidence, and, if the assignment of error be meritorious, whether or not the plaintiff in error has been thereby manifestly injured. The same rule is applicable to both civil and criminal cases.

An instruction to the jury upon the trial of a criminal case not applicable to the charge made in the indictment might for the very reason of its patent inapplicability be not cause for reversing a judgment overruling a motion for new trial. Suppose upon the trial of one charged with larceny an instruction should be given defining express or implied malice. It would be manifest that such an instruction could not possibly have injured the accused. On the contrary, if on the trial of one charged with rape the law as to the offense of seduction should be given in charge and the accused should be found guilty of seduction, a judgment overruling the motion of the accused for a new trial wherein such instruction was excepted to should be reversed, even though the evidence could not be considered, for obviously the accused would have been injured by such an erroneous instruction. Of course, such illustrative cases might be stated practically without number. So suppositive cases might be stated where error in the admission or rejection of testimony was so slight or immaterial as to be harmless, without reference to the evidence submitted in the case. On the other hand, cases may be easily supposed where the testimony admitted or rejected was of such a character, when considered in connection with the record aside from the evidence, as to make it manifest that the party complaining was injured by its admission or rejection.

[4] 4. The fourth question certified is as follows: "Assuming that a plaintiff in error must show both error and injury, when there is no legal brief of evidence filed with the motion for new trial, but only a document which fails to comply with the provisions of Civil Code (1910), § 6093, should this court look to such a document for any purpose, and can it be said in any case without an examination of the evidence that an instruction of the trial judge, abstractly erroneous, is so hurtful to the plaintiff in error as to require a reversal of the judgment?" It is apparent from what we have said in reply to the other questions that the first inquiry propounded in this question must be answered in the negative, and that an affirmative answer must be given to the second inquiry made in this fourth question. All the Justices concur.

(11 Ga. App. 208)

WHITAKER v. STATE. (No. 3,714.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 5, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 26*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The indictment sufficiently charged the offense of cheating and swindling to withstand general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 29*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The special demurrers, to the effect that the deceitful means and artful practices by which the fraud was consummated are not sufficiently set forth, are not well taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 34-36; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 7*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

An indictment for cheating and swindling may be predicated of a false representation relating partly to matters of fact and partly to matters of opinion, where it is alleged that the loss to the prosecutor ensued through his acting upon the false representation as to the fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 5-12, 25; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 9*)—DEFENSES—NEG-LIGENCE OF PERSON INJURED.

To an indictment for cheating and swindling by false representations, it is no objection that the false matters alleged were of such a nature that the person defrauded could, by making an independent investigation, have ascertained that they were false, before he acted upon them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

5. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 72*)—SUFFICIENCY OF ACCUSATION—DESCRIPTIVE TERMS—"OR."

An indictment is subject to demurrer if the descriptive terms relating to any material allegation are set forth in an alternate form. The word "or" is generally used as a disjunctive, and to express the notion that the two clauses which it connects are alternative; but this is not always so. It may properly be used to introduce a statement which is an amplification or explanation of a preceding statement. The use of the word in the present indictment was of the latter nature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 195-199; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5002-5015; vol. 8, p. 7739.]

6. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 36*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

Where an indictment alleges a false statement, and the statement relates to a number of different facts, it is not necessary that the indictment should allege that loss resulted from each and all of these statements which proved untrue, but, if it be alleged that any one of the material false statements resulted in loss, the indictment will be sufficient, so far as this point is concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1124*)—WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Where no bona fide attempt is made to file a brief of evidence in accordance with the provisions of section 6093 of the Civil Code 1910, but a document is filed and approved by the trial judge which includes the documentary and oral evidence without abridgment, in violation of the provisions of that section, the reviewing court will determine only such assignments of error in the motion for a new trial as can be considered without reference to the evidence in the case.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 804*)—INSTRUCTIONS—FORM—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING.

The trial judge was duly requested to put his charge in writing. As written out, the charge contained the following statement: At one place there was a note in parenthesis as follows: "(Here the court reads section 710 of volume 2 of the Code of 1910, leaving off the words at the top, 'other offenses of like character.')" In another place in the charge the following appears: "Here the court reads the indictment in full, leaving off the names of the grand jurors who returned it, and leaving off the entries on the back of the indictment." In another place in the charge the following notation was made: "Here the court charged paragraph one of the defendant's request, No. 1." In another place: "Here the court charged paragraphs second and fourth of defendant's request, No. 2." Held, that such a charge was not a compliance with the mandatory requirement of section 1056 of the Penal Code of 1910, and the failure of the trial judge to write out his charge as prescribed by that section demands a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1948-1957; Dec. Dig. § 804.*]

9. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 45*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On the trial of an indictment for cheating and swindling in fraudulently misrepresenting the value upon a specified date of shares of stock in an alleged corporation, evidence as to the value of such stock both before and after the date of the misrepresentation may be material as illustrating the probable value of the stock on that date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

10. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 52*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

Upon the trial of such an indictment, a request to charge that if the jury believed the defendant in good faith thought the purchase of the stock was a safe investment, and honestly made a mistake as to its value, he could not be convicted, was pertinent, and should have been given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

11. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 45*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In the trial of such a case, evidence of purchases of shares of stock in the alleged corporation by persons other than the prosecutor, and the price which such persons paid for the stock, was admissible as a circumstance tending to illustrate the probable value of the stock, unless it appeared that such other purchases were also made as a result of misrepresentations made by the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 403*)—EVIDENCE—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—EXISTENCE OF CORPORATE CHARTER.

When it becomes material to prove that no charter has ever been granted to an alleged banking corporation, this fact must be proved by the testimony of some person who has examined the records in the office of the Secretary of State, where, by law, the records of such incorporation are required to be kept.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 889; Dec. Dig. § 403.*]

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 442*)—EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION.

The document purporting to be a certificate of stock in the alleged banking corporation was prima facie not admissible, without proof as to the genuineness of the signatures of the alleged president and secretary of the corporation. If it should in fact appear from the evidence that this document was the one delivered by the defendant to the prosecutor as a certificate of stock in the alleged corporation, it would be immaterial whether the signatures of the alleged officers were genuine or not.

14. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 406*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS.

The answer of the defendant filed in the receivership proceedings involving the solvency of the alleged banking corporation was not inadmissible for any of the reasons assigned in the motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 785, 894-927; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 400*)—EVIDENCE—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—CERTIFIED COPIES.

The original record of a petition in bankruptcy in the United States court, and the original schedules thereto attached, are not admissible in evidence in the trial of an action brought in one of the courts of this state. A duly certified copy of such original records is the highest and best evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 879-886; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

16. OTHER ASSIGNMENTS NOT CONSIDERED.

The foregoing headnotes deal with all the assignments of error which can be considered without reference to the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

W. P. Whitaker was convicted of cheating and swindling, and brings error. Reversed.

Certified questions answered by Supreme Court (75 S. E. 254).

Gober & Griffin, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Brooke, Sol. Gen., of Alpharetta, for the State.

POTTLE, J. [1] 1. The indictment charged the defendant, W. P. Whitaker, with the offense of cheating and swindling, for that he "did unlawfully then and there falsely and fraudulently represent to one T. L. Underwood that the Bank of Kennesaw was incorporated, and was perfectly solvent, and that the stock in said bank was well worth the sum of hundred and seven ($107.00) dollars per share of one hundred dollars, and, by thus making said false and fraudulent representations and statements, did then and there induce the said T. L. Underwood, who relied upon said false and fraudulent representations and statements as true, to buy from him, the said W. P. Whitaker, two shares of said stock, or what purported to be two shares of stock in said Bank of Kennesaw, for which the said T. L. Underwood paid him, the said W. P. Whitaker, the sum of two hundred dollars, when in truth and in fact the stock in said Bank of Kennesaw was not worth anything of value, and was of no value, whereby the said T. L. Underwood was cheated and defrauded out of two hundred dollars, and was deceived, imposed upon, and damaged in said sum by relying upon and believing said false and fraudulent representations and statements, as made by the said W. P. Whitaker as aforesaid, and which said false and fraudulent representations and statements the said W. P. Whitaker knew then and there to be false and untrue." The defendant demurred to the indictment generally and on a number of special grounds. As against general demurrer, it was certainly sufficient under Penal Code 1910, § 719.

[2] 2. Special demurrer to the effect that the indictment does not set forth the deceitful means or artful practices that were used is not well taken.

[3] 3. The point made by special demurrer that the alleged false representations were representations not of facts, but merely of opinions, is not meritorious. The statement that the bank was incorporated is a statement of fact. The statement that it was perfectly solvent is likewise a statement of fact, and the further statement that the stock in the bank was well worth the sum of $107 per share, though perhaps a statement of an opinion, was properly included in the indictment; for cheating and swindling may be predicated of a representation which in part alleges a fact and in part an opinion.

[4] 4. The demurrer on the ground that the indictment showed that the prosecutor could by the exercise of reasonable diligence have investigated and discovered that the alleged false statements were not true, if in point of fact they were not true, is not well taken, (1) because the demurrer is speaking; (2) because it does not rob a false statement of its culpability, so far as a prosecution for cheating and swindling is concerned, for it to appear that the prosecutor acted upon it instead of making an investigation elsewhere for the purpose of discovering the truth. Crawford v. State, 117 Ga. 247, 43 S. E. 762; Id., 4 Ga. App. 789, 62 S. E. 501.

[5] 5. The allegations in the indictment that the accused induced Underwood to buy from him "two shares of said stock, or what purported to be two shares of stock, in said Bank of Kennesaw," is demurred to on the ground that it does not definitely allege whether it was two shares or what purported to be two shares in the Bank of Kennesaw that Underwood was induced to buy. The rule is well settled in this state that an indictment must not state essential of the offense in the alternative, and, since the word "or" is usually a disjunctive conjunction indicating an alternative between two different things, it is generally an improper word to be used to connect the affirmative allegations of an indictment. For instance, it is bad to charge that the defendant shot "with a gun or a pistol." But this is not the only use of the word "or." It is sometimes used to introduce a reiteration of the same idea, and to express it in a somewhat different way. Thus for an indictment to charge that liquor was sold "to a minor or to a person under twenty-one years" is not to charge the crime in the alternative, for the manifest meaning of the language in that case is simply to make the last clause explanatory of the first. So in this case the allegation that the accused sold Underwood two shares of stock, or what purported to be two shares of stock, in the bank in question, means that he sold him that which, if the bank had been incorporated, would have been shares of stock, but which, since the bank was not incorporated, is to be more properly called "what purported to be" two shares of stock. In other words, the expression "shares of stock," as applied to an unincorporated bank, would not, if left to stand alone, be an accurate expression, though it is a common expression used by the people to express a notion, even as applied to an unincorporated bank; and the pleader in this case, by the use of the additional expression "or what purported to be two shares of stock," merely amplified his previous allegation, and made it more certain. Hence, the indictment is not subject to the demurrer aimed against it on this ground.

[6] 6. The demurrer makes the further point that it is not shown that any loss resulted to the prosecutor because it turned out that the bank was not incorporated. It may be, and probably is, true that, if the sole false statement alleged was that the bank was incorporated, the allegation as to how the prosecutor's loss came about would not be sufficient to support the indictment, but it must be kept in mind that this is not the sole false statement alleged. The whole of the false statement as charged against the accused is that he represented that the Bank of Kennesaw was incorporated, that it was perfectly solvent, and that its stock was worth more than par. Each of these statements was false. The loss occurred because the stock was of no value. This being a natural and proximate result of the bank's insolvency (that is, from the falsity of the statement that the bank was solvent), there is a sufficient proximity of connection between the falsity of the statement and the loss that came to the prosecutor through the stock's being worthless. We are not now discussing the question as to the admissibility of evidence under this indictment, or as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the indictment. What we are here attempting to show is that there is a direct connection between one material portion of the false statement and the loss to the prosecutor, according to the allegations of the indictment. It is not necessary, in an indictment for cheating and swindling, that the loss be shown to have come about as the direct and natural result of the falsity of each or all of the statements made in the representations on which the indictment is based. It is proper to set out in the indictment the entire statement, and to show that by reason of any portion of this statement's proving false loss resulted in the manner set out in the indictment. To illustrate, suppose in this case the indictment had alleged the same false statement and had charged that the loss came about by reason of the fact that the prosecutor had been exposed to liability and consequent loss as a partner in the unincorporated bank, when he could not have been so exposed if the bank had been chartered. In the case just supposed the indictment would have been good on the theory that the loss alleged was a natural result flowing from the falsity of the statement that the bank was incorporated, and certainly the indictment would sustain a conviction if these two allegations were proved, notwithstanding it turned out that at the time the representation was made stock in it was of the market value asserted by the accused. We conclude that the demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled.

[7] 7. A judgment of affirmance was entered by the Court of Appeals in this case, and subsequently a motion for rehearing, filed by the plaintiff in error, was granted. The court had previously reached the conclusion that the document appearing in the record as a brief of the evidence was not a compliance with section 6093 of the Civil Code 1910, and that for this reason the court was without power or authority to pass upon any ground of the motion for new trial. An order was entered requiring the case to be reargued, in order that this court might re-examine the question whether or not it had authority to consider any of the assignments of error contained in the motion for new trial, in view of the fact that no legal brief of evidence was incorporated in the record and tendered to the judge in connection with the motion for new trial. In other words, the court decided to hear reargument upon the question as to whether or not the motion for new trial stood upon the same footing as if no brief of evidence at all had been filed. The court in its order declined expressly to reopen the question as to whether the brief of evidence was legally prepared. After reargument, the Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court for instruction the following questions: "When no bona fide attempt is made to file a brief of evidence in accordance with the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 6093, but a document is filed, and approved by the trial judge, which includes the oral and documentary evidence without abridgment, in violation of the provisions of such section, should the motion for new trial stand upon the same footing as though no effort had been made to comply with the provisions of such section of the Code? Can there be a valid motion for a new trial in a case where no attempt has been made to file a brief of evidence, and the document filed as a brief of evidence is not in compliance with the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 6093? Where no legal brief of evidence is filed, but a document such as is described in the preceding questions is tendered as a brief of evidence, and is approved by the trial judge, and the motion for a new trial is thereupon overruled and the case is brought to the Court of Appeals upon writ of error complaining of such judgment, should this court deal with the case as though no valid motion for new trial had been filed by the movant; and should the Court of Appeals in such a case reverse the judgment overruling the motion for new trial, if it discovers charges of the court which appear to be abstractly erroneous, or, in a criminal case, not applicable to the charge made in the indictment, or that there have been errors prima facie committed in the admission or rejection of testimony, and these errors are complained of in the motion for new trial? Assuming that a plaintiff in error must show both error and injury, when there is no legal brief of evidence filed with the motion for new trial, but only a document which fails to comply with the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 6093, should this court look to such a document for any purpose, and can it be said in any case, without an examination of the evidence, that an instruction of the trial judge, abstractly erroneous, is so hurtful to the plaintiff in error as to require a reversal of the judgment?" The Supreme Court has delivered its instructions, and has answered the questions propounded by this court as follows: The first question was answered in the negative, the court holding that a motion for a new trial, accompanied by a paper purporting to be a brief of the evidence filed and approved by the trial judge, but in the preparation of which it appears that there has been no bona fide effort to comply with the provisions of the Civil Code, § 6093, does not stand upon the same footing as a paper presented as a motion for a new trial unaccompanied by anything purporting to be a brief of the evidence introduced on the trial. The second question was answered in the affirmative, the court holding that there may be a valid motion for new trial in a case where a paper purporting to be a brief of the evidence is filed as such in connection with the motion for new trial, but not made up in accordance with the Civil Code, § 6093, so far as to authorize the appellate court to consider and decide any point raised in the motion not dependent for determination upon the evidence. The first inquiry embodied in the third question was answered in the negative, and the second inquiry embodied in the third question was answered in the affirmative, the court holding that it is the duty of the reviewing court to reverse the judgment overruling the motion for new trial, if it discovers charges of the court which appear to be abstractly erroneous, or, in a criminal case, if there have been errors prima facie committed in the admission or rejection of testimony, and these errors are complained of in the motion for new trial. The first inquiry propounded in the fourth question was answered in the negative, and an affirmative answer given to the second inquiry made in the fourth question. Under these instructions from the Supreme Court, it becomes the duty of the Court of Appeals to examine the motion for new trial in the present case, for the purpose of determining whether there are any assignments of error made in the motion which can be considered without reference to the evidence in the case. The foregoing headnotes from 1 to 6 inclusive, and the corresponding divisions of the opinion, were prepared by Judge Powell and adopted by this court as its opinion. We now reaffirm the rulings thus made and the opinion of the court as thus delivered. We proceed, therefore, to a consideration of the motion for new trial.

[8] 8. The trial judge was duly requested to put his charge in writing. As written out, the charge contained the following statement: At one place there was a note in parenthesis as follows: "(Here the court reads section 719 of volume 2 of the Code of 1910, leaving off the words at the top, 'other offenses of like character.')" In another place appeared the following: "Here the court reads the indictment in full, leaving off the names of the grand jurors who returned it, and leaving off the entries on the back of the indictment." In another place, the following: "Here the court charged paragraph one of defendant's request, No. 1." In another place, the following appeared: "Here the court charged paragraph second and fourth of defendant's request, No. 2." The Code requires that, when counsel for either party request it before argument begins, the trial judge shall "write out their charges and read them to the jury, and it shall be error to give any other or additional charge than that so written and read." Penal Code 1910, § 1056. It has been held by the Supreme Court that "it is no failure to comply with a request to charge the jury in writing for the judge, instead of copying into his charge sections of the Code which he submits to the jury, to read these sections verbatim from the Code itself, noting accurately in his written charge the sections so read." Burns v. State, 89 Ga. 527, 15 S. E. 748. This itself, as was said by this court in Hays v. State, 10 Ga. App. 823, 74 S. E. 314, was a departure from the letter of the Code, and both this court and the Supreme Court have several times held that it was the duty of the trial judge to obey both the letter and the spirit of the statute which declares that he must, when a timely request is made, write out in full the charge to the jury. See Walker v. State, 8 Ga. App. 214, 68 S. E. 873. But, under the ruling of the Supreme Court in the Burns Case, supra, it was not error for the judge to read section 719 of the Code without copying the section into his charge, he having noted, in the charge as filed, the number of the section, and the fact that it was read. It may be that upon the principle of that decision it was also not error to fail to copy the indictment in the charge, since the indictment is a part of the record in the case, and there can be no dispute as to its contents. The purpose of this section of the Code is to prevent controversies between judge and counsel in reference to what instructions were given the jury, and certainly it is true, and this court holds broadly, that as to every matter about which there can be a controversy between court and counsel the judge must write out his instructions to the jury, when duly requested so to do by counsel for either party. We think, therefore, that it was error for the judge to fail to write out in full in his charge the portions of the requests of the defendant which he gave to the jury. Requests are not part of the record in the case. They are not filed as such. They are frequently lost or destroyed after the charge is delivered. Generally, they are returned to counsel with a notation, either of "given" or "refused," as the case may be. It is therefore not a compliance with the mandatory provisions of the section of the Code to simply state in the charge, as was done in the present instance, that the court read, at a certain point in the charge, indicated by the notation, certain paragraphs of the requests presented by the defendant and identified by numbers. It can readily be seen how a controversy might arise between court and counsel as to what the request contained if they should be lost or destroyed, and we are unwilling to approve the practice of simply noting on the charge that a certain request was given, and we are clear that the failure to copy the request in the charge was a violation of both the letter and the spirit of the statute. The error thus committed demands a new trial.

[9] 9. Several assignments of error in the motion for new trial involve the question as to whether it was proper to permit proof of the value of the shares of stock which the defendant was alleged to have sold to the prosecutor and of other stock in the alleged corporation at a time subsequent to the date upon which the sale was alleged to have taken place. As a separate and independent fact, the evidence of the value of the stock at other dates was not material, but it was material as illustrating the probable value of the stock on the date on which the sale was alleged to have been made. For instance, if it could have been shown that a week or ten days after the sale the stock was absolutely worthless, that no changes took place in the meantime in the condition of the alleged corporation, and that nothing occurred to depress the price of the stock within that period, the value of the stock at that time would be a very strong circumstance, and almost conclusive, upon the question as to what its value was at the date of the sale. The court should, however, in admitting the evidence and in instructing the jury, have confined proof of the value of the stock upon other dates solely to the purpose of illustrating the value of the stock at the date the sale was alleged to have taken place.

[10] 10. In another ground of the motion for new trial, complaint is made of the refusal of the court to give in charge a written request substantially that if the jury should believe that the defendant in good faith thought the purchase of the stock was a safe investment, and the jury believed that he entertained that opinion and honestly made a mistake as to its value, he could not be convicted. The defendant was indicted and convicted for cheating and swindling, in that he sold to the prosecutor a certain number of shares of stock in an alleged corporation which had not in fact been incorporated at the time of the sale of the stock; that the stock was worthless; that the defendant represented that the company had been incorporated, and represented that the stock was well worth par or above; that both of these representations were false and fraudulent, and the defendant knew they were false at the time he made them. To support the allegations of the indictment, it was necessary for the state to show that the company had not been incorporated; that the stock was worthless, or worth greatly less than par; that the defendant, in order to induce the prosecutor to purchase, falsely represented to him that the company had been incorporated and that the stock was worth par; that these representations were false at the time he made them and they were made for the purpose of inducing the sale. Value is largely a question of opinion. It may be illustrated in various ways, but, at last, what a given commodity is worth depends upon the opinion which people who profess to be acquainted with its value entertain on the subject. Men are frequently honestly mistaken as to the value of property, and particularly would this be true as to the value of shares of stock in a corporation and similar property. Value of such stock depends upon a variety of things. If the defendant honestly believed that the stock was worth par when he sold it to the prosecutor, then the representations made by him as to its value could not be said to have been fraudulently made, and this necessary ingredient in the offense charged would not have been made out. Therefore the principle incorporated in the request to charge should have been given.

[11] 11. Complaint is made in other grounds of the motion that the court refused to permit the defendant to show, for the purpose of illustrating the value of the stock, that a number of other people had bought stock in the company at or about the same time the sale was made to the prosecutor, and paid the same or a larger price than that paid by the prosecutor. Of course, if all of these other sales were made by the defendant and upon representations similar to those made to the prosecutor and the representations were acted on by the purchasers, the evidence would not be admissible for the purpose of illustrating the value of the stock. But if other purchases were made by a number of people and upon their own independent judgment, after an investigation as to its value, the fact that they paid a sum equal to or greater than that paid by the prosecutor would be a very strong circumstance to show that the purchasers were of the opinion that the stock was worth what they paid for it, and could be properly proved by the defendant for the purpose of rebutting the inference that in making the representations which he is alleged to have made to the prosecutor as to the value of the stock he was guilty of a fraudulent intent. The fact that a man may have paid a given sum for an article would, of course, not necessarily show what the article is worth, but it would tend to illustrate his opinion as to its value, and, where a number of purchases of the same kind of property were made for the same price and at or about the same time, while this would not necessarily prove that the property was worth the sum paid for it, it would show that in the opinion of the purchasers the property was of that value. We think, therefore, that such evidence ought to have been admitted and considered by the jury as a circumstance which might indicate that the defendant made the representations without fraudulent intent.

[12] 12. Another ground complains that the court allowed one of the bank's officers to testify that there was no evidence in any of the bank records of any charter having been granted to the bank. The proper place to look to ascertain if a bank has been chartered is the office of the Secretary of State. The fact that there is no record in the bank of the incorporation would not necessarily show that no charter had in fact been granted. Upon another trial the proper way to prove this fact is to produce the testimony of some one who has examined the records in the office of the Secretary of State that no such charter has been granted.

[13] 13. The court allowed in evidence a paper which purported to be a certificate of stock in the Bank of Kennesaw, executed by John W. Bennett as president, and the defendant as cashier, under the seal of the bank. Counsel for the accused objected to the admission of this document on the ground that its execution had not been proved, in that neither of the signatures was shown to be genuine. This objection, from the recitals in the motion for new trial, appears to have been well taken, and we cannot look to the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining whether error was committed in overruling the objection. If it in fact appeared from the evidence that this was the document sold to the prosecutor by the defendant as a share of the stock in the bank, then the paper would have been admissible, without reference to whether the signatures of the persons signing as president and cashier were genuine or not. But, so far as appears from the motion for new trial, the paper was offered generally, without any evidence explaining that it was the paper which had been delivered to the prosecutor by the defendant; and, this being so, the general rule that the execution of such a document must be proved before it becomes admissible in evidence applies.

[14] 14. Record of a receivership proceeding was admitted in evidence for the purpose of showing that in an answer claimed to have been filed by the defendant he had admitted that the bank was not incorporated, and that it was insolvent when the petition was filed. The answer purported to have been signed in behalf of the defendant by attorneys of record, and there is also attached to the answer an affidavit verifying the truth of the contents of the answer, purporting to be signed by the defendant in the presence of a notary public. There was objection to the admission of this answer, on the ground that it had not been shown that it had been in fact made as an answer of the defendant and by his authority. The objection made to the admission of the document was not well founded, and the ruling of the court was proper in admitting that portion of the answer which admitted that the bank had not been incorporated but was a partnership, and also admitted that the bank was insolvent.

[15] 15. Over objection of the defendant, the court admitted in evidence an original record from the United States court of a petition in bankruptcy which had been filed by the defendant. The evidence was objected to, both upon the ground that a certified copy, and not the original, was the proper evidence of the bankruptcy proceedings, and that the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial. Without an examination of the evidence we cannot tell whether the bankruptcy proceeding was material or not, but it is clear that the original record was not admissible. The original record was a paper belonging to the office of the United States court, and counsel for the state had no right to withdraw it from that office for the purpose of offering it in evidence in the case. The original was not admissible; and, if the evidence was material, a certified copy should have been offered. McLanahan v. Blackwell, 119 Ga. 64, 45 S. E. 785.

[16] 16. The foregoing deals with all the assignments of error in the motion for new trial which can be considered without reference to the evidence. As to such other assignments we express no opinion. On account, however, of the errors above pointed out, a new trial is demanded.

Judgment reversed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1099*)—REVIEW—SUCCESSIVE PROCEEDINGS FOR REVIEW.

There being no substantial variance between the evidence in the present record and that in the record of this case when before this court at the October term, 1910 (8 Ga. App. 566, 70 S. E. 19), the decision then made is controlling, and the trial judge did not err in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by A. P. Ashburn, executrix of W. W. Ashburn, against A. M. Watson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Louis Moore and Roscoe Luke, both of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error. Shipp & Kline, of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The facts are fully reported in the former decision. Ashburn v. Watson, 8 Ga. App. 566, 70 S. E. 19. The main defense was that Ashburn, the grantee, had abandoned the possession which he acquired after the execution of the deed by the defendant and his coveasant, in consequence of which abandonment Morrison had been enabled to acquire possession and maintain it against the paper title which Ashburn held. As to this defense this court held: "The evidence introduced by the defendant along this line was too indefinite and too lacking in particularity to overcome the prima facie case made by the plaintiff upon the introduction of proof of the warranty and of the notice to the warrantor, and of the adverse judgment in the complaint for land." A careful examination of the evidence in the present record discloses no substantial variance from that in the former record. The testimony of the witness Murphy was relied upon in both trials to prove the abandonment of possession by Ashburn. The testimony of this witness is no more definite now than it was before, and the former decision is res judicata. There was no error in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)BILLS AND NOTES (§ 452)—ACTION ON NOTE—DEFENSES.

It is no defense to an action on a promissory note that the note was given for the purchase price of a mule, secured by a mortgage thereon; that the defendant had delivered the mule to the plaintiff (the mortgagee) upon his agreement to foreclose the mortgage in a justice's court, sell the mule at constable's sale (the note and mortgage being for more than $100), and notify defendant of the time and place of sale; that the plaintiff foreclosed the mortgage in the superior court, had the mule sold by the sheriff, and failed to notify the defendant of the time and place of sale; and that, in consequence of this failure, the defendant did not appear at the sale, and the mule was sold for a sum greatly less than its value. If the defendant has any remedy, it is by an independent action against the plaintiff.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 233)—ILLEGAL SALE—EVIDENCE.

A witness for the state having testified that he bought intoxicating liquor from the accused a large number of times during the two years immediately preceding the finding of the bill of indictment, it was not erroneous to admit, in corroboration of this evidence, the testimony of another witness that during this period he had seen the accused several times with "his pockets loaded with whisky."

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—ILLEGAL SALE—AGENCY—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The following instruction was a correct statement of the law: "It would not be necessary to show, in order to warrant a conviction, that the person who sold the liquor was the real owner of the liquor. If one person receives from the real owner liquor or whisky, and goes and sells it for the owner, delivers it for the owner, receives payment or purchase price for the liquor for the owner, that would make the party who delivers it and sold it guilty, whether he was the real owner or not." Even if there was no evidence that the accused, in making the sales, was acting as agent for another, the charge was not prejudicial, since, if he was not the agent, he was necessarily the principal, and equally guilty in either event.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. ARSON (§ 37)—EVIDENCE—CORPUS DELICTI.

Where, in the trial of one charged with arson, it appears that the barn described in the indictment was destroyed by fire about 3 o'clock in the morning, that no fire had been left in or near the building on the night before it was burned, that while the fire was in progress an odor of kerosene oil emanated from the building, and an empty can which had contained such oil was found near by, and that tracks of a human being, leading to and from the barn, were found, and the circumstances were such as to indicate that they were made after the barn was closed on the night before the burning, the corpus delicti is sufficiently proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-73; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

2. ARSON (§ 37*)—EVIDENCE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The evidence relied on to show the guilty connection of the accused with the burning was circumstantial. His tracks were positively identified by the prosecutor. He made false statements as to his whereabouts on the night of the burning. He was angry with the prosecutor and had made threats against him. When he saw the prosecutor and others on the morning after the fire, measuring the tracks leading to the barn, the accused went to his home, changed his shoes, and returned to the place where the fire occurred. These and other circumstances authorized the conviction. The jury did not credit the testimony offered to prove an alibi, and this court cannot say there were not some facts and circumstances sufficient to support the verdict. The charges complained of were not erroneous, and the requests to charge, so far as pertinent and legal, were fully covered by the general charge.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 918*)—NEW TRIAL—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—NECESSITY.

Where, prior to an announcement of ready by both sides, the judge makes a complimentary remark as to credibility of one of the state's witnesses, subsequently sworn as a witness in the case, the remark being made in the hearing of the jury, and thereafter the defendant, without objection, goes to trial before the jury and is convicted, it is too late to complain for the first time by motion for a new trial that the judge erred in making the remark referred to. White v. State, 7 Ga. App. 20, 65 S. E. 1073; Smith v. State, 7 Ga. App. 252, 66 S. E. 556.

RUSSELL, J. [1] 1. From the fourth ground of the motion for a new trial it appears that, after the case had been called for trial and both sides had announced ready, counsel for the prosecution announced that the state was ready for trial, provided Stephen O'Kelley, a witness for the state, was present; that he had been called, but had not responded. The presiding judge inquired if the witness had been subpoenaed. Counsel replied that he had been, and had promised to be on hand that morning. The judge then said: "If Mr. O'Kelley, the witness, told you that he would be here, you can count on his being here. I know him, and have known him from his childhood. I know his father. Whatever Stephen O'Kelley tells you, you can rely on it. The court will announce ready for the state." All this occurred in the presence of the jury. It is alleged that the court erred in thus commending the witness, because the jury were thereby influenced to believe his testimony in preference to the defendant's statement, which was in conflict with it.

If the probable effect of the judge's language in regard to this witness was as stated in this ground of the motion for a new trial, the accused and his counsel knew it before accepting the jurors and entering upon the trial. So far as appears, there was no objection to it until after the verdict had been rendered. "A defendant cannot sit idly by and accept jurors without objection, take the chance of obtaining an acquittal, and then complain that they were influenced by a fact of which he was aware and to which he did not object before they were sworn." White v. State, 7 Ga. App. 22, 66 S. E. 1074. As to the proper mode of objection, see Smith v. State, 7 Ga. App. 252, 66 S. E. 556, and Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 277, 69 S. E. 184. The decisions cited in support of this ground of the motion for a new trial relate to language used to or in the presence of the jury during the trial, and not to language used before entering upon the trial.

[2] 2, 3. The indictment was for assault with intent to murder. It alleged that the offense was committed by shooting a named person with a pistol. The verdict was that the defendant was "guilty of shooting another unlawfully." It is contended in behalf of the accused that there is no such offense as this, and that the verdict is void for uncertainty. There is no merit in this contention. Under an indictment containing a single count for assault with intent to murder, there may be a conviction of the statutory offense of shooting at another; that being a lesser offense of the same general character. Rhinehart v. State, 7 Ga. App. 425, 66 S. E. 982; Wostenholms v. State, 70 Ga. 720; Watson v. State, 116 Ga. 607, 43 S. E. 32, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1. "Verdicts are to have a reasonable intendment, and are to receive a reasonable construction, and are not to be avoided unless from necessity." Penal Code 1910, § 1059. It was clearly the intention of the jury in this case to find the accused guilty of the offense of shooting at another (Penal Code of 1910, § 115), as to which the court had fully instructed them. It was not necessary for the verdict to negative the statutory exception by stating that the shooting was "not in his own defense or under circumstances of justification." Arnold v. State, 51 Ga. 144; Isom v. State, 83 Ga. 378, 9 S. E. 1051.

Complaint is made as to the "qualified manner" in which the court gave in charge to the jury the provisions of the Penal Code as to voluntary manslaughter. This did not hurt the accused, for the principles of the law of voluntary manslaughter were applied in his behalf, when the jury found him guilty of shooting at another, instead of assault with intent to murder. By this verdict for the lesser offense he got all the benefit he could have derived from a correct charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter.

Some of the grounds of the motion for a new trial complain that the court erred in not giving to the jury certain lengthy and detailed instructions set out in the motion; but it does not appear that these instructions were requested on the part of the accused.

[3] The evidence amply authorizes the verdict, and no error of law appears.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; Robt. T. Daniel, Judge.

Action by Ford & Pruett against T. S. Thomason. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

O. A. Nix, of Lawrenceville, for plaintiffs in error. I. L. Oakes, of Lawrenceville, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. 1. The action was brought to recover commissions alleged to be due the plaintiffs by the defendant upon a sale of real estate. The contract providing for the commissions is in writing, and is of doubtful construction. It appears that the plaintiffs were authorized by the defendant to sell the real estate during a period named in the contract, and that during this period the defendant himself disposed of the property. Under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 3587, he had a right to do this, unless the contract otherwise provided. It is contended in behalf of the plaintiffs that under the terms of the contract they are entitled to commissions, even though the defendant himself sold the property, while counsel for the defendant contend that this is not a proper construction of the contract; but under the view we take of the case it is unnecessary to decide this question.

[1] It is admitted by the plaintiffs that they had not registered and paid the tax required of real estate agents by Civil Code 1910, §§ 971, 978. Section 971 imposes a tax of $10 upon every person or firm "engaged in the business of buying or selling real estate on commission." Section 978 provides that, "before any person shall be authorized to open up or carry on said business," he shall register with the ordinary and pay the tax to the tax collector. The section further provides that any person who carries on the business before registering with the ordinary and before paying the special tax shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Counsel for the defendant raises the point that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover their commissions, because they were acting in violation of the law in having engaged in the business of selling real estate on commission, without having registered and paid the tax as required by law. This point, we think, is well taken. The statute makes it a misdemeanor for one to engage in this business without having complied with the terms of the statute and paid the tax; but the law imposes an additional penalty, to wit, forfeiture of the fruits of his labor. One cannot defraud the state of its rightful due and then recover by law the profit accruing from a transaction in which he had no right to engage. The question is settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court in the case of Murray v. Williams, 121 Ga. 63, 48 S. E. 686, and of this court in Jalonick v. Greene County Oil Co., 7 Ga. App. 309, 66 S. E. 815.

[2] 2. It appears, from the evidence, that the principal business of the plaintiffs was that of insurance agents, and that during the year in which this transaction took place they made only one contract for the sale of real estate on commission; and it is insisted in their behalf that this was not carrying on the business of real estate agents within the meaning of the statute. We cannot agree with this conclusion. If the contention be sound, it would be a very difficult matter to determine when a person was engaged in the business of selling real estate on commission, and it would be left to a jury in each instance to say whether that business or some other was his principal business. The statute cannot be given any such intendment. It plainly means that before any person shall begin to transact the business referred to in the statute, and before he makes any contract for the selling or buying of real estate on commission, and, in the language of the statute, "before he opens up such business," he shall register with the ordinary and pay the tax to the tax collector. The plaintiffs were clearly engaged in the business of selling real estate on commission, within the purview of the statute, and, not having registered or paid the tax, are not entitled to recover their commission. The court properly directed a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 2, 1912.)

1. COURTS (§ 189*)—CITY COURTS—JUDGMENT.

Under the act creating the city court of Thomasville (Acts 1905, p. 383), as amended by the act approved August 22, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 238), it is the duty of the trial judge to call the appearance docket, and, if no defense is filed on or before the call of the docket, the judge must, upon sufficient proof submitted by the plaintiff, render a judgment in his favor. There is nothing, however, in the provisions of the act creating the city court of Thomasville, or in its amendments, which abrogates the general rule that during the term the court has plenary power over all of its judgments and orders, and may modify or vacate them for good cause shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 409, 412; Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

2. COURTS (§ 189*)—CITY COURTS—JUDGMENT.

Where, under the provisions of the act creating the city court of Thomasville, no defense is filed within the time required by the act, and judgment is rendered in favor of the plaintiff, such a judgment will not be vacated, even during the same term, at the instance of a defendant who shows no reason good in law for his failure to appear and file his defense within the time required by the act. The discretion vested by law in the trial judge is a legal discretion, and will be exercised only in cases where the defendant shows a legal reason for its exercise. No such reason having been shown in this case, the judge properly held that he was without power or authority to vacate the judgment.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Roscoe Luke against the Florida Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Merrill, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error. Roscoe Luke and Louis S. Moore, both of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. Luke brought an action in the city court of Thomasville upon an open account against the Florida Central Railroad Company and the Tallahassee Sawmill Company. The petition was returned to the March term, 1912. At the appearance term, and upon the day fixed for the call of the appearance docket, pursuant to the notice which had been published in the newspaper of the city of Thomasville, the case was sounded. No defense having been filed by either of the defendants, the plaintiff was permitted to make proof of his claim, and judgment was entered in his favor against both of the defendants jointly. On March 23, 1912, during the same term of the court at which the judgment was rendered, and before the adjournment, the Florida Central Railroad Company, having paid all the costs which had accrued in the case, filed a motion to set aside the judgment, annexing to the motion a demurrer and a plea, and announcing its readiness to go to trial. The motion to vacate set forth, as a reason why it should be sustained, that the movant had regularly retained a member of the Thomasville bar to look after all of its business in the courts, and depended upon and expected this counsel to file its defense to the suit, "but by some misunderstanding or otherwise (movant is unable to state why) this was not done, and in consequence thereof the case was in default when the appearance docket was called. Movant's president, * * * who had exclusive charge of such matters for it, did not see the publication as to when the appearance docket would be called, and understood counsel for the company to say, when he asked him about this case, that it would not be called until the last of the week of court, and but for this he would have been at the court, and personally attended to this case, and seen to the filing of its defense." Upon this motion a rule nisi was granted, and upon the hearing the judge sustained a demurrer setting up, in substance, that no sufficient reason was set forth in the motion why the judgment should be vacated, and that upon the facts presented the judge was without discretion or power to vacate the judgment; the order reciting that it was based both upon the ground that under the act creating the city court of Thomasville the court had no discretion to vacate the judgment, and upon the ground that the facts set forth in the motion were not sufficient to authorize the court to set aside the judgment. To this order the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. In the original act creating the city court of Thomasville it was provided that "the defendant shall file his defense on or before the first day of the first term of said court, and said case shall then be tried unless continued, postponed, or passed by the court, for such causes and under such rules as cases are now continued, postponed or passed, unless not reached by the court." Acts 1905, p. 385, § 7. This act was later amended by striking the whole of section 7 and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That all civil cases shall be returnable for trial to the first regular quarterly term of said court convening twenty days, or more, after the filing and docketing of the case, and fifteen days or more after the service of process on the defendant. All defenses must be filed at the first term, and in any case where no defense is filed before or at the time the judge calls the appearance docket, then the judge shall, upon sufficient proof submitted by the plaintiff, render judgment without the intervention of a jury for the plaintiff; if a demurrer is filed and overruled and no other defense is filed, then the judge shall render judgment as though no defense had been filed. If a defense is filed, other than as last above mentioned, then the case shall go to the next regular quarterly term as the trial term." Acts 1907, p. 239, § 2. The statutes in relation to opening defaults in the superior court have no application to the city court of Thomasville, since in that court, when no defense is filed, judgment may be taken at the first term. Dodson Printers' Supply Co. v. Harris, 114 Ga. 966, 41 S. E. 54; Thurmond v. Groves, 126 Ga. 779, 55 S. E. 915. The question arises whether, under the provisions of the act creating the city court of Thomasville, as amended by the act of 1907, the judge of the city court had power to vacate the judgment granted in favor of the plaintiff in the present case and permit defenses to be filed.

It has been several times held that, where the act creating a city court provided that all defenses shall be filed before or by the first day of the term, the judge has no authority to permit a defense to be filed at a later date. Dodson Printers' Supply Co. v. Harris, supra; Pitts v. Wheeler, 6 Ga. App. 720, 65 S. E. 689; Hunter v. Hinman, 7 Ga. App. 387, 66 S. E. 1039. In Bass v. Doughty, 5 Ga. App. 458, 63 S. E. 516, it was held that, under the peculiar language creating the city court of Bainbridge, a defense might, in the discretion of the trial judge, be filed after the first day of the term. The decision rendered in that case really has no applicability to the case now under consideration. In principle the other decisions cited above would seem to be controlling in the present case. The act of 1907 provides, first, that all defenses in the city court of Thomasville must be filed at the first term. Under this provision, if the appearance docket is not called a defense may be filed at any time during the term, even upon the last day. But the act further provides that, if no defense is filed before or at the time the appearance docket is called, "the judge shall upon sufficient proof submitted by the plaintiff render judgment, without the intervention of a jury, for the plaintiff." This language is as mandatory as is the language of the act referred to in the case above cited. It leaves the trial judge without any discretion. If he calls the appearance docket and no defense is filed, then he shall render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff if sufficient proof to authorize it be offered. It follows that, when the case was called in the city court of Thomasville on the day fixed by the presiding judge for the call of the appearance docket, no defense having been filed up to that time, there was no other course open to the judge than to permit the plaintiff to make out his case and take judgment for such amount as was authorized by his pleading and his proof.

[2] 2. It does not follow, however, that the judge of the city court of Thomasville is, under the above-cited provision of the act creating the court, wholly without power or authority in any case to vacate a judgment at the term at which the same was granted. The general rule is that during the term all judgments and orders are in the breast of the court, and subject to be modified or vacated for good cause shown. Patterson Co. v. Wilkes, 1 Ga. App. 430, 57 S. E. 1047; Cole v. Illinois Sewing Machine Co., 7 Ga. App. 338, 66 S. E. 979. While the provisions of the act creating the city court of Thomasville imperatively require the trial judge to permit a plaintiff to make proof and take judgment where no defense has been filed up to the time the appearance docket is called, there is nothing in the act which abrogates the general rule, above stated, that during the term the court has plenary power over its judgments. But while this is true, whenever a motion is made to vacate a judgment, even during the term at which the same was rendered, the movant must allege and prove some reason good in law why he had failed to make his defense at the time required by the act. The law rewards diligence, but is slow to harken to the prayer of the slothful. The vigilant man does not need to make excuses; but where one has sat idly by, and overslept his rights, and permitted a judgment to be taken against him, which he might have prevented by the exercise of the slightest diligence, the law is not disposed to grant him relief. Heitmann v. Commercial Bank, 6 Ga. App. 584, 65 S. E. 590. When, therefore, a motion to vacate a judgment, even though granted during the same term, is presented, the motion must show upon its face some reason which the law will accept for the failure of the movant to appear in court at the proper time and make his defense. The discretion vested in the trial judge is a legal discretion, to be exercised upon legal principles. It is not an arbitrary discretion, in the exercise of which the court may at its will set aside a judgment or order granted in favor of the litigant at the same term.

The excuse offered by the plaintiff in error in the present case for its failure to appear and plead at the proper time is wholly insufficient. The neglect of movant's counsel was in law the movant's neglect. There is no pretense that the counsel had any excuse for failing to file the defenses. On the contrary, the movant does not undertake to explain the negligence of his counsel, but says expressly that he is unable to state why the defense was not filed before the call of the appearance docket, as required by the act. It is also inferable, from the facts alleged in the motion, that the attention of the counsel was called to the case by the president of the plaintiff in error, and that counsel stated that the case would not be called until the latter part of the week. The plaintiff in error knew that the case was in court, and knew that it was returnable to the March term, 1912. It was charged with knowledge that the defense must be filed before the appearance docket was called. It would be trifling with the courts and with orderly judicial procedure to permit a litigant to sit idly by until after judgment against him has been rendered, and then vacate the judgment upon such an excuse as is offered by the movant in the present case.

It is argued on behalf of the plaintiff in error that inasmuch as the order refusing to vacate the judgment recites that the trial judge was without discretion, the case should be sent back, in order that upon the coming in of the evidence the judge might, in the exercise of his discretion, determine whether or not he will vacate the judgment. The presumption is that the movant has no reason for vacating the judgment, other than that set forth in his motion. And, upon the facts set forth in the motion, the judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to set aside the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

LEE v. HILL et al.

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 237*)—DISCHARGE—TENDER—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

A mortgagor, by requesting the mortgagee to furnish a correct statement of the account, stating his willingness to pay it, and informing the mortgagee that he has some one to pay the amount due on the mortgage transferring the mortgage, does not thereby make a legal tender of the amount due, so as to discharge the lien of the mortgage.

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 237*)—DISCHARGE—TENDER—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

Where a mortgagee rendered an account of the amount due, honestly believing it to be correct, and his belief, though erroneous, was based on reasonable grounds, the refusal of a legal tender by the mortgagor of the amount actually due did not discharge the lien; and the question of the mortgagee's good faith was for the jury.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 331*)—RENTING ON SHARES—FAILURE TO DELIVER CROP—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The measure of damages for breach of contract to deliver specific personal property is, as a rule, the value of the property when it should have been delivered, with interest until delivery, or until the value at the date it was due is paid, so that where a tenant failed to deliver rent cotton when due and the cotton decreased in value, the landlord's measure of damages was the difference in the value of the cotton at the time fixed for delivery and the time of actual delivery, with interest on its value, at the date fixed for delivery, until delivery.

4. INTEREST (§ 6*)—OPEN ACCOUNTS—AGREEMENTS OF PARTIES.

Though, generally, the law does not allow interest on an open account, a debtor agreeing to pay interest is bound to pay interest on the amount actually due, when ascertained, though he disputes items in the account.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by David Lee against W. L. Hill, trading as the Hill Banking & Mercantile Company, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. W. Lewis, of Yorkville, for appellants.
John R. Hart, of Yorkville, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment for the possession, or the value, of certain personal property which defendant had seized under mortgages given by plaintiff, who was tenant under defendant in 1907 and 1908. The mortgages were given to secure plaintiff's account with defendant for supplies. A dispute arose between them as to the correctness of the account. Plaintiff claimed that there were certain errors in the account, which defendant refused to correct, after his attention had been called to them. His position is: (1) That there was nothing due on the mortgages when the defendant seized his property. (2) That the lien of the mortgages had been discharged by his offering to pay defendant what was due, if anything, on a correct accounting.

As a new trial will be granted on other grounds, we will not discuss the ground that the verdict is wholly unsupported by evidence, as a discussion of the evidence might result in prejudice to one side or the other on the new trial.

The plaintiff testified that he told defendant, if he would give him a correct statement of his account, he was willing to pay it, if he owed him anything; that he had some one to pay it for him; and that defendant said, if he did not pay all that he claimed, he would not accept any. He also testified, on cross-examination, that he told defendant he had some one who would take up his papers (meaning the mortgages), if he would give him a correct account, and that he wanted defendant to transfer his papers to that person.

On the subject of tender and the discharge of the lien of the mortgages thereby, the court instructed the jury as follows: "Where the mortgagor (that is, the one that makes the mortgage) goes to the mortgagee and says: 'I wish to pay my debt. I am prepared to pay it, and I wish to pay the debt now and settle my mortgage'—if the mortgagee refuses to receive the payment, why, the lien of the mortgage is discharged, and he can no longer claim anything of the mortgagor on account of that mortgage. He can recover his debt; that don't discharge the debt. The debt remains due until it is paid; but the lien of the mortgage is gone when the mortgagor offers to pay it, and the mortgagee refuses to receive it. Now, there is such a thing as a legal tender, where a man seeks to avail himself of that law which discharges the lien of the mortgage, where the creditor refuses to accept payment. There is an obligation upon the debtor to tender the right amount of the debt to make what is known as a legal tender—that is, to offer to pay the creditor the debt, and the whole of it, then and there—and if he does not make that legal tender, the creditor is not bound by that offer. It is not necessary that the debtor should take the money out of his pocket and have it out; but he must be in a position to pay. He must be able to comply, if the creditor signifies his willingness to receive the right money. But the creditor has no right to insist upon a legal tender, where he is in the wrong; if he is demanding more than he is entitled to, if he has rendered a statement of account which is wrong, and insists upon payment of that amount, why, then he cannot say, "The lien of the mortgage is not discharged, because you didn't tender me the right amount," because he had already taken a position which precludes him from saying so, by demanding more than was due. And if the debtor comes to him and says: "I am ready, I am prepared to settle my debt, and I demand of you an account, showing the right amount that I am due you"—and the creditor refuses him, why, that lien is gone. If the creditor refuses to acquaint the debtor with the true amount that he owes him, then the debtor who makes a bona fide offer to pay the true amount, and is prepared to do it, whether he is prepared to take the money out of his own pocket, or has got somebody else who is willing to pay it for him, and the creditor refuses to give him a statement of the true amount and accept payment, the lien of the mortgage is gone. What the law strives at is justice; and where a debtor comes there with the money in his pocket, or with a friend who is willing to take up the debt for him, and offers to pay, and demands a statement of the amount due, and the creditor refuses to give the statement and to accept the payment, the lien of the mortgage is gone. But, unless the debtor does do that, unless he makes a bona fide offer to pay the debt, and is able to do it at the time, then he cannot be said to have made an offer to pay it, which was refused by the creditor, and in that case the lien of the mortgage would not be gone; and, as long as there is one dollar due on that debt, the creditor is entitled to foreclose the mortgage to collect it. * * * If the plaintiff went to the defendant with an honest purpose and a present ability to pay the debt, and sought to do it, and the defendant prevented him from doing it by refusing to give him a correct statement of the account, or by refusing to accept the correct amount, then the lien of the mortgage is gone, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

[1] It is clear from the evidence of plaintiff himself that no legal tender was made to the defendant. Eastland v. Longshorn, 1 Nott & McC. 194; Siter v. Price, 2 Bailey, 274; Reynolds v. Price, 88 S. C. 525, 71 S. E. 51; 38 Cyc. 141-143.

[2] It may be that defendant waived a legal tender of the amount due him, if any, by rendering an incorrect account, and by insisting on payment of the account as rendered, coupled with the statement that, unless it was paid, he would accept nothing. But whether he did so waive a tender or not depends upon the circumstances and his purposes. If he honestly believed the account he rendered was correct, and insisted on payment of it in that belief, and if that belief, though erroneous, was based upon reasonable grounds, the refusal of even a legal tender of the amount actually due would not have discharged the lien of his mortgages. Reynolds v. Price. But his good faith or his alleged wrongful purposes, and the reasonableness of his contentions, were questions which were not submitted to the jury; nor was the question of waiver. It appears, therefore, that the charge was at variance with the principles decided in Reynolds v. Price.

But, as it appears from the undisputed evidence that no legal tender was made, and that plaintiff never was, at any time, ready to pay what was due to defendant, if anything, but that he was depending upon another person to pay for him, on transfer of his papers by defendant to that person, and as he had no right to demand such transfer, it follows that he can gain no advantage from the law of tender. Therefore his right to recover depends solely upon whether he owed the defendant anything when the property was seized.

[3] Defendant charged plaintiff in the account $20 as the difference in the value of the rent cotton between the day he agreed to deliver and the day he did deliver it. Plaintiff disputed this item on two grounds. He contends, first, that the cotton was delivered in due time, which is a question of fact for the jury; and, second, that, even if it was not delivered at the time agreed on, defendant had no right to charge him more than interest on the value of the cotton on the day it should have been delivered, from that day until it was delivered. The court sustained his second contention in the following instruction: "If the plaintiff owed him cotton at a certain time, and didn't pay it until a subsequent time, all that the defendant could recover on that account was the interest on the debt for the intervening time; and he had no right to charge him the difference between the price of cotton at the time he ought to have paid the rent and at the time when he did pay it." This instruction was erroneous. The general rule is that the measure of damages for the breach of a contract to deliver specific personal property is the value of the property at the time it should have been delivered, with interest thereon from that time until it is delivered, or until the value at the date it was due is paid. Davis v. Richardson, 1 Bay, 102; Justrobe v. Price, Harp. 112; 13 Cyc. 168. If the cotton was worth $100 on the day it should have been delivered, and only $80 on the day it was delivered, the defendant lost $20, besides the use of $100 between those dates. Therefore the measure of his damages is the difference in the value of the cotton, with interest on its value at the date it should have been delivered, and from that date until it was delivered.

[4] At the end of the year 1907, the plaintiff failed to pay his account with defendant for that year. There is now a dispute as to what the correct balance was; but, on April 13, 1908, he gave defendant his note for $225, wherein he stated that it was "for advances made during the present year, and back indebtedness, with interest on the latter from January 1, 1908, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, until paid." A similar provision appears in another note given to defendant in 1907. His honor instructed the jury that an open account does not bear interest until it becomes an account stated, or unless it is received by the debtor, and it is not disputed. In this instruction, his honor erred. While, as a general rule, the law does not allow interest on an open account, it is perfectly competent for the debtor to agree to pay interest on it; and if he does so agree he is bound to pay interest on the amount that is actually due, when it is ascertained, even though he disputes certain items in the account. There is no law prohibiting such a contract. In this case, the plaintiff agreed to pay interest on his back indebtedness, and, when that is ascertained, interest must be added, according to his agreement.

Judgment reversed.

FRASER, J. The plaintiffs-appellants brought action in this case against the defendants-respondents for a tract of 40 acres of land, and alleged that the defendants are in the unlawful possession of said land, and wrongfully withhold the possession of the same from the plaintiffs. The defendants claim that the defendant Nedie Jackson is in the lawful possession and is the equitable owner and is entitled to specific performance of an agreement to convey made by one W. W. Hamilton, Sr., the immediate grantor of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiff took their title with full knowledge of the equity of the defendant Nedie Jackson. The case was withdrawn from the jury by consent of counsel, and tried upon the equitable issues by Judge Robert Aldrich, the then presiding judge. After reading carefully all the evidence and arguments of counsel, we do not see that the evidence preponderates against the findings of fact by the circuit judge. There are nine exceptions, but they all raise questions of fact.

In the case of Boatwright v. Crosby, 83 S. C. at page 191, 65 S. E. at page 174: "The burden rested upon the appellant to show error, on the part of his honor, the circuit judge, in his finding that the deed was intended as a mortgage. The testimony is conflicting upon every material fact; and the appellant has failed to satisfy this court that the preponderance of the evidence is in his favor. It would subserve no useful purpose to narrate the details of testimony."

Under circuit court rule 77 (73 S. Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; Geo. B. Prince, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by George W. Evans against the Blue Ridge Railway Company and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen, of Anderson, for appellants. Leon L. Rice, of Anderson, and Paget & Watkins, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the wrongful acts of the defendants in causing the motor car operated by them to collide with plaintiff's automobile at a street crossing in the city of Anderson, S. C.

The allegations of the complaint material to the questions involved are as follows: "That on the 14th day of May, 1911, the plaintiff was driving his automobile along Fant street, in the city of Anderson, at the point where defendant's line of railway intersects said street. As soon as plaintiff came into view of the track of defendant's line of railway, he was surprised by the approach of said motor car, running at a greater rate of speed than allowed by law. The sudden surprise and lack of warning on the part of the approaching car, coupled with the short distance plaintiff had in which to avoid the impending collision, made it impossible for plaintiff to do otherwise than to try to keep out of the way of the onrushing car. He turned his automobile quickly to the left, and was almost clear of the track of defendant's line of railway, when defendant's motor car, running by said crossing at a great rate of speed, struck the automobile of plaintiff, doing it great damage and endangering the lives of its passengers; that said collision was not due to the negligence of plaintiff, neither did any negligence on his part contribute to the injury, but the same was due to the defendant's negligence in running by said street crossing at a greater rate of speed than allowed by law; that section 226 of the ordinances of the city of Anderson, S. C., 1910, is as follows: 'No railroad engine, car or train shall be run through or within the city, at a greater speed than at a rate of fifteen miles an hour, nor over any street or crossing, at a greater speed than four miles an hour, and any engineer, conductor or other person causing or permitting the same, to run at a greater rate of speed, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished as hereinafter prescribed.' The defendant's motor car was running at a greater rate of speed than four miles an hour at the time hereinabove referred to, against the provisions of said ordinance." There was also a second cause of action in the complaint, alleging recklessness instead of negligence. The defendants denied the allegations of negligence, and set up the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

[1] At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendants made a motion for a nonsuit on the ground that the collision was caused by the plaintiff's contributory negligence, which motion was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500 actual damages, and the defendants appealed.

All the exceptions relate to the sufficiency of the evidence, or assign error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in refusing the motion for nonsuit, on the ground that plaintiff's damages were the result of his contributory negligence. Rule 77 (73 S. E. vii) of the circuit court is as follows: "The point that there is no evidence to support an alleged cause of action, shall be first made, either by a motion for nonsuit, or a motion to direct the verdict. * * * Therefore the only question properly arising under the exceptions is whether there was error in refusing the motion for nonsuit on the ground of plaintiff's contributory negligence.

[2,3] "Failure to comply with a city ordinance providing that trains should not be run faster than four miles an hour within the city limits, and that a man should precede an engine while crossing a street or lane with certain signals, is negligence per se, and even if a man at a street crossing, trying to get his horse off the track, is guilty of negligence and is injured, whether the negligence of the railroad company or of the deceased was the proximate cause of the injury, should have been sent to the jury." (Syllabus) Butler v. Railway, 90 S. C. 273, 73 S. E. 185. In that case the court uses this language: "A failure to comply with the requirements of the ordinance that a train should not exceed four miles an hour * * * was negligence per se. * * * It was held in Craig v. Railway, 89 S. C. 161, 71 S. E. 983, that it is the duty of a railroad company to keep a lookout for persons and pedestrians on its track at a highway crossing. It will thus be seen that there was testimony tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant, and, even conceding that there was negligence also on the part of plaintiff's intestate, the question whether the negligence of the defendant or that of plaintiff's intestate was the proximate cause of the injury should have been submitted to the jury. We see no difference in principle between the case now under consideration and that just mentioned.

Judgment affirmed.

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 114*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 93*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—INTENT—WILLFUL AND WANTON INJURY.

Though an invasion of another's rights be unconscious, where it is committed in such a manner that a person of ordinary prudence would say that it was a reckless disregard of another's rights, it is an actionable wrong, so that, though employees of a railroad company in charge of a train do not see persons on the track in time to avoid injuring them, the company may still be liable for their failure to keep a reasonable lookout, and thus discover the peril.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; John S. Wilson, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Thomas Bennett, by H. P. Bennett, his guardian ad litem, against the Columbia Electric Street Railway, Light & Power Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Elliott & Herbert, of Columbia, for appellant. W. H. Cobb, of Columbia, for respondent.

GARY, O. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff when he was about a year and a half old through the negligence and recklessness of the defendant.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows: "That on or about August 7, 1910, the defendant, while running one of its cars on its track through the Olympia Mill village, on Olympia avenue, at or near its intersection with Ninth street, which is also one of the public highways of said Olympia Mill village, on a level grade, at a rapid and dangerous rate of speed, and in violation of the rules of said defendant, requiring all cars to be stopped when they cross the Bluff road, a public highway about 400 feet east of where Ninth street crosses said Olympia avenue, without warning or signal, and without having air or other brakes than hand brakes on said car, ran against said Thomas Bennett, who was on and crossing said Olympia avenue at its said intersection with Ninth street. That the aforesaid injuries to the plaintiff were caused by the carelessness, negligence, willfulness, recklessness, and wantonness of defendant, its agents, and servants in allowing the car to be run at a rapid and dangerous rate of speed; in that, well knowing said crossing to be dangerous and collisions likely to occur thereat, it failed to stop at the Bluff road crossing, as the rules required, thereby enabling the conductor and motorman to get a clear view of and down said Olympia avenue, to and past the Ninth street crossing, and see if it were obstructed, in failing to give any signal to warn plaintiff of its approach, in allowing said car to be run with worn and defective brakes and appliances for stopping same, in that it failed to bring said car to a stop, and avoid running against and injuring said plaintiff, in failing to keep a proper lookout down said track, and to have seen the plaintiff in time to have stopped its car and avoided the injury."

The defendant denied the allegations of negligence and recklessness, and set up as a defense "that on the date alleged the plaintiff herein walked or crawled out on defendant's track near its father's residence, and, being a child of only two or three years of age, it assumed a position where it could not be seen until defendant's car was almost upon it, whereby it received some injuries, but defendant does not know the nature or extent of said injuries." The defendant also set up as a defense the contributory negligence of the plaintiff and his parents, but subsequently withdrew said defense. The defendant's attorneys presented the following request, which was refused: "I charge you there is no evidence which will justify you in finding any verdict whatever for punitive damages, and, as to this, I direct you to find for defendant." The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was refused, and it afterwards appealed.

The first question presented by the exceptions, which will be considered, is whether there was error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in failing to define punitive damages, or to instruct the jury as to the grounds upon which they could be given. His honor, the presiding judge, after defining actual or compensatory damages, charged the jury as follows: "Then there is another kind of damages, what is known as 'vindictive' or 'punitive' or 'exemplary' damages; that is, an amount in addition to actual damages, given by way of punishment against the wrongdoer, as a lesson to him and others doing likewise. These kind of damages are called 'vindictive,' 'punitive,' or 'exemplary' damages. You have heard it sometimes alluded to as 'smart money.' Now, in this case, the plaintiff not only sues for actual damages, but sues for vindictive damages, or exemplary damages, or punitive damages, as it is called." At the close of the charge the defendant's attorney said: "Your honor has declined my request to direct a verdict, there being no evidence at all as to willfulness." The request to which he had reference was as follows: "I charge you that there is no evidence which will justify you in finding any verdict whatever for punitive damages. * * *"

[1] The following cases show that, if the appellant desired that the instructions should be more specific, they should have been presented, as requests to charge. State v. Adams, 68 S. C. 421, 47 S. E. 676; Jennings v. Mfg. Co., 72 S. C. 411, 52 S. E. 113; Williams v. Ry., 76 S. C. 1, 56 S. E. 652; State v. Thompson, 76 S. C. 116, 56 S. E. 789; Snipes v. Ry., 76 S. C. 208, 56 S. E. 959; Morrison v. Ass'n, 78 S. C. 398, 59 S. E. 27; State v. Boyleston, 84 S. C. 574, 66 S. E. 1047; State v. Chastain, 85 S. C. 64, 67 S. E. 6; State v. Hendrix, 86 S. C. 64, 68 S. E. 129; State v. Du Rant, 87 S. C. 532, 70 S. E. 306.

[2] The next question for consideration is whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages. There was testimony to the effect that the usual speed down Olympia avenue was about 15 or 20 miles an hour, but that on this occasion the car was running about 25 or 30 miles an hour; that it is required by the rules of the company that the car should stop at the Bluff road crossing, but that there was a failure to comply with this requirement; that there was a failure to give any signals when approaching the crossing at Ninth street; that the car did not have an emergency brake, and that an emergency brake would have enabled the motorman to stop the car more quickly; that the motorman saw the child on the crossing, when the car was 100 feet therefrom, and that it ran about 50 feet beyond the crossing before it stopped; that, when running 10 miles an hour, a car can be stopped in little over a car length, which in this instance was 45 feet long; that, when the car is running 20 miles an hour, it can be stopped in about a car length and a half, or two car lengths; that the track from Bluff road crossing, to Ninth street crossing, is level and straight, and that the motorman on that occasion saw persons whom he recognized at Eighth street crossing, which was one block from Ninth street crossing, or two blocks from Bluff road crossing. Of course, there was contradictory testimony, but this raised a question to be determined by the jury, and not by the presiding judge.

[3] The rule stated in Tolleson v. Railway, 88 S. C. 7, 70 S. E. 311, and quoted with approval in Bennett v. C. U. Station Co., 90 S. C. 308, 73 S. E. 340, is that: "Not only is the conscious invasion of the rights of another in a wanton, willful, and reckless manner an act of wrong, but that the same result follows, when the wrongdoer does not actually realize that he is invading the rights of another, provided the act is committed in such a manner that a person of ordinary prudence would say that it was a reckless disregard of another's rights." "The question whether a railroad company owes any duty to an infant trespassing upon its track until it discovers the infant has given rise to much discussion, and the authorities upon the subject are in irreconcilable conflict. Even conceding that a railroad company is not bound as a general proposition to look out for trespassers upon its track, it nevertheless is bound to exercise ordinary care in running its trains. The law imposes upon it the duty of keeping a reasonable lookout for obstructions on its track. The safety of its passengers and the rights of the public generally demand the enforcement of this rule. It is a general rule of law that a railroad company is liable in damages for an injury inflicted by it, when its negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the injury. If the direct and proximate cause of the infant's death was the negligence of the defendant in failing to keep a reasonable lookout, and to discover the child in time to have prevented the injury, it is as much liable in damages as if the proximate cause of the injury had been its negligence, after discovering the child upon its track." Mason v. Railway, 58 S. C. 70, 36 S. E. 440, 53 L. R. A. 913, 79 Am. St. Rep. 826.

The exceptions raising this question are therefore overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

LOWRY v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

1. PLEADING (§ 238*)—AMENDMENT—MOTION—NOTICE.

A notice served June 28th fixing the hearing of a motion for leave to amend the answer on July 3d or "as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard" was sufficient to authorize the court to entertain the motion on November 6th of the same year during another term, following a further notice on November 2d that the motion would be brought on for hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 602, 620-625; Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

2. MOTIONS (§ 40*)—DUTY OF JUDGE.

When a motion is made before a circuit judge which he thinks himself without power to entertain, he should intimate what he would do if clothed with such power, so that on appeal the court may decide whether such disposition would be a proper exercise of discretion.

3. PLEADING (§ 238*)—AMENDMENT—NOTICE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 195, allowing the court in its discretion and on terms, to permit an answer or reply to be made, or other act to be done after the time limited, or extend the time, or relieve a party from a proceeding taken against him by his mistake, etc., or permit an amendment of a proceeding taken by him to make it conform to the Code requirements, the court, upon proper showing and on such terms as it deems just, may allow the defendant to amend his answer without notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 602, 620-625; Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1041*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—LEAVE TO AMEND.

The court's error in ruling that he had no power to entertain a motion for leave to amend the answer was harmless where it appeared that such motion should have been overruled.

5. PLEADING (§ 238*)—AMENDMENT—SHOWING.

A motion for leave to amend the answer should have been overruled where the supporting affidavit did not show mistake or inadvertence or that due diligence had been exercised to procure the information upon which the proposed new defenses were based, but alleged merely that it was not convenient to sooner get such information.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1052*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error in permitting a witness to give improper testimony for one party was cured where the same testimony was given by the witness on cross-examination by the adverse party.

7. TRIAL (§ 139*)—PROVINCE OF JURY—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

Where there was sufficient testimony to take the case to the jury, the court properly refused to direct the verdict; it being for the jury to settle disputed matters of fact.

8. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for damage to freight, defendant's requested instruction that the presumption of loss and damage by the last carrier cannot arise where there is credible evidence tending to show that, prior to the delivery to the last carrier, the goods were not in good order, was properly refused; it being for the jury whether a presumption raised by law has been rebutted by evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 436, 439-441, 446-454, 456-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

9. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 194*)—AUTHORITY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for damage to freight, there was no error in modifying an instruction "that the agent had authority to incur the expense of making repairs" by inserting the words "express or apparent" after the word "authority."

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. A. Lowry against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 91 S. C. 350, 74 S. E. 753.

L. D. Jennings, of Sumter, for appellant. Willcox & Willcox, of Florence, and Mark Reynolds, of Sumter, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action against the defendant company for loss and damage to shipment of household furniture which the plaintiff had shipped from Henrietta, Tex., to Sumter, S. C. Upon the first trial of the cause, the presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, which upon appeal was reversed. See 88 S. C. 310, 70 S. E. 806. Some time thereafter and before the summer term of court for Sumter county in 1911, the defendant gave notice that a motion would be made on July 3d for an order allowing an amendment to the original answer. This motion was not brought to a hearing by the defendant during that term of court. On November 2, 1911, the defendant served upon plaintiff's counsel another notice that a motion would be made on November 6th before the presiding judge, Hon. Robert E. Copes, for an order to amend the answer. With this notice an affidavit of one of defendant's counsel was served stating that he had only recently been able to secure complete information upon the facts upon which he was seeking to amend the answer. Judge Copes refused to allow the amendment, holding that the notice of November 2d of the motion to be heard November 6th was not sufficient as to time. This cause was then tried before a jury and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff. A motion was made for a new trial which was overruled, and defendant appeals on 15 grounds.

[1] At the hearing of the cause in this court, exceptions 4, 5, 7, and 10 were withdrawn by the appellant. The first, second, and third exceptions allege error on the part of his honor, Judge Copes, in refusing to pass upon the merits of the motion for leave to amend the answer. The original notice of motion was served June 28, 1911, fixing the hearing of the motion on July 3, 1911, or "as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard." The motion was not heard at the July term of court, and afterwards on November 2, 1911, an additional notice was served notifying plaintiff's counsel that defendant would renew the notice of motion and the motion papers "heretofore served on June 28, 1911, on November 6, 1911," or "as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard." Judge Copes held that the notice served in June had lost all legal vitality, and that the notice served in November was ineffectual because it did not allow sufficient time. We think his honor was in error in so holding. The failure to dispose of the motion at the July term of court did not destroy the vitality of the notice. It provided for it to be heard at that term or "as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard." The object of the notice was to prepare the opposing counsel. It would be an extremely technical rule which would, as a matter of law, deprive a litigant of the right to have a motion of this nature heard under the circumstances as developed here. His honor was in error in holding that he could not hear the motion and that he had no discretion in the matter. He should have heard the motion and granted or refused it as he saw fit in his discretion.

[2] It is the better and safer practice for a circuit judge, when a motion is made before him when he thinks he has no power to entertain it, to intimate what he would do if he were clothed with the power, whether he would grant or refuse it, and then upon the appeal this court could determine whether he had erroneously exercised his discretion or not. In the case at bar, Judge Copes held he had no power to hear the motion. It would have been the better practice for him to have decided if he had the power would he have allowed the defendant to file the amended answer or not.

[3] Under section 195 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the court, upon a proper showing and upon such terms as the court thought just, could have allowed the defendant to amend its answer without notice whatsoever.

[4, 5] While Judge Copes was in error in not entertaining the motion, we do not think the defendant was prejudiced, as the proposed answer upon the showing made should not have been allowed. This case had been tried in the circuit court, verdict rendered for the plaintiff, appeal taken and a new trial granted, and case remanded on April 4, 1911, for another trial. During all this time no effort was made by the defendant to amend its answer or to secure complete information. The action was originally brought on July 22, 1908, and defendant's counsel's affidavit, upon which defendant relies to procure the order to amend answer, is dated November 2, 1911. A careful reading of that affidavit will not show such diligence on the part of defendant's counsel in procuring the information upon which amended answer is based as to allow them now to file the amended answer. It does not show excusable mistake or inadvertence on their part, and for this reason alone it would work injustice and hardship to the plaintiff at this stage of the proceedings to allow it to be filed. If there is any defense in the proposed amended answer at all, the inexcusable neglect of the defendant in not pleading it sooner deprives it of the right to have it heard in this case. If there is any merit in it, the plaintiff can be sued by defendant in a separate action. The substance of defendant's affidavit is not that it was mistaken when it first answered, but it was not convenient for it sooner to get the information upon which it bases its proposed new defenses. We are clearly of the opinion that, had Judge Copes considered the motion on the merits, he would not have been warranted in granting the order asked for on the affidavit submitted, together with the proposed amendment.

[6] The eighth and ninth exceptions allege error on the part of the circuit judge in admitting, over objection, evidence showing that the defendant, its agents and servants, had attempted to have repaired some of the damaged furniture. Even if it were conceded that there was error in the first instance in admitting this evidence and allowing plaintiff to testify to a conversation she had on the subject with Cooper, the agent of defendant, it was cured when defendant's attorney had Cooper, in response to his questions, testify in full as to what he did and as to the conversation between himself and the plaintiff. These exceptions are overruled.

[7] Exception 11 alleges error in not directing a verdict in favor of defendant for insufficiency or total want of evidence on the part of plaintiff showing any loss or damage occurred while in defendant's possession, and, if goods were damaged at all or lost, it occurred before delivery of property to the defendant.

Exception 15 alleges error on the same grounds in not granting a new trial, and the additional ground that the verdict is palpably excessive. There was sufficient testimony to carry the case to the jury, and it is their province to settle all disputed matters of fact, and there is sufficient testimony in the case to support their verdict. These exceptions are overruled.

[8] The twelfth exception alleges error in refusing to charge defendant's first request which is: "I charge you that the presumption of loss and damage by the last carrier cannot arise in any case where there is credible evidence tending to show that, prior to the delivery of the goods to the last carrier, they were not in fact in good order." There is no error here. It has been held, where a presumption of law arises and there is some testimony to rebut this presumption, it is for the jury and not for the court to determine upon which side rests the weight. Baker v. Telegraph Co., 87 S. C. 174, 69 S. E. 151. This exception is overruled.

[9] Exception 13 alleges error in modifying defendant's second request to charge and not charging it as submitted. His honor modified the request by inserting the words, after the word "authority," "express or apparent," so that the request as modified read, "That the agent had authority, express or apparent, to incur the expenses of making repairs," etc., instead of charging the request, "That the agent had the authority to incur the expenses of making repairs," etc. This exception is overruled.

[10] It is "hornbook law" that the agent must act within the scope of his authority or within the apparent scope of his authority. Whenever there is evidence that there is an agent acting in the apparent scope of his authority to do certain things, and it is shown that he has done these things apparently acting in the scope of his authority, then the burden would be shifted to the other side, and it would be necessary for them to show by the greater weight of evidence that these acts on the part of the agent were outside of his authority. A principal who asserts that his agent has acted outside of his instructions must show it by the preponderance of the evidence. Whaley v. Duncan, 47 S. C. 139, 25 S. E. 54.

Exception 14 alleges error in charging plaintiff's second request. We see no error in this. His honor qualified the request by adding the words, "And I charge you further that the presumption may be rebutted by evidence." He also in this connection charged defendant's fifth request to charge.

A reading of the judge's charge will show that the jury were instructed that the defendant was not liable unless it was shown that the goods were lost or damaged by the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. BETHUNE†

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 12, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1176*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—PREJUDICE.

Renewal of a motion for a new trial because accused was denied the right to move for change of venue was not prejudicial where the facts did not establish a prima facie case calling for a change, so that, if the motion had been made in due time, the circuit court would have refused it on the showing made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3180, 3191; Dec. Dig. § 1176.*]

2. JURY (§ 131*)—EXAMINATION—VOIR DIRE.

Where a juror had sworn that he was not conscious of any prejudice or bias for or against accused, it was not an improper exercise of the court's discretion to sustain an objection to the further question whether the juror would be influenced by the fact that accused was a negro, though he had exhausted his peremptory challenges.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 561-582; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1152*)—APPEAL—EXAMINATION OF JUROR.

After the statutory questions have been asked of a juror and answered, any further examination on the juror's voir dire is within the discretion of the trial judge, the exercise of which will be reviewed only for abuse thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3053-3067; Dec. Dig. § 1152.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 920*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—INCAPACITY OF ATTORNEY.

That the attorney for accused was mentally unbalanced during the trial, and soon thereafter was carried to a sanitarium for treatment, was not ground for a new trial where it did not appear that he did or left undone anything which would have affected the result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2202-2205; Dec. Dig. § 920.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 913*)—PUBLIC PREJUDICE—VERDICT—VACATION.

Since mere existence of a strong public prejudice against accused is not necessarily ground for change of venue, the existence of such prejudice does not warrant the setting aside of a conviction unless it appears that the verdict was influenced thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2137-2145; Dec. Dig. § 913.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1163*)—CONVICTION—VERDICT—PREJUDICE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden of proving that a conviction was influenced by public prejudice is on accused; the presumption being that such was not the case, but that the trial judge performed his duty to see that accused had a fair and impartial trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3090-3099; Dec. Dig. § 1163.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence is addressed to the trial court's discretion, the exercise of which will not be reviewed unless it appears to have been abused or controlled by some error of law.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Clarendon County.

"To be officially reported."

Willie Bethune was convicted of murder, and from an order denying his motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Clifton, for appellant. P. H. Stoll, Sol., for the State.

HYDRICK, J. At the June term, 1909, of the court of general sessions for Clarendon county, defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. On appeal, his conviction was sustained. 86 S. C. 143, 67 S. E.

466. A petition for rehearing was presented, one of the grounds being that, since his conviction, defendant had become insane. The petition was dismissed without prejudice to defendant to plead his insanity, when called upon to say why a new day for execution of the sentence should not be assigned. 86 S. C. 154, 67 S. E. 466. At the June term, 1910, when so called upon, he pleaded that he was insane. Upon that issue, a trial by jury was had, and the verdict was that he was sane. On appeal, that judgment was affirmed, and the case was remanded for the purpose of having another day assigned for execution of the sentence. 88 S. C. 401, 71 S. E. 29. This was done at the June term, 1911. Thereafter, on motion of defendant, execution of the sentence was stayed in order that he might make a motion for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence, and on the ground that he had not had such fair and impartial trial as is guaranteed by the Constitution. That motion was heard at the September term, 1911, and refused, and, from the order refusing it, this appeal was taken.

The murder of which defendant stands convicted was committed February 21, 1909. Soon after the defendant was arrested, the sheriff received information that a mob was being organized to lynch him, and, by order of the Governor, he was carried to the state penitentiary for safe-keeping, and was kept there until he was carried back for trial at the next succeeding term of court in June. He was arraigned on Wednesday, June 9th, and his trial was set for and had on Saturday, the 12th, which was the last day of the court.

Unusual interest on the part of the public was taken in the trial, and there was considerable feeling of resentment and indignation against the defendant, which was manifested by threats on the part of the friends and relatives of the deceased that, if he were convicted of anything less than murder, he would be lynched. These threats were brought to the attention of the presiding judge, who caused 10 or 12 extra deputies to be sworn in to preserve order and protect the prisoner. During the trial, the courthouse was crowded to standing room. The space within the bar was filled, and some of the audience were allowed to sit on the steps leading to the judge's bench.

At one time—just when it does not appear—the prisoner's attorney had been mentally unbalanced and had been in a sanitarium for treatment; but, for some time immediately before the trial, he had been attending to his business, and was employed by the prisoner's stepfather to defend him. The solicitor admits in the "case" that he was unbalanced during the trial, and that he remained so until after the trial on circuit of the issue as to the prisoner's sanity. Soon after that trial, he was carried to a sanitarium for treatment, and has not since participated in the defense.

Notwithstanding some of the points raised on this appeal were considered and decided on the first appeal, we have, in favorem vite, at the earnest request of appellant's attorney, whose services in behalf of appellant are entirely gratuitous, carefully reconsidered them; but we find no reason to change or modify the previous decision.

[1] The first of these contentions is that, under the circumstances, the appellant was denied the right to move for a change of venue. In addition to the ground upon which this point was decided on the first appeal, we may say that the facts made to appear on that appeal and also on this do not make a prima facie case calling for a change of venue. Therefore, if the question were an open one, and if the motion had been made in due time, the circuit court would have refused it on the showing made. Hence appellant was not prejudiced by the failure to make the motion. And certainly where the failure to make such motion was due to no error on the part of the court, at least a prima facie case, entitling appellant to a change of venue, should be made before this court would be warranted in reversing the judgment.

[2] We notice next the ground that appellant's attorney was not allowed to ask a juror, on his voir dire, whether he would be influenced, in passing on the evidence, by the fact that defendant is a negro. Mr. Justice Woods, in concurring in the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Jones on the first appeal stated that, if it had appeared that defendant had exhausted his peremptory challenges, he would have been inclined to sustain the exception to the ruling of the circuit court on that point. It now appears that the prisoner had exhausted his peremptory challenges. Notwithstanding that fact and the great weight to which the intimation of the learned justice (who did not sit at the hearing of this appeal) is entitled, after careful consideration, we are constrained to adhere to the previous decision. The juror had already sworn that he was not conscious of any prejudice or bias for or against the prisoner. Therefore his answer to the proposed question if he had been allowed to answer must have been in the negative.

[3] After the statutory questions have been asked and answered, any further examination of a juror on voir dire must be left to the discretion of the trial judge, which is subject to review only for abuse thereof.

[4] The mental condition of the appellant's former attorney is not ground for a new trial, because it has not been made to appear that it caused prejudice to his case. It does not appear that he did or left undone anything which would probably have affected the result. If there had been any apparent prejudicial mismanagement of the case, we feel sure that it would not have escaped the vigilance of the presiding judge, who would have taken the necessary steps to safeguard the defendant's rights. The case was managed in this court with a zeal and skill equal to, if not above, the average, and there is nothing in the record in either of the former appeals, or in the evidence on this motion, which leads to the conclusion that the appellant's rights were not duly protected, or that he suffered any detriment by reason of the unfortunate condition of his attorney.

[5] The mere existence of a strong public prejudice against the accused is not necessarily ground for a change of venue. It must be made to appear that it is such that he cannot get a fair trial. A fortiori the mere existence of strong prejudice against the accused does not warrant setting aside a verdict of guilt, unless it is made to appear that the verdict was influenced by it. When the existence of such prejudice as would call for a change of venue is known, or by the exercise of due diligence would be known, to the defendant or his attorney, a motion to change the venue should be made. The defendant will not be allowed to speculate on chances, and, if the verdict goes against him, obtain a new trial because of such prejudice, unless a very clear case, calling for the exercise of the discretion vested in the court, is made out. Now, in this case, it has not been made to appear that the prejudice in the community against the defendant was so great that it influenced the verdict, or that any of the things relied upon by defendant to show such prejudice had any effect upon the result.

[6] The burden was upon defendant to prove that fact by clear and convincing evidence. The presumption is the other way. We are bound to presume that the conscientious and learned judge who presided at the trial saw to it, as was his duty, that defendant had a fair and impartial trial, according to law, and also that it was had with the dignity and decorum which becomes the administration of justice, and which the gravity and solemnity of the issue demanded. We must presume, until the contrary is made to appear, that good men and true, who are under the sanction of a solemn oath to render a true verdict, will be governed by their honest judgment of the evidence, and that neither passion nor prejudice nor the influence of the mob nor any other improper influence will be allowed to swerve them from the path of duty.

It is greatly to be regretted that it should be necessary to hold a trial in any other than a calm and judicial atmosphere. But it is natural that foul murder or other brutal crime should arouse excitement and indignation among the people, and, in such circumstances, we cannot expect normal conditions. As was said by Mr. Justice Woods in State v. Weldon, 91 S. C. 36, 74 S. E. 44:

"Ideal conditions, it is true, are not to be expected, and verdicts should not be set aside by an appellate court for misconduct in a trial, unless the evidence is clear and convincing that extraneous influences so interfered with the conduct of the trial, or so pressed upon the jury, as to become factors in the result. A vast number of cases might be cited to show that this court will refuse to heed unsubstantial charges that trials have not been fair."

While that case, which is relied on by appellant, had some points of similarity to this, in its most essential features there were marked differences. There a special court was ordered to try the defendants soon after the crime was committed, and they were tried in the midst of intense and bitter public excitement against them. They had no counsel. The presiding judge appointed counsel for them who, on account of the mob spirit, which was so prevalent that it invaded the courthouse itself, and the threats of lynching which he heard as he went into the courthouse in response to the call of the presiding judge, felt constrained to forego his right to demand the three days allowed by law, after arraignment, for preparation for trial, and went into the trial at once, without the least time for preparation, or to get defendants' witnesses, under compulsion of the fear that, if he did not, his clients would be lynched. During that trial, the spectators were allowed to so crowd the space within the bar, and press upon the court and jury, that defendants' counsel could not see the witnesses while he was cross-examining them, and had frequently to call on the court to order the crowd back so that he could see the witness he was cross-examining; and he did not see the jury, because of the intervening crowd, until he stood before them to make his argument. On the other hand, this defendant had from February 21st till June 12th to prepare for trial. To be sure he was in the state penitentiary nearly all of that time, but he was at liberty to communicate with his attorney and his friends, who were looking after his interests. His stepfather employed counsel for him—just how long before the trial does not appear—but no point was made that he was not employed or could not have been employed long enough before to have had ample time to get ready for trial. The three days after arraignment allowed by law for preparation for trial were demanded and allowed. Besides these, there are a number of other distinguishing features.

[7] As to the ground of after-discovered evidence: "The rule is well settled that a motion for a new trial on after-discovered evidence is addressed to the discretion of the circuit court, and the refusal of such motion will not be reviewed unless it appears that there was abuse of discretion, or that the exercise of discretion was controlled by some error of law. State v. David, 14 S. C. 432; State v. Workman, 15 S. C. 547; Sams v. Hoover, 83 S. C. 404, 12 S. E. 8; Seegers v. McCreery, 41 S. C. 549, 19 S. E. 696; Peeples v. Werner & Co., 51 S. C. 405, 29 S. E. 2. Such a motion must generally depend on matters of fact, over which this court has no jurisdiction in actions at law." State v. Bradford, 87 S. C. 546, 549, 70 S. E. 308. Applying the principles above stated to this case, it has not been made to appear that there was abuse of discretion in refusing the motion, or that the exercise of the discretion was controlled by error of law. The refusal of the motion necessarily implied a finding of all the material facts involved against appellant, and such findings are not reviewable. It is inconceivable that the circuit judge would have refused the motion if he had been satisfied by the evidence that, for any of the reasons assigned, defendant had not had a fair and impartial trial.

Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, and in view of the fact that a human life is at stake, we have waived all formalities and have carefully examined this record, as well as those of the former trials, but we have not been satisfied that the defendant has not had a fair and impartial trial, and been justly condemned.

Therefore it is the judgment of this court that the order appealed from be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to the circuit court for the purpose of having another day assigned for the execution of the sentence heretofore imposed upon the defendant.

1. DAMAGES (§ 151*)—NEGLIGENCE (§ 111*)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

2. RAILROADS (§ 364*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—PERSON ON RIGHT OF WAY.

The fact that telegraph cross-arms were thrown from a train moving at a rapid rate of speed at a point traveled by the public tended to show such reckless disregard of the rights of the public and of plaintiff, a section hand, who was struck by a cross-arm, as would render the defendant railroad company liable.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; R. E. Copes, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Henry R. Geddings against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 91 S. C. 350, 74 S. E. 753.

Instruction objected to in the eighth exception on account of the italicized words: "Willfulness, gentlemen of the jury, is the intentional doing of some act, or the failure to do some act, according to one's own will, regardless of the right of others, when the party knows, or is under legal obligation to know, that the doing or the failing to do such act might cause injury to other persons."

The material parts of the complaint are as follows:

"(2) That at the times hereinafter mentioned the plaintiff was working for the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company as one of its section force.

"(3) That on or about the 23d day of August, 1910, the plaintiff was working with said section force on the railroad right of way of the said Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company between Alcolu and Manning, near what is known as the 'Sixteen Mile Post.' That the plaintiff and the other section force were engaged in clearing off the right of way. That while so engaged a freight train came along, coming from toward Sumter and going toward Manning. That said train was running at the speed of about 30 miles an hour. That, as said train approached, the plaintiff turned his back toward the way from which the train was coming, in order to prevent cinders and smoke from getting into his eyes. That the plaintiff got out of the way of the train and stood some eight or ten feet from the railroad track, with his back turned as aforesaid, and that, while standing there and without any notice to the plaintiff whatsoever, the agent of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company threw from said train, under the said defendant's instructions, what is known as a 'cross-arm' for telegraph poles, and struck the plaintiff below the knee on the left leg, knocked him down, and broke his left leg, and knocked the plaintiff into the ditch along said right of way. The plaintiff alleges that under the instructions of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company that said cross-arm and other cross-arms were thrown off of the train wherever needed, while going at its ordinary speed, for the purpose of saving time, and not stopping where it was necessary to put off cross-arms for the telegraph poles. The plaintiff alleges that all of this was done in a willful, wanton, negligent, and reckless manner by the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company.

"(4) The plaintiff alleges that the defendants knew that the right of way of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company at the point herein alleged, and other points, were constantly and with the knowledge and consent of the said Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company traveled by the public, as well as being worked upon by the section hands of the defendant, Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and knew that the throwing off of said cross-arms while the train was running was dangerous and liable to injure the traveling public, and especially the section hands of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, by the throwing off of the cross-arms in the manner herein alleged. The plaintiff further alleges that the defendants knew that he was standing on the right of way where he was required to be in the performance of his duties to the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company at the time he was hurt aforesaid. That the defendant Alger Hawkins saw the plaintiff standing on the right of way as aforesaid, or by the slightest exercise of care could have seen the plaintiff and avoided the injury aforesaid, but without regard to the plaintiff's rights, and in a willful, wanton, reckless, and negligent manner intentionally threw said cross-arm and struck and injured the plaintiff as aforesaid. The plaintiff further alleges that it was negligence on the part of the defendants in running said train at such a rapid rate of speed, and while so running, requiring and allowing the throwing off of said cross-arms on the right of way, upon which they knew that the plaintiff and other section hands were engaged in work, and upon which they knew the traveling public con- stantly traveled, and that injury would likely occur to some of them; that, notwithstanding this knowledge on the part of the defendants, the defendants required or allowed the cross-arm to be thrown as aforesaid, and injured the plaintiff as aforesaid, which injury caused this plaintiff great suffering, physical pain, mental anguish, loss of time, and expense, and maimed and permanently injured him for life all through the carelessness, recklessness, wanton, and willful conduct and negligent acts of the defendants, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $25,000."

Mark Reynolds, of Sumter, and Lucian W. McLemore, of Florence, for appellant. L. D. Jennings, of Sumter, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the wrongful acts of the defendants. The allegations contained in the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the complaint are material to the questions involved, and will be reported. The defendants denied each and every allegation of the complaint. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $3,000 actual damages and $2,000 punitive damages against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and the said defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

The defendants made a motion to strike out the words in the complaint which we have italicized, but the motion was refused, and this constitutes the first assignment of error.

[1] The plaintiff is required to specify in his complaint the grounds upon which he bases his cause of action for negligence; also, the grounds upon which he bases his cause of action for punitive damages. The italicized words were intended to allege a reckless disregard of the rights of the traveling public at the said place in throwing the cross-arms from the train, from which the law imputes malice, towards the plaintiff, or any other person thereby injured.

[2] The fact that the right of way where the injury was sustained was constantly, and with the knowledge and consent of the appellant, traveled by the public, tends to show that it was recklessness to throw the cross-arms from the train at that point.

[3] But, even if such words were erroneously allowed to remain in the complaint, the exceptions raising this question cannot be sustained, as it has not been made to appear that such error was prejudicial. It is conceded by the appellant's attorneys that the exceptions assigning error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in permitting the introduction of testimony, to prove the italicized allegations, cannot be sustained, in case this court sustains the circuit court in refusing to strike out the italicized words.

The next question for consideration is whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages. There was testimony tending to sustain the allegations of the complaint in this respect.

[4] The next question which will be considered is presented by the eighth exception. It is only necessary to refer to the case of Tolleson v. Railway, 88 S. C. 7, 70 S. E. 311, to show that this exception cannot be sustained. In that case the court uses this language: "Not only is the conscious invasion of the rights of another, in a wanton, willful, and reckless manner, an act of wrong, but that the same result follows, when the wrongdoer does not actually realize that he is invading the rights of another, provided the act is committed in such a manner that a person of ordinary reason and prudence would say that it was a reckless disregard of another's rights."

The tenth exception raises the next question that will be considered.

[5] It is the duty of a railroad company to load and unload its freight, and in the present case the appellant could not escape liability by delegating such duty to the telegraph company. We have so recently discussed a similar question that we deem it only necessary to cite the case of Reed v. Railway, 75 S. C. 162, 55 S. E. 218, to show that this exception cannot be sustained.

The last question to be determined is raised by the eleventh exception. There was other testimony besides the failure of the conductor to keep a proper lookout. Unloading the cross-arms at a point traveled by the public, while the train was running at a rapid rate of speed, tended to show a reckless disregard of the rights of the public and of the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 183*)—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—LOST DEEDS—PROOF OF LOSS—SUFFICIENCY.

A plaintiff made sufficient proof of loss of an original deed, so as to permit him to offer a record copy, where he testified that it was "out of his power to produce" the original; that he had never seen it; that, so far as he knew, the paper was in the possession of the former attorney; and by proof that a member of a law firm, to whom the clerk of the court sent the original after it had been recorded, had searched through the firm papers and through the papers of the first-mentioned attorney, and that it was not found, though the other member of the firm did not search for the lost instrument.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lee County: Robt. E. Copes, Judge.

Action by Sebastian W. James and others against Martha A. Ferguson and others. From an order revoking a nonsuit and granting a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, of Sumter, for appellants.
A. B. Stuckey, of Sumter, for respondents.

FRASER, J. The following statement appears in the case: "This was a suit commenced by S. W. James, Marion Moise, and A. B. Stuckey, plaintiffs, against William J. James, Andrew Reynolds et al., defendants, for partition of several tracts of land, including a 90-acre tract, in the possession of the defendant Andrew Reynolds. Andrew Reynolds answered, denying that the plaintiffs had the title, or any other of the defendants, to the 90 acres in his possession. The case was placed on calendar 1 to try the issue of title to the 90-acre tract. The case was called for trial, and trial began at Bishopville, Lee county, S. C., on the 26th of October, 1911, before his honor, Robert E. Copes, presiding judge. Mr. A. B. Stuckey, attorney for plaintiff, offered in evidence the record copy of deed of W. H. Ingram, master, to W. F. B. Haynsworth, which he claimed to be a link in the chain of title to the 90-acre tract. When this was offered, L. D. Jennings, attorney for Andrew Reynolds, objected, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had not shown the loss of the original deed, or that it was out of their power to produce the same, or that they had not destroyed or mislaid the same, or in any way previously put it out of their power to produce the same, in order to introduce a copy in evidence. It further appears that the only plaintiff who has any interest in this branch of the case is Sebastian W. James. The presiding judge granted a nonsuit; but, being satisfied that he had made a mistake in granting it, revoked the order and granted a new trial.

[1] The motion for a new trial was made on three grounds. There are four exceptions, three of which complain that his honor erred in granting the motion on the three several grounds taken in the motion. These three exceptions cannot be considered, inasmuch as it does not appear that his honor granted the motion on all or either of the grounds of the motion. The order simply states that, "after full argument and upon the record, I have concluded that I was in error in excluding the copy of the said deed in evidence which brought about the order of nonsuit; therefore said order is set aside and a new trial ordered."

[2, 3] The appellant's fourth exception complains of error in the order of revocation, on the ground that the original order was correct; and appellant claims that the loss of the original deed of Ingram, master, to W. F. B. Haynsworth was not sufficiently proven. Was there sufficient proof? It is true that there were three plaintiffs of record, and only two testified. It is also true that all the parties who offer the copy must make proof. Linning v. Crawford, 2 Bailey, 297.

At this stage of the case, the Moise and Stuckey interests were not involved, and they offered nothing. It was Sebastian W. James who offered the paper, and he was examined and showed that it was "out of his power to produce it." The proof showed that he had never seen the paper; that, so far as he knew, the paper was in the possession of his former attorney, Mr. W. F. B. Haynsworth. The clerk of the court, however, said that, while he did not make the actual transcript on the record, he had possession of the original, and had sent it, together with the bill for recording, to Haynsworth & Haynsworth. It was then proven that a member of the firm of Haynsworth & Haynsworth had searched through their papers and those of his father, Mr. W. F. B. Haynsworth, and it was not found. It is claimed, however, that Mr. Hugh C. Haynsworth, the other member of the firm, should also have looked, in order that all who may have had possession may purge themselves of responsibility. That is not the rule. The Haynsworths did not offer the copy. The rule that all must make proof applies only to those offering the copy, in order that one party to a cause may not suppress testimony.

In Turner v. Moore, 1 Brev. 236, it is said sometimes "very slight evidence of the loss, in cases like the present, where the land has been conveyed by the original grantee, and has passed to different purchasers, and no proof that the plaintiff ever had possession of the original grant, ought to be deemed sufficient for the purpose of admitting an authentic office copy in evidence."

Why the record itself should have been treated as a copy of the record does not appear; but the parties have so treated it, and we have accepted the statute as we find it.

His honor was fully justified in granting the order appealed from; and it is affirmed.

LAWRENCE v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 22, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 573*)—STATEMENT OF FACTS—"EX PARTE" STATEMENT.

While, ordinarily, a short statement of the testimony, rather than a complete transcript thereof, is sufficient for appeal, where the parties stipulated to make an agreed statement, and the appellant, being pressed for time, did not submit the statement to the respondent, it was "ex parte," and could not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2560-2566; Dec. Dig. § 573.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 291*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a railroad employé the court first instructed that a failure to employ competent servants, by which a servant was injured, would render the master liable. At the request of the defendant, the jury were then charged that the master must furnish reasonably safe and suitable appliances for its employés, and that it could not be charged as an insurer of the safety of its employés, being liable only for negligence. A charge, requested by plaintiff, was given that the master must furnish reasonably safe and suitable appliances, and if its failure to do so is the proximate cause of an injury to an employé, without negligence on his part, the master would be liable therefor. The court, of its own motion, then charged that if the jury should find the defendant guilty of the negligence charged in the complaint, and that that negligence was a proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, it should find for the plaintiff; but if the plaintiff himself was negligent, or if both the negligence of plaintiff and defendant concurring produced the injury, they should find for defendant. Held, that the propositions of law stated are not conflicting and irreconcilable, and the charge was proper.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Robert E. Copes, Judge.

Action by Shelley Lawrence against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company appeals. Affirmed.

L. W. McLemore, of Florence, and Mark Reynolds, of Sumter, for appellant. L. D. Jennings and J. H. Clifton, both of Sumter, for respondent.

FRASER, J. Appellant's argument thus states the case: "Plaintiff respondent, employed by defendant appellant as brakeman, while attempting to uncouple certain cars in the freight train upon which he was working, was, at Orangeburg, S. C., on June 7, 1910, injured under circumstances concerning which there is conflict in the evidence. Thereafter, on October 6, 1910, this action was commenced to recover damages in the sum of $25,000 upon allegations of negligence and willfulness in the several particulars described in the complaint. Appellant answered, denying generally the allegations of the complaint, and alleging respondent's contributory negligence and his acceptance of relief department benefits as affirmative defenses. The case was tried before his honor, Judge Robert E. Copes, and a jury at Sumter, on November 10, 1911, resulting in verdict for plaintiff of $2,500. The case is before this court on the exceptions appearing in the record."

[1] The appellant was required, by order of court, to withdraw the statement in "the case" upon which exceptions 1, 2, 6, 7, and 8 were based; and therefore these exceptions were abandoned. It seems that appellant and respondent agreed to make an agreed statement, and appellant, being pressed for time, did not submit the statement to respondent. It is not to be inferred from this action of the court that it requires the printing of the testimony (sometimes hundreds of pages of entirely useless testimony), instead of a short statement of it. The statement here was stricken out because it was "ex parte." The appellant said that the statement was true in every word. This court does not doubt it. A statement may be true in every word and still unfair. We do not intend to intimate that this statement was unfair. It was ex parte, and therefore excluded.

[2] The appellant consolidated the third, fourth, and fifth exceptions, as follows: "The remaining exceptions, Nos. 3, 4, and 5, complain of error in the charge, in that, first, his honor charged plaintiff's seventh request with a slight and unimportant modification, containing, as we hope to show, an utterly unsound principle of law; second, that his honor, of his own motion, charged the jury practically to the same effect; third, that, although his honor charged defendant's third request, yet he nevertheless destroyed its effect by charging plaintiff's seventh request, and by the portion of the charge already mentioned as being in consonance with this seventh request. Not only was appellant deprived of its right to have the jury properly instructed upon the questions covered by its third request, but the case was submitted to the jury under the charge, embracing conflicting and irreconcilable propositions of law."

His honor first charged the jury as follows: "Now, it is the duty of the master, as he employs servants, to employ competent servants, reasonably safe and competent servants; and if a person is injured on account of the master's failure to employ competent servants, if by reason of incompetency a servant is injured, and that failure causes the injury, the master would be liable."

The jury were next charged defendant's third request: "It is the duty of a railroad company to furnish reasonably safe and suitable appliances for the use of its employes, and a reasonably safe and suitable place to perform the same; and it is liable only for negligence in failing to perform this duty. It is not an insurer of the safety of its employes, but it is liable only for negligence. The law does not require it to furnish the most improved and newest appliances, but only requires that it shall furnish those which a reasonably careful person would provide under the same or similar circumstances."

His honor, however, subsequently reiterated the instruction first given, and, as we contend, accentuated the error therein, by granting plaintiff's seventh request and giving it to the jury with the slight modification already referred to: "It is the duty of the master to furnish reasonably safe and suitable appliances to enable the servant to perform his work; and if injury result to the servant, without negligence on his part, on account of the failure of the master to perform this duty to the servant, then the master is liable for such injury, if such failure is the proximate cause of the servant's injury."

The charge must be considered as a whole, and, when so considered, the exceptions cannot be sustained. His honor commenced his charge proper with a definition of negligence. He then, at the defendant's request, charged the jury that the defendant was only liable for negligence. Then, in defendant's third request, he again told the jury "it is liable only for negligence to perform its duty." Then his honor, on his own account, charged as follows: "So, gentlemen of the jury, if the evidence satisfies you by its preponderance that the defendants, or any one or more of them, were guilty of negligence in any respect, in one or more of the respects alleged in the complaint, and that that negligence was the direct and proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, then it would be your duty to find for the plaintiff; but, gentlemen of the jury, if, on the other hand, the evidence satisfies you that the plaintiff himself was negligent, and that his own negligence was the direct and proximate cause of his injury, then it would be your duty to find for the defendant. Or, if you find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, in the sense in which I have defined it to you—that is, if you find that the plaintiff was negligent, and that the defendant was also negligent—and those two acts of negligence combining and concurring and moving together brought about the disaster as the proximate cause thereof, then, gentlemen of the jury, in that event it will be your duty to find for the defendant."

These are not "conflicting and irreconcilable propositions of law."

In Anderson v. Railway, 70 S. C. 492, 493, 50 S. E. 202, 203, this court says: "The sixth exception is as follows: 'Because his honor erred in instructing the jury that the master must furnish the servant with safe and suitable tools and appliances, and also furnish him with an adequate force of hands to do the work in a safe manner; and, if he fails in that duty, then he has not come up to the measure of duty imposed upon him by the law. The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that this instruction overlooked the rule of law which requires the master to furnish his servants with reasonably safe and suitable tools and appliances, and with such a force as would enable him to do the work in a reasonably safe manner, thereby fixing a higher standard of care than the law fixes, and making this standard imperative upon the master.' The charge stated a correct principle of law. Hicks v. Railway, 63 S. C. 559, 41 S. E. 753. If the defendant desired further explanation of this principle, requests to that effect should have been presented." In this case the defendant desired a fuller statement, requested it, and the request was granted. These exceptions are overruled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

FLANARY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 18, 1912.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 304*)—PRIVILEGE—STATUTORY PROTECTION.

A witness in a criminal proceeding cannot avail himself of the privilege against giving incriminating testimony afforded by Const. art. 1, § 8 (Code 1904, p. ccix), where a statute gives him full immunity against liability to prosecution for any unlawful act which he may disclose in such testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 304*)—PRIVILEGE—STATUTORY PROTECTION.

On a criminal trial a witness was asked whether, after an election, he testified before the grand jury touching the violation of any clause or part of Code 1904, § 145a, and also touching the violation of any other election laws, to which he replied that he went before the grand jury and testified concerning breaches of the election laws. Held, that the answer, considered in connection with the question, showed that he had testified relative to violations of section 145a, and hence was entitled to whatever immunity was afforded by subsection 9, § 145a, Code Supp. 1910, providing that no witness, giving evidence in any prosecution or other proceeding under that act, shall be proceeded against for any offense against that act, or against any other election law, committed by him at or in connection with the same election.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1061, 1062; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 42*)—PRIVILEGE—"PROCEEDING."

A witness testifying before the grand jury relative to violations of section 145a, Code Supp. 1910, is entitled to the immunity afforded by subsection 9, whether the grand jury's investigation results in an indictment, presentment, or information, or not; such inquiry by the grand jury constituting a "proceeding."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 45-48; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5631-5638.]

4. WITNESSES (§ 304*)—PRIVILEGE—STATUTORY PROTECTION.

Under such subsection 9, a person who testified before the grand jury relative to violations of section 145a, Code Supp. 1910, at a particular election, can be compelled to testify on the trial of a person charged with accepting a bribe to vote at the same election for a particular candidate, under section 3853, although his testimony incriminates himself; that section affording immunity from prosecution under Code 1904, § 145a, or any other election law, coextensive with the constitutional privilege of silence.

Error to Circuit Court, Lee County.

C. R. Flanary, a witness on the trial of Dock Burchett for crime, was adjudged guilty of contempt of court, and he brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Noel, J. W. Orr, and M. G. Ely, for plaintiff in error. Samuel W. Williams, Atty. Gen., E. E. Skaggs, and E. W. Pennington, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. Dock Burchett was indicted in the circuit court of Lee county at its December term, 1911, for unlawfully and corruptly receiving from C. R. Flanary $40, under an agreement with him that he, the said Dock Burchett, would vote for J. D. Edds, candidate for clerk, and other candidates in said election, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth. To this indictment Burchett pleaded not guilty, whereupon a jury was sworn to try the issue, and the commonwealth placed upon the stand C. R. Flanary, and asked him certain questions connected with and relating to the offense charged in the indictment, which the witness refused to answer, because, as he stated, to answer any of the said questions would either incriminate or tend to incriminate himself, and thereupon the court adjudged the witness to be in contempt of court, and assessed against him a fine of $25 for said alleged contempt, to which judgment Flanary obtained a writ of error.

The petitioner contends that the judgment of the circuit court violates section 8 of the Bill of Rights, article 1 of the Constitution (Code 1904, p. ccix), which declares, that no man shall be "compelled in any criminal proceeding to give evidence against himself"; that the privilege guaranteed by this constitutional provision relates to the personal liberty of the citizen, and it is now a generally accepted principle that such constitutional provisions should be liberally construed and given full force, or the intent thereof will be unavailing; that, being compelled to answer said questions, the petitioner would have been deprived of this constitutional right, guaranteed to him by both the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of Virginia, as construed by this court in the cases of Cullen v. Commonwealth, 65 Va. 624, Temple v. Commonwealth, 75 Va. 892, and Kendrick v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 490.

In Cullen's Case, supra, the court said: "By the eighth section of the bill of rights of Virginia a person is not only secured against giving evidence against himself on his own trial, but he cannot be required, on the trial of another, to testify, if his evidence will tend to criminate himself," and that, "even if a person might be required to give evidence on the trial of another which might tend to criminate himself, if the statute afforded him a complete indemnity, by discharging him from all prosecution for the offense (of which quære), the act of October 31, 1870 (Acts 1869-70, c. 355), amending section 1, c. 12, of the Code of 1860, does not afford that indemnity, and therefore, in requiring any person engaged in a duel to testify against another prosecuted for having fought such duel, is unconstitutional." It appears from that case that the point decided by the court was that the statute, which it was claimed afforded indemnity to the accused and by virtue of which he was adjudged guilty in the hustings court of the city of Richmond for refusing to testify, was held not to afford a sufficient indemnity against prosecution, and the question was left undecided as to whether or not it was in the power of the Legislature to afford him a complete indemnity by discharging him from all prosecution for the offense.

In Temple's Case, supra, one Berry was indicted for setting up and promoting a lottery, and Temple was called by the commonwealth as a witness. He refused to testify, upon the ground that his answers might tend to incriminate him; but, the commonwealth relying upon chapter 195, § 20, of the Code of 1873, as affording the witness indemnity from prosecution, a fine was imposed upon the witness, who brought the case to this court, where it was held that the section of the Code relied upon, "which provides that a witness giving evidence in a prosecution for unlawful gaming shall never be proceeded against for any offense of unlawful gaming committed by him at the time and place indicated in such prosecution, does not apply to a prosecution for managing and conducting a lottery, and a witness cannot be required to testify in such a case if he will thereby criminate himself." In that case the opinion was delivered by Judge Christian, and Judge Staples delivered an opinion, concurring in that of Judge Christian, that the "indemnity afforded the witness in prosecutions for gaming by the twentieth section of chapter 195, Code of 1873, is not extended to witnesses in prosecutions for violation of the laws against lottery dealing. Upon that ground I think the witness in this case would not be compelled to answer the question asked him by the attorney for the commonwealth."

Continuing, the judge said: "If this were a prosecution for unlawful gaming, as defined by our statutes, I think the witness would be bound to testify; for he is fully protected by the very provisions of the twentieth section already adverted to. It is very true I concurred with the majority of the court in Cullen's Case, 65 Va. 624; but the question whether the Legislature may not compel the witness to answer by affording him ample indemnity was left undecided in that case. I wish further to say that subsequent reflection has led me to entertain considerable doubt of the correctness of a good deal that was said in Cullen's Case, and, if the occasion occurs, I feel myself at liberty to reconsider the whole subject."

In Kendrick v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 490, Kendrick was sworn and sent to the grand jury to testify as to a charge against Lyon of unlawful gaming, and refused to answer questions propounded by the grand jury, because the answer would tend to criminate and disgrace him. A majority of the court held, Judge Fauntleroy delivering the opinion, that sections 20 and 22, pp. 314, 315, subc. 10, c. 311, Acts 1877-78, New Criminal Procedure, "secures full protection to witnesses testifying in prosecutions for unlawful gaming, and Kendrick is not justified in refusing to testify on the ground that his answer will tend to criminate and disgrace him."

The statute under which indemnity in that case was asserted enacts that "no person, prosecuted for unlawful gaming, shall be competent to testify against a witness for the commonwealth in such prosecution touching any unlawful gaming committed by him prior to the commencement of such prosecution; nor shall any witness, giving evidence either before the grand jury or the court in such prosecution, be ever proceeded against for any offense of unlawful gaming committed by him at the time and place indicated in such prosecution; but such witness shall be compelled to testify, and for refusing to answer questions, may, by the court, be fined a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months"; and by the twenty-second section of the same act it is provided that "in a criminal prosecution, other than for perjury or an action on a penal statute, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination."

The court was of opinion that these provisions of the law "give to the witness full indemnity and assurance against any liability to prosecution for a disclosure which he could be called upon to make as to his own implication or complicity in the unlawful gaming as to which he was sworn and sent to the grand jury to testify. It was the duty of the witness to testify, and, therefore, we do not think the hustings court erred in its judgment complained of."

In State of Kansas v. Jack, 69 Kan. 387, 76 Pac. 911, 2 Ann. Cas. 171, annotated in 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 167, it was held that the exemption provided by the Bill of Rights, that "no person shall be a witness against himself," cannot be claimed by a witness when, by the terms of a statute, the immunity afforded is coextensive with the constitutional privilege of silence.

In Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S. 43, 26 Sup. Ct. 370, 50 L. Ed. 652, which construes article 5 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which is in effect identical with the provision in the Virginia Bill of Rights, it was held that "the right of a witness to claim his privilege against self-incrimination, afforded by Const. U. S. Amend. 5, when examined concerning an alleged violation of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890 [26 Stat. 209, c. 647 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200)], is taken away by the proviso to the act of February 25, 1908 [32 Stat. 904, c. 755 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1313)], that no person shall be prosecuted or be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for, or on account of, any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence in any proceeding, suit, or prosecution under certain named statutes, of which the anti-trust act is one, which furnishes a sufficient immunity from prosecution to satisfy the constitutional guaranty."

In a note to State v. Jack, supra, very many authorities are collated, as a result of which it seems to be established that, "before the constitutional privilege of silence could be taken away by the Legislature, there must be absolute indemnity provided; that nothing short of a complete amnesty to the witness—an absolute wiping out of the offense so that he could no longer be prosecuted for it—would furnish that indemnity; and that a provision merely that the testimony of a witness should not be used in evidence against him did not secure such absolute immunity."

The law was so declared in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 35 L. Ed. 1110, where it was decided that nothing short of absolute immunity from prosecution could satisfy the constitutional guaranty, and that a statute declaring that no evidence obtained from a witness should be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture, did not supply a complete protection from all the perils which the constitutional guaranty was designed to guard, since it would not prevent the use of his testimony to search out other testimony to be used against him or his property.

In Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 16 Sup. Ct. 644, 40 L. Ed. 819, it was held that exempting a witness from any prosecution, or any penalty or forfeiture, on account of any transaction to which he may testify, sufficiently satisfies the guaranty against self-incrimination. The court further said that the fact that a witness cannot be shielded from the personal disgrace attaching to the exposure of his crime does not render a statute exempting him from prosecution therefor unconstitutional.

[1] We consider it, therefore, as established that the case of Kendrick v. Commonwealth, supra, was correctly decided, and that, where the law gives to the witness full indemnity and assurance against any liability to prosecution for a disclosure which he could be called upon to make as to his own implication or complicity in the unlawful act as to which he was sworn and sent to the grand jury to testify, he is bound to answer, and cannot shield himself under the provision of our Bill of Rights. It remains to consider whether or not the provisions of our statute do give to the witness that immunity from prosecution which he is entitled to demand before being called upon to answer a question which may tend to incriminate himself.

Section 145a of the Code, commonly known as the "Barksdale Pure Election Law," provides that no candidate "shall expend, pay, promise, loan, or become pecuniarily liable in any way for any money or other valuable thing to influence voters in his behalf, or permit the same to be so used, with his knowledge and consent, by his friends or adherents in any election, primary or nominating convention: Provided, however, that no expenditure made by any candidate or his adherents and friends for the purpose of printing or advertising in some newspapers, or in securing suitable halls for public speaking at a reasonable price, shall be deemed illegal."

It will be observed that section 145a is directed against the giver of the bribe, and the indemnity afforded the person who testifies as to a matter which may incriminate him is found in subsection 9 of section 145a, as amended (Code Supp. 1910), which now reads as follows: "No witness giving evidence in any prosecution, or other proceeding under this act, shall ever be proceeded against for any offense against this act, or against the other election laws, committed by him at or in connection with the same election."

The prosecution of Burchett was under section 3853 of the Code, which by its own terms affords no immunity, and reads as follows: "If any person, directly or indirectly, give to a voter in any election any money, goods, or chattels under an agreement, express or implied, that such voter shall give his vote for a particular candidate, or for or against any question voted on at any such election, such person shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or confined in jail not less than one nor more than twelve months. And the voter receiving such money, goods, or chattels, in pursuance of such agreement, shall be punished in like manner with the person giving the same."

It was, therefore, properly conceded in argument by counsel for the commonwealth that the conviction of Flanary could not be maintained unless he had been called upon to testify under section 145a, and was thereby brought therefore under the protection of the immunity afforded by subsection 9 of that section.

[2] When Flanary was put upon the stand, he was asked, as has already been stated, a number of questions, which are copied into the record, among them question 6, which is as follows: "After said election in said county, were you sent as a witness before the grand jury of Lee county at the December term, 1911, of the circuit court of said county to give evidence before said grand jury touching the violation of any clause or part of section 145a of the Code of Virginia for 1904, as amended by the Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia of 1908, and in force June 26, 1908, and also touching the violation of any other election laws?" to which question the witness answered: "Yes; I was before the grand jury at the December term, 1911, of said court, and then and there testified concerning breaches of the election law. I was compelled to testify before said grand jury by the court, because, as I understood it, if I refused to testify the court would have fined or imprisoned me for contempt."

The question in terms embraces an inquiry into the violation of any clause or part of section 145a of the Code of Virginia for 1904. That is the specific point of inquiry, and it was then added, "and also touching the violation of any other election laws." The answer of the witness was, "Yes; I was before the grand jury at the December term, 1911, of said court, and then and there testified concerning breaches of the election law." Of what election law? The specific inquiry of the question was as to section 145a of the Code for 1904, as amended by the Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia of 1908; and the categorical answer of the witness is, "Yes; I was before the grand jury at the December term, 1911, of said court, and then and there testified concerning breaches of the election law." If there could be any doubt as to what election law was referred to by the witness' answer, it would arise rather with respect to the inquiry as to other election laws than section 145a, which is specifically mentioned; but we think it is manifest, from the question asked and from the answer given, that the witness did not intend any such discrimination, but plainly intended by his answer to state that he was examined as to section 145a, and also touching the violation of other election laws—as, for instance, section 3853 of the Code.

[3] It is true that it does not appear that the investigation as to violation of section 145a resulted in any indictment, presentment, or information. The grand jury was exercising its functions as an inquisitorial body, and searching, as it was its duty to do, into any and all violations of the criminal laws of the commonwealth, and especially those pertaining to the election laws. In the course of that inquiry, and within the strict limits of its duty, if Flanary was put upon the witness stand and interrogated as to the giving of bribes within the purview of section 145a, it matters not that the facts elicited by the grand jury did not culminate in any prosecution under that statute. It is the scope and extent of the inquiry, and not the use which was subsequently made of the information thus elicited, with which we are concerned, and which is to determine whether or not the witness was brought within the terms of the immunity embraced in subsection 9 of section 145a.

In Hale v. Henkel, supra, it is said that the examination of the witness before the grand jury need not be preceded by a presentment, indictment, or other formal charge; that in the summoning of witnesses before a grand jury it is sufficient to apprise them of the names of the parties with respect to whom they will be called upon to testify, without indicating the nature of the charge against such persons." Mr. Justice Brown, in delivering the opinion, uses the following language: "We are pointed to no case holding that a grand jury cannot proceed without the formality of a written charge. Indeed, the oath administered to the foreman, which has come down to us from the most ancient times, and is found in Shaftesbury's Trial, 8 How. St. Tr. 769, indicates that the grand jury was competent to act solely on its own volition. This oath was that 'you shall diligently inquire and true presentments make of all such matters, articles, and things as shall be given you in charge, as of all other matters and things as shall come to your own knowledge touching this present service,' etc. This oath has remained substantially unchanged to the present day. * * * While no case has arisen in this court in which the question has been distinctly presented, the authorities in the state courts largely preponderate in favor of the theory that the grand jury may act upon information received by them from the examination of witnesses without a formal indictment, or other charge, previously laid before them."

In Hale v. Henkel it was suggested that a person who has testified compulsorily before a grand jury may not be able, if subsequently indicted for some matter concerning which he testified, to procure the evidence necessary to maintain his plea, but that suggestion the court deemed to be more fanciful than real. "He would have, not only his own oath in support of his immunity, but the notes often, though not always, taken of the testimony before the grand jury, as well as the testimony of the prosecuting officer, and of every member of the jury present. It is scarcely possible that all of them would have forgotten the general nature of his incriminating testimony, or that any serious conflict would arise therefrom. In any event, it is a question relating to the weight of the testimony, which could scarcely be considered in determining the effect of the immunity statute. The difficulty of maintaining a case upon the available evidence is a danger which the law does not recognize. In prosecuting a case, or in setting up a defense, the law takes no account of the practical difficulty which either party may have in procuring his testimony. It judges of the law by the facts which each party claims, and not by what he may ultimately establish."

In the case before us the difficulty suggested does not arise, for the witness himself proves that he was examined touching the matter from which his immunity from prosecution is held to flow.

As to the inquisitorial power of a grand jury, we refer to what was said by this court in the recent case of In re Cutchin, 74 S. E. 403.

We have thus far concluded that it is within the power of the Legislature to compel a witness to answer incriminating questions, if he is by law completely protected against any prosecution touching the matter with respect to which he is interrogated; secondly, that Flanary was, in this case, questioned with respect to the violation of section 145a, and thereby became entitled to whatever immunity is afforded by the ninth section of that act; and it only remains for us to consider whether that be sufficient to afford him that complete immunity from prosecution to which we are of opinion that he is entitled.

[4] The language of the immunity clause is: "No witness giving evidence in any prosecution, or other proceeding under this act, shall ever be proceeded against for any offense against this act, or against the other election laws, committed by him at or in connection with the same election."

Turning again to Hale v. Henkel, supra, we find that the United States statute there under consideration provides that "no person shall be prosecuted or be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing, concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in any proceeding, suit, or prosecution under said acts," of which the anti-trust statute is one. It will be observed that this act uses the term "proceeding," just as the act under consideration does, and Mr. Justice Brown, with reference to it, speaks as follows:

"While there may be some doubt whether the examination of witnesses before a grand jury is a suit or prosecution, we have no doubt that it is a 'proceeding,' within the meaning of this proviso. The word should receive as wide a construction as is necessary to protect the witness in his disclosures, whenever such disclosures are made in pursuance of a judicial inquiry, whether such inquiry be instituted by a grand jury, or upon the trial of an indictment found by them. The word 'proceeding' is not a technical one, and is aptly used by the courts to designate an inquiry before a grand jury. It has received this interpretation in a number of cases.

"The object of the amendment is to establish in express language and upon a firm basis the general principle of English and American jurisprudence that no one shall be compelled to give testimony which may expose him to prosecution for crime. It is not declared that he may not be compelled to testify to facts which may impair his reputation for probity, or even tend to disgrace him; but the line is drawn at testimony that may expose him to prosecution. If the testimony relate to criminal acts long since past, and against the prosecution of which the statute of limitations has run, or for which he has already received a pardon or is guaranteed an immunity, the amendment does not apply."

We have the very high authority, therefore, of the Supreme Court of the United States, that if a witness has been called upon to testify before a grand jury in any proceeding before that body, although there may be no indictment, presentment, or information, but merely an inquiry instituted by the grand jury itself, the witness is entitled to invoke the benefits of the laws which shield him from prosecution.

In this case the witness, having testified under section 145a, by the terms of subsection 9 can never be proceeded against for offenses against that act, "or against the other election laws, committed by him at or in connection with the same election." The immunity is as complete with respect to offenses against other election laws as it is with respect to an offense against the particular act within the terms of which the immunity is found.

We conclude, therefore, to use the language of the court in Kansas v. Jack, supra, that by the terms of our statute the immunity afforded is coextensive with the constitutional privilege of silence, from which it follows that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

CLEMENT v. ADAMS BROS.-PAYNES CO., Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 398*)—POWERS—OFFICERS.

The powers of a corporation, so far as it deals with third persons, are primarily lodged in its board of directors, from which source the officers, expressly or by implication, derive the authority bestowed on them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1592-1594; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 398*)—OFFICERS—PRESIDENT—POWERS.

The office of president of a corporation confers of itself no power to bind the corporation or control its property, and the power of the president as agent must be conferred by the board of directors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1592-1594; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

3. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 5*)—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

The remedial portion of the mechanic's lien statute, providing for enforcing a lien after it is perfected, must be liberally construed, while the portion dealing with the right to the existence of a lien must be strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 5; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

4. MECHANICS' LIENS (§§ 154, 157*)—VERIFIED ACCOUNT—SUFFICIENCY OF VERIFICATION.

Under Code 1904, §§ 2476, 2477, declaring that to perfect a lien an account must be filed, verified by the oath of the "claimant or his agent," the verification of the account by the claimant or his agent is an essential requirement to the perfection of a lien, and where a corporation is a claimant, a verification by its president is insufficient to perfect a lien, unless the affidavit avers that he is the agent of the corporation for that purpose, and a defect in the affidavit arising from a failure to aver the fact of agency is not within section 2478, providing that no inaccuracy in the account filed or in the description of the property to be covered by a lien shall invalidate the lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 261-267, 268-274; Dec. Dig. §§ 154, 157.*]

5. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 258*)—WANT OF JURISDICTION.

Where a court of equity, in a suit to enforce a mechanic's lien, may not enforce a lien for the failure of the claimant to properly verify the account, it has no jurisdiction to afford relief, and the bill must be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 452-454; Dec. Dig. § 258.*]

Buchanan, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Appomattox County.

Suit by the Adams Bros.-Paynes Company, Incorporated, against one Clement. From a decree overruling a demurrer to the bill, and from a final decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Caskie & Caskie, for appellant. F. C. Moon, Sackett & Sackett, and R. C. Blackford, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The bill in this case was filed by the appellee corporation for the purpose of asserting and enforcing an alleged mechanic's lien against certain real estate of the appellant. A demurrer to the bill by the appellant was overruled, and upon the final hearing a decree was entered in favor of a receiver appointed by the court for $367.39, the balance due from the appellant, and provision made for the sale of her property to satisfy the same. From the decree overruling the demurrer, and the final decree, this appeal was allowed.

The first assignment of error is to the action of the circuit court in overruling the demurrer to the bill. The ground of demurrer was that the alleged mechanic's lien was not supported by proper affidavit, and was, therefore, void and of no effect; that in support of an account constituting the basis for a mechanic's lien the statute requires the same to be verified by the affidavit of the "claimant or his agent," whereas, in this case, the affidavit was made by C. S. Adams, the president of the plaintiff corporation, and contains no averment of any agency on the part of the affiant, and that it cannot be implied that the president of the appellee corporation was, by virtue of his office, its agent to make the required affidavit.

Section 2475 of the Code provides that all lumber dealers and other persons furnishing materials for the construction of any building shall have a lien, "if perfected as hereinafter provided," upon such building or structure.

Sections 2476 and 2477 provide that, among other steps necessary to perfect such lien, an account shall be filed by the general or subcontractor, as the case may be, showing the amount and character of the materials furnished, the prices charged therefor, the payments made, if any, and the balance due, verified by the oath of the "claimant or his agent."

Adams Bros.-Paynes Company is a corporation, and the language of the affidavit attached to the account which constitutes the basis of the proceeding is that "C. S. Adams, the president of Adams Bros.-Paynes Company, a corporation, this day personally appeared before me in my said city, and, being by me first duly sworn, made oath to the correctness of the foregoing account."

[1] The contention of the appellee, that the president of a corporation is necessarily its agent for the purpose of making the affidavit required in this case, cannot be sustained. The general doctrine is well settled that the powers of a private corporation, so far as its dealings with third persons are concerned, are primarily lodged in its board of directors, from which source the officers, either expressly or by implication, derive such measure of authority as may be bestowed upon them.

[2] With respect to the powers of the president of a corporation it is said: "The office itself, however, confers no power to bind the corporation or control its property. The president's power as an agent must be sought in the organic law of the corporation, in a delegation of authority from it, directly or through its board of directors formally expressed or implied from a habit or custom of doing business." 10 Cyc. 903; 2 Cook on Corp. (5th Ed.) § 716; Morawetz on Private Corp. § 537. See, also, Crump v. U. S. Mining Co., 48 Va. 352, 56 Am. Dec. 116; Hodge v. Bank, 63 Va. 60.

"The implied powers of the president of a corporation depend upon the nature of the company's business and the measure of authority delegated to him by the board of directors. It seems that a president has no greater power, by virtue of his office merely, than any other director of the company, except that he is the presiding officer at the meeting of the board. The Supreme Court of New Jersey said: 'In the absence of anything in the acts of incorporation bestowing special power upon the president, he has from his mere official station no more control over the corporate property and funds than any other director. The affairs of corporate bodies are within the exclusive control of their board of directors, from whom authority to dispose of their estates must be derived.'" 1 Morawetz on Private Corp. § 537.

In the case of Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. 251, where the question was as to the sufficiency of an affidavit to a bill which had to be verified by the oath of the plaintiff, and it appeared of record that the party objecting had shown by his own witness that the bill was signed and sworn to by each of the plaintiffs in his proper person, it was held to be sufficient; the court saying, however, that "the better practice was for the certificate to show on its face that the bill was sworn to by the plaintiff, and not leave that fact to be supplied by evidence aliunde." Since that decision this court has repeatedly held that, if the affiant bore the relation of agent to the plaintiff, the fact must be averred in the affidavit.

In the case of Merriman v. Thomas, 103 Va. 24, 48 S. E. 490, in construing section 3286 of the Code, which provides that, if in an action of assumpsit the account sued on is verified by an affidavit made by "the plaintiff or his agent," no plea in bar shall be received unless accompanied by a like counter affidavit, this court held that the word "bookkeeper" did not import agency, and that the affidavit of the plaintiff's bookkeeper, without more, was not a compliance with the statute. The court says: "The statute makes an innovation upon the established mode of procedure in such cases, and the plaintiff, in order to take advantage of it, must proceed in accordance with its provisions. The affidavit can only be made by the plaintiff or his agent."

The court also in that case quoted with approval 2 Cyclopedia of Law & Procedure, page 5, where it is said, concerning affidavits and who may make them: "In determining this question, reference must always be had to the statutes and the rules of court governing the particular affidavit. Thus, where a statute specifically points out who may make a certain affidavit, it can be made by no other than those specified." The court adds: "If the statute had prescribed that the affidavit should be made by the plaintiff in person, then it could have been made by no one else, and, when it is declared that it must be made by the plaintiff or his agent, the courts must be content to construe the language employed. * * * While a bookkeeper may be, and often is, the agent of his employer, the word does not, ex vi termini, import that relation, and, in the absence of averment in the affidavit that it exists, the courts cannot by intendment enlarge the ordinary signification of the word, so as to bring it within a class to which it may or may not belong."

In the case of Taylor v. Sutherland-Meade Co., 107 Va. 787, 60 S. E. 132, this court held that it could not say, as a matter of law and in the absence of averment, that the term "secretary and treasurer" necessarily imported the relation of agency between such officer and his corporation, within the intendment of the attachment laws of this state, which require the affidavit to be made by the "plaintiff, his agent or attorney"; that if he was in fact such agent it should have been averred in the affidavit. Upon petition for rehearing in that case, we were asked to remand the case to the lower court for the purpose of enabling the appellants to prove the agency of the "secretary and treasurer." This was denied, upon the ground that jurisdiction of attachments in equity was acquired alone by force of the affidavit, and that on appeal, in a case founded on an insufficient affidavit, this court could only abate the attachment and dismiss the proceeding, in the absence of application to amend the affidavit in the trial court.

In the more recent case of Damron & Kelly v. Bank, 112 Va. 544, 72 S. E. 153, the same conclusion was reached with respect to affidavits made in support of attachment proceedings, in the one case by the vice president of a corporation, and in the other by a director of the same corporation; the court holding that neither the vice president nor the director of a bank was such an agent of the corporation, in contemplation of the attachment laws, as to authorize either of them, by virtue of his office, without other authority, to make the required affidavit, and further holding that correct practice required the affidavit to aver that the affiant was the "plaintiff, his agent or attorney," if such was the fact, and that compliance with the rule imposed no undue hardship, as a corporation could appoint as many agents as it pleased with specific authority to make such affidavits.

[3] The appellee contends that affidavits in attachment proceedings might be held defective, whereas a different rule would obtain as to mechanics' liens, when a more liberal construction is to be applied. There is no difference in the rule of construction in the two cases, when that portion of the mechanic's lien statute which prescribes the method of perfecting the lien is being construed. The remedial portion of the statute, which provides for enforcing the lien after it is perfected, is to be liberally construed; but that portion dealing with the right to the existence of the lien is to be strictly construed.

This distinction as to construction is laid down in 20 A. & E. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 278, where, after reviewing the authorities on the question of the method of construction of mechanic's lien statutes, the conclusion is reached, under the heading of "The Safe Rule," that "the nearest approach to a general rule which can be safely laid down would seem to be that the remedial portion of mechanic's lien statutes should be liberally construed, but that the other parts, those upon which the right to the existence of a lien depends, being in derogation of the common law, should be strictly construed."

This rule of construction has been clearly recognized by this court in the case of Bristol Iron, etc., Co. v. Thomas, 83 Va. 396, 400, 401, 25 S. E. 110, 112, where it is said: "The statute upon this subject is remedial in its nature, and while courts require a strict compliance with all the statute prescribes for the completion or perfection of the lien, and cannot by construction supply any failure or omission on the part of the claimant, and to this extent may be said to place a strict construction upon the statute, as being an innovation upon the common law, yet when the mechanic has done all that it is necessary for him to do, has performed the work or supplied the material, and perfected his lien therefor in the prescribed mode, the duty of the court is to see that those whom the law intended to protect shall enjoy the advantages which it confers."

In Trustees v. Davis, 85 Va. 193, 7 S. E. 245, in speaking of the provisions for perfecting mechanics' liens, it is said: "These provisions of the statute are indispensable to the creation of the lien, and hence, if one of them be not complied with, no lien is acquired."

And in Shackelford v. Beck, 80 Va. 573, 577, referring to those portions of the mechanic's lien statutes, the court says, the statute has "prescribed in express, plain, and unmistakable language the way, and the only way, in which the purpose it had in view can be effected. * * * It is purely a creation of the statute, and it must be availed of, if at all, upon the terms and conditions which the statute prescribes." And on page 579 it is said: "As the law calls for nothing unreasonable at the hand of him who would fasten an incumbrance upon the property of his neighbor, no just ground of complaint is afforded by insisting upon a rigid adherence to its provisions."

The appellee relies upon section 2478 of the Code as showing that the Legislature intended a very liberal construction, and, therefore, that the affidavit, though not in strict compliance with the statute, would be good. That section provides that "no inaccuracy in the account filed, or in the description of the property to be covered by the lien, shall invalidate the lien," etc.

The Legislature having designated but two defects that could be disregarded, it would seem that under the doctrine of "inclusio unius, exclusio alterius," it intended that defects not mentioned were to be regarded.

[4, 5] In conclusion, and in the light of the authorities cited, we are of opinion that the verification of the account by the affidavit of the "claimant or his agent" is one of the essential requirements of the statute in perfecting a mechanic's lien; that the president is not, by virtue of his office, the agent of his corporation to make such an affidavit; and that unless the affidavit, when made by the president, avers that he is in fact the agent of the corporation for that purpose, the lien is not perfected, and, therefore, does not exist. There being no lien, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to afford relief, and the bill must be dismissed.

For these reasons, the decrees complained of must be reversed, the demurrer sustained, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

Reversed.

KEITH, P., absent.

BUCHANAN, J. (dissenting). The action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the bill is assigned as error. The ground of the demurrer to the bill, which was filed to enforce a mechanic's lien, is that the lien is void because not supported by the proper affidavit.

The Code provides that in order to perfect such lien the contractor or subcontractor (sections 2476, 2477) shall, among other things, file in the clerk's office of the proper court "an account showing the amount and character of the work done or materials furnished, the prices charged therefor, the payments made, if any, and the balance due, verified by the oath of the claimant or his agent, with a statement attached declaring his intention to claim the benefit of said lien. * * *

The affidavit, the sufficiency of which is denied, is as follows: "I, Josephine G. Yeatman, a notary public in and for the city of Lynchburg, in the state of Virginia, do hereby certify that C. S. Adams, the president of Adams Bros.-Paynes Company, a corporation, this day personally appeared before me in my said city, and, being by me first duly sworn, made oath to the correctness of the foregoing account."

The objection made to the affidavit is that it was "made by C. S. Adams, president of the plaintiff corporation, and contains no averment of any agency on the part of said Adams. The mere use of the term 'president' does not imply such agency."

Assuming, but not deciding, that, where an affidavit is made by a person as agent of a corporation, the fact that he is such agent must be stated or averred in the affidavit, where it is made by the president of the corporation, as well as where it is made by its bookkeeper, as in Merriman v. Thomas, 108 Va. 24, 48 S. E. 490, or by its secretary and treasurer, as in Taylor, Receiver, etc., v. Sutherland-Meade Tobacco Co., 107 Va. 787, 60 S. E. 132, or by its vice president, or its director, as in Damron & Kelly v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 112 Va. 544, 72 S. E. 153, it does not follow, as it seems to me, that the affidavit in question is not sufficient. The statute expressly provides that the affidavit required can be made in either of two ways—by the claimant himself, or by his agent. It is not denied, and if it were the contrary has been expressly decided (Haskin Co. v. Cleveland Co., 94 Va. 439, 447, 26 S. E. 878), that a corporation is within the meaning and entitled to the benefits of our mechanic's lien law. Since a corporation may be a mechanic's lien claimant, why cannot the affidavit required be made by it through its president, as well as by an agent expressly authorized to make it? To hold otherwise would be, as was said by the Court of Errors and Appeals of the state of New Jersey in passing upon the sufficiency of an affidavit made under a chattel mortgage statute, which provided that the affidavit required might be made by the holder of the mortgage or his agent or attorney, to rest the decision upon "the denial of the right of a corporation to be a holder within the meaning and entitled to the benefits of the statute, or else upon the assumed right of the court to nullify one of the three modes by which the Legislature has allowed the affidavit to be made." Am. Soda Fountain Co. v. Stolzenbach, 75 N. J. Law, 721, 725, 68 Atl. 1078, 1080 (16 L. R. A. [N. S.] 708, 127 Am. St. Rep. 822).

The decision cannot be rested on the former alternative; for, as we have seen, a corporation is within the meaning of and entitled to the benefits of the statute. It cannot be rested on the latter alternative, unless it be that a corporation cannot make such affidavit per se, but only per alium—by an agent. It is true that a corporation cannot perform the acts required of a mechanic's lien claimant, except through some agency or some agent. It cannot make out and file the account required by section 2476, or give the notice required by section 2477, any more than it can make the affidavit required by both sections, except by some agency or agent; but it does not follow that, because it must use some agency in performing those acts, it is not doing them per se, but is acting per alium. The corporation may make out and file the account and give the notice required through its own administrative officers—"its inherent agencies," as they are sometimes called—or it may cause those things to be done by a person specially authorized to do them. In the one case, it is doing the acts itself; in the other, its authorized agent is doing the acts for it.

The distinction between these two modes of acting is clearly stated by Judge Dill in delivering the opinion of the Court of Errors and Appeals of the state of New Jersey in the case of American Soda Fountain Co. v. Stolzenbach, supra. He says: "The fallacy of the argument of the defendant in error is that it fails to note the distinction between a corporate act, performed through the intermediation of a person specially empowered to act as its agent or its attorney, and a like act done immediately by the corporation, through its administrative officers—its inherent agencies. The right of an artificial person to empower and employ agents or attorneys is identical with that of a natural person—each is governed alike by the law of principal and agent. The fundamental difference between the natural and the artificial person is that the latter, even when not acting as principal through the intermediation of an agent, acts through some agency inherent in its corporate form. Normally, such agency inheres in the natural persons who hold and administer the offices of the corporation. The analogy of a natural body having a head and members holds good in the case of the artificial body; the common and declared law recognizing that the officers are the means, the hands, the head, by which corporations normally act. Bank of Toronto v. McDougall, 15 U. C. C. P. 475, 482. The very word 'officer' has this precise meaning. Webster gives the etymology of the word as 'ops,' help, and 'facere,' to do or make. Hence, when a corporation does not go outside of its corporate machinery and capacity in doing a corporate act, it is a confusion of terms and of ideas to say that it is acting through an agent, when the fact is that it is acting through an agency, and in chief. This distinction is not merely verbal, and hence trivial, but, on the contrary, marks the wide difference that exists between acting for oneself by an inherent faculty and the employment of another person to act for and in one's stead. In this as in all cases, loose terminology implies and conduces to loose reasoning. The maxim 'qui facit per alium facit per se' requires and should be applied only when the agent—the alius—is not the principal acting for himself."

That a corporation does and may so act has been recognized in numerous cases. The English cases seem to recognize the distinction between the act of the corporation by an agent or attorney and the act of an administrative officer in behalf of the corporation. Deffell v. White, 36 L. J. N. S. Common Pleas, 25; Shears v. Jacobs (1866) 35 L. J. (N. S.) pt. 2, Common Pleas, 241; Penwarden v. Roberts (1882) 51 L. J. (N. S.) pt. 2, Common Law, 312.

In Bank of Toronto v. McDougall, 15 U. C. C. P. 475, the question was as to the validity of an affidavit as to the bona fides of a mortgage made by one of the officers of the corporation, in which there was no recital of specific authority, nor a statement that the officer was the agent of the corporation, nor evidence, by statute or otherwise, that the officer, by virtue of his office, had the power to bind the corporation. When that case was decided the statutes of Canada provided that, where such affidavit was made by the agent or attorney, there must accompany it proof of authority. It was held that when the officer made the affidavit he did not act as an agent, but directly and in chief, and not by delegation, and that the affidavit might be properly considered as the affidavit of the mortgagee corporation, "made in the only way the mortgagee could make the affidavit, namely through its administrative officer."

In New Brunswick Steamboat Co. v. Baldwin, 14 N. J. Law, 440, it was held that "an affidavit made by the president, secretary, or other proper officer or agent of a corporation, where the corporation is a party to the suit, is in legal contemplation an affidavit made by the party."

In Hopper v. Lovejoy, 47 N. J. Eq. 573, 21 Atl. 298, 12 L. R. A. 588, it was decided that "in the eye of the law" the acknowledgment annexed to a chattel mortgage made by an officer of the grantor (corporation) was the acknowledgment of the grantor itself, as distinguished from the act of an agent or attorney.

In New York it is held that the verification of a pleading by an officer of a corporation is the verification of the corporation; that because an officer of the corporation acts in chief, and not by delegation, in making such verification, he is neither an agent nor an attorney, nor is he within the rule that an agent or attorney must state his authority and the sources of his information and the grounds of his belief. "Such verification," it was said by the court, "is the verification of the corporation and a verification by the party." American Insulator Co. v. Bankers', etc., Tel. Co., 13 Daly (N. Y.) 200, 205; Henry v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 43 Misc. Rep. 539, 89 N. Y. Supp. 525; Shaft v. Phoenix Mutual Life Ins. Co., 67 N. Y. 544, 23 Am. Rep. 138.

In Bank v. Hutchinson, 87 N. C. 22, the conclusion was reached, based upon similar reasoning, that the verification of pleadings by an officer of a corporation is the verification of the corporation itself.

In Lewiston Co-op. Soc., etc., v. Thorpe, 91 Me. 64, 39 Atl. 283, the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine held that the oath of the president of a corporation was to be regarded as the oath of the corporation. In that state a debtor about to leave the same may in certain cases be arrested, but to justify such arrest the statute requires "the creditor, his agent or attorney," to make oath to a belief in the facts enumerated in the statute. The court said, among other things, in discussing the question, that "for the purpose of the creditor's oath to authorize arrest we regard the president, in taking the oath, as representing the corporation; and the oath so taken is to be regarded as the oath of the creditor corporation within the meaning of the statute." There was nothing in the affidavit to show the authority of the affiant to make it, other than that he was the president of the creditor corporation.

In Scott Stamp Co. v. Leake, Adm'r, 9 Cal. App. 512, 518, 99 Pac. 731, it was held that the only way that a corporation can act in verifying a claim against the estate of a decedent is by the affidavit of one of its officers, that the statement of his office in the affidavit is sufficient, and that the section of the Code requiring an affidavit to such a claim made by a person other than the claimant to set forth the reasons therefor did not apply, since the affidavit must be regarded as made by the corporation itself.

Unless the affidavit of the president of a corporation can be treated as the affidavit of the corporation itself—an act per se, and not per alium—there are many cases in which corporations would be deprived of the benefit of statutes, where they are as much within the reason and spirit of the law, if not the letter, as private individuals; for, where the word "person" is used in a statute, corporations as well as individuals are included for civil purposes. This was the rule at common law, and is also the rule under subsection 13 of section 5 of the Code, unless they are exempt by its terms or by the nature of the subject to which the statute relates. B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Gallahue's Adm'rs, 53 Va. 655, 65 Am. Dec. 254; Miller v. Commonwealth, 68 Va. 110; Const. § 153 (Code 1904, p. ccxlix); Code, § 1313a, cl. 1.

In the chapter on Mechanics' Liens, as to a certain class of liens, it is provided by section 2487 of the Code that "any assignee of such claim may file the memorandum and make the oath required by the preceding section, and shall have the same rights as the assignor."

Under the interpleader statute (section 2908 of the Code), the affidavit required is the affidavit of the defendant who wishes to take advantage of its provisions. The question of the genuineness of a party's signature to a writing, under certain circumstances, cannot be raised under section 3250 of the Code unless the party denying its genuineness shall himself make the affidavit required. Under section 3371 of the Code, one who desires the production of books and papers, as therein provided for, must make the affidavit required. Where a tenant is unable to give a forthcoming bond, and desires to obtain the benefit of the provisions of section 3618 of the Code, he must make the affidavit provided for. By the tax bill, page 2260 of the Code, it is provided that every licensed person who manufactures brandy must furnish the commissioner of the revenue a copy of the returns made by him to the internal revenue assessor of the United States, and the commissioner of the revenue shall require said-licensed distiller to make affidavit to the correctness of such returns. Under those statutes, and others which might be referred to, where there is no authority for the affidavit to be made by an agent or per alium, it would be impossible for the person authorized or required to make the affidavits provided for, if a corporation, unless they could be made by the corporation's president or other officer and be treated as the affidavit of such corporation, or unless it be held, as some courts have done, that, since the oath required cannot be made by the corporation itself, it may appoint an agent to make it. But under our cases, where the affidavit is required to be made by the party himself, it cannot, it is said, be made by an agent. See Merriman v. Thomas, supra, 103 Va. 28, 48 S. E. 490; Taylor v. Sutherlin-Meade Tobacco Co., supra, 107 Va. 790, 791, 60 S. E. 132.

In this case it is to be kept in mind that in making the affidavit the president of the corporation was not attempting to bind it as by a contract. There is no question on the demurrer that the contract was not properly entered into by the corporation, and the services rendered and the material furnished by it, to secure the payment of which it was attempting to secure a mechanic's lien. The act of the president in making the affidavit was merely ancillary to the contract, and was inherently and necessarily for the benefit of the corporation. The affidavit was but one of the steps made a condition precedent to recording the writings named in the statute to perfect the lien. After the affidavit was made, the corporation availed itself of it, and recorded it, along with the account and the writing, declaring its intention to claim the benefit of the mechanic's lien law, as required by the statute. Neither the corporation, nor any one authorized to speak for it, has objected to the action of its president in making the affidavit; but, on the contrary, the corporation is in court seeking to enforce the lien, thereby declaring that the act of its president in making the affidavit was its act, or at least done by its authority. See American Soda Fountain Co. v. Stolzenbach, supra, 75 N. J. Law, 721, 68 Atl. 1082, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 703, 127 Am. St. Rep. 822.

But this is not all. The writing by which the corporation declared its intention of claiming the benefit of the mechanic's lien law (which the statute requires, and which is filed as an exhibit with the bill, and made a part thereof), and which went to record as its act, declares that the said "Adams Bros.-Paynes Company herewith files an account showing the nature and character of the materials furnished, the prices charged, the payments made, and the balance due, verified by affidavit." If it were true that the affidavit, when made by its president, was not the affidavit of the corporation per se, or that he was not the agent of the corporation when he made it, the said statement, adopting and treating the affidavit as its own, or as made by its authority, when it filed the papers required by the statute with the clerk for recordation in perfecting its lien, was a ratification of the act of the president in making the affidavit, and gave it all the force and effect it would have had if the authority to make it had existed when made. Under these circumstances, I cannot understand upon what legal principle it can be said that the affidavit in question was made without authority.

I am of opinion that the affidavit of the president of the appellee corporation was in legal contemplation the affidavit of the corporation; but, if it were not, and the president by virtue of his office had no authority to make it when made, that the action of the corporation, when it filed its statement declaring its intention to claim the benefit of the mechanic's lien law, was a ratification of the act of the president in making the affidavit, and was as effective for the purposes for which it was made as if the authority to make it had existed when the affidavit was made.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the trial court properly overruled the demurrer to the bill, and I cannot concur in the opinion of this court sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill.

CARPENTER v. GRAY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON (§ 11*)—VERIFICATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a notary public's certificate attached to plaintiff's declaration stated that J. E. G. made oath that the foregoing account against W. R. C. was just, true, and correct, and due in a stated amount, with interest thereon from a stated date, it was sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the benefit of Code 1904, § 3286, providing that when the plaintiff shall file an affidavit, by himself or his agent, verifying the account, the defendant shall not be permitted to file a plea in bar, but plaintiff shall be entitled to judgment, unless the defendant shall file a verified denial, and it was immaterial that it did not specifically state that J. E. G. was the plaintiff, or that the account and the affidavit claimed interest from different dates; substantial compliance with the statute being sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Action on, Cent. Dig. §§ 82-36; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON (§ 12*)—VERIFICATION—JUDGMENT—WAIVER AND ESTOPPEL.

A plaintiff in assumpsit may waive or be estopped from asserting his right to judgment in his favor for the amount claimed by him in his affidavit filed with his declaration as provided by this statute, although the defendant has failed to comply with those provisions which entitle him to make a defense to the claim asserted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Action on, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON (§ 12*)—VERIFICATION—JUDGMENT—WAIVER.

The facts that there was no indorsement on the back of a declaration showing that an account and affidavit had been filed therewith, that the rule docket did not show that they had been filed and contained a statement that it was a writ of inquiry, that the case was placed upon the issue docket, and that plaintiff in opposing a motion for a continuance made no claim that an affidavit had been filed, or that the case should be placed upon the office judgment docket, did not indicate that the plaintiff intended to waive his right to a judgment under the provision of Code 1904, § 3286, entitling a plaintiff to judgment on a verified account not denied under oath by the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Action on, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

4. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON (§ 12*)—VERIFIED ACCOUNT—WAIVER.

Nor did such facts estop plaintiff from claiming the benefit offered by Code 1904, § 3286, since they were within the knowledge of the defendant, or he had a convenient and available means of acquiring such knowledge, and facts known to both parties, or which both have the same means of knowing, cannot be the basis of an estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Action on, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

5. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON (§ 12*)—VERIFIED ACCOUNT—RIGHT TO JUDGMENT—WAIVER.

By consenting to and obtaining a continuance of the case after the circuit court had set aside the office judgment and permitted the defendant to plead, the plaintiff in assumpsit did not waive his right to have judgment under Code 1904, § 3286.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Action on, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Brunswick County. Action by J. E. Gray against W. R. Carpenter. To judgment for plaintiff, writ of error was awarded. Judgment affirmed.

Marvin Smithey, R. B. Davis, and R. E. Byrd, for plaintiff in error. Turnbull & Turnbull, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. J. E. Gray instituted his action of assumpsit against W. R. Carpenter, and such proceedings were had in the cause as resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed by him in his affidavit filed with his declaration in the cause. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The grounds of error assigned may be considered under two heads: First, the sufficiency of the affidavit filed under the provisions of section 3286 of the Code to entitle the plaintiff to the judgment rendered in his favor; and, second, whether, if the affidavit were sufficient, the plaintiff had by his conduct waived, or was estopped from relying upon, the provisions of that section.

The facts material to the decision of these questions are briefly stated as follows: The plaintiff, in May, 1910, instituted his action. Process was issued and executed upon the defendant, returnable to the first June rules following, when the plaintiff filed his declaration, account, and affidavit. The rules taken in the case at that time were: "Process Ret. Ex'd, Declaration Filed & C. O." At the next rule day the rules were: "C. O. C. & W. E." At the June term of the court the case was placed upon the writ of inquiry docket, and upon motion of the defendant, without filing any plea, the cause was continued over the objections of the plaintiff. On the hearing of the motion to continue, no reference was made to the affidavit, or that the cause should be put upon the office judgment docket. After the adjournment of that term, at the instance of the plaintiff's counsel, the clerk entered an office judgment for the sum sued for, but with interest from January 1, 1910, instead of March 1, 1910, as claimed in the affidavit. At the next term the plaintiff moved the court, under the provisions of section 3451 of the Code to correct the judgment as to the time from which it should bear interest. Thereupon the defendant moved the court, under section 3293 of the Code, to set aside the said office judgment, upon the ground that the affidavit was not sufficient under the provisions of section 3286 of the Code to authorize the entry of an office judgment.

Upon the hearing of these motions, which were considered together, the court being of opinion that the affidavit was not such as was required by section 3286, so as to avoid the necessity of a writ of inquiry, overruled the plaintiff's motion to amend, and set aside the judgment, and upon the motion of the defendant gave him leave to file three pleas in bar of the plaintiff's action, accompanied by an affidavit as required by section 3286 of the Code. To all of which the plaintiff objected and excepted.

Nothing seems to have been done in the cause after the September term until the April term, except to continue the cause. At the last-named term, upon motion of the plaintiff, the action of the court at its September term was reheard, the clerk of the court was allowed to amend the rules in the cause, so as to show that said affidavit was filed with the plaintiff's declaration, and a nunc pro tunc judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed in the said affidavit.

[1] The affidavit filed with the plaintiff's declaration was in the following words: "I, Edwin C. Smith, a notary public in and for the county aforesaid, in the state of Virginia, do hereby certify that J. E. Gray this day personally appeared before me, and, after being duly sworn, made oath before me, in my county aforesaid, that the foregoing account against W. R. Carpenter is just, true, and correct, and due to the best of the affiant's belief, and that to the best of affiant's belief the amount of his claim against the said W. R. Carpenter is $2,800, and that the said amount is justly due, with interest thereon from the 1st day of March, 1910."

This affidavit, it is claimed by the defendant, is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of the provisions of section 3286 of the Code. That section, so far as material to the question under consideration, is as follows:

"In an action of assumpsit on a contract, express or implied, for the payment of money (except where the process to answer the action has been served by publication), if the plaintiff file with his declaration an affidavit made by himself or his agent, stating therein, to the best of the affiant's belief, the amount of the plaintiff's claim, that such amount is justly due, and the time from which the plaintiff claims interest, no plea in bar shall be received in the case, either at rules or in court, unless the defendant file with his plea the affidavit of himself or his agent that the plaintiff is not entitled, as the affiant verily believes, to recover anything from the defendant on such claim, or stating a sum certain less than that set forth in the affidavit filed by the plaintiff, which, as the affiant verily believes, is all that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant on such claim. If such plea and affidavit be not filed by the defendant, there shall be no inquiry of damages, but judgment shall be for the plaintiff for the amount claimed in the affidavit filed with his declaration."

The objections made to the affidavit are:

(1) That it does not aver that the affiant was the plaintiff in the action or his agent;

(2) that it is not clear and unambiguous, and does not conform to the plain terms of the statute; and (3) that it fails to state the time from which the plaintiff claims interest.

It is insisted that the same strict rule of construction should govern in construing the statute in question as has been applied in construing affidavits in attachment cases in equity, where the courts acquire jurisdiction alone by force of the affidavit. Taylor v. Sutherland-Meade Co., 107 Va. 787, 797, 60 S. E. 132; Damron & Kelly v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 112 Va. 544, 72 S. E. 153, 154.

A substantial compliance with the provisions of section 3286 is all that is required. It was passed to remedy the well-known evil of filing sham pleas for purposes of delay (Grigg, etc., v. Dalsheimer, etc., 88 Va. 508, 510, 18 S. E. 993; Spencer v. Field, 97 Va. 38, 41, 38 S. E. 880), and imposes no hardship upon the defendant. A substantial compliance with its provisions is all that is or should be required. See Jackson v. Dodson, 110 Va. 46, 65 S. E. 484, and cases cited.

But, tested even by the strict rule of construction which has been applied in attachment cases, the affidavit is clearly sufficient. It does not, it is true, in express terms state that the affiant is the plaintiff in the action; but it uses language which plainly shows that he is the plaintiff, and that is sufficient. See Glinch River Min. Co. v. Harrison, 91 Va. 122, 21 S. E. 660. The plaintiff was J. E. Gray, the affiant was J. E. Gray, and the affidavit states that J. E. Gray made oath "that the foregoing account against W. R. Carpenter is just, true, and correct, and due to the best of affiant's belief, and that to the best of affiant's belief the amount of his claim against the said W. R. Carpenter is $2,800, and that the said amount is justly due, with interest from the 1st day of March, 1910." The language quoted leaves no room for doubt that the affiant was the plaintiff, that the amount claimed was $2,800, that it was justly due, and that it bore interest from March 1, 1910. The fact that the account filed with the declaration claimed interest from January 1, 1910, does not affect the validity of the affidavit, since the date fixed by the latter was in favor of the defendant; and will control in entering up judgment if no defense be made.

The other error assigned in substance is that, even if the affidavit be held sufficient, the plaintiff by his conduct has waived or is estopped from relying upon the benefit of the provisions of section 3286.

[2] It is well settled that a plaintiff in an action of assumpsit may waive, or be estopped from asserting, his right to have judgment entered in his favor for the amount claimed by him in the affidavit filed with his declaration; as provided by section 3286, although the defendant has failed to comply with the provisions of that section which entitle him to make defense to the claim asserted. See Lewis v. Hicks, 96 Va. 91, 30 S. E. 466; Spencer v. Field, etc., 97 Va. 38, 33 S. E. 390; Price v. Marks, 103 Va. 18, 48 S. E. 499; Jackson v. Dodson, supra; Pollard & Haw v. Am. Stone Co., 111 Va. 147, 68 S. E. 266; Gring v. Lake Drummond, etc., Co., 110 Va. 754, 67 S. E. 360. Such waiver may be made, as was said in Lewis v. Hicks, supra, either expressly or by implication by the plaintiff, or he may be estopped to take advantage of the defendant's failure to comply with the statute. In that case, the action of the plaintiff in taking issue upon a plea not accompanied by the affidavit required, instead of objecting to the plea, was held to work a waiver or an estoppel.

In Jackson v. Dodson, supra, the plaintiff was held to have waived his rights to a judgment as provided by that section, when he not only made no objection to the defendant's plea when tendered without a sufficient affidavit, but assented to, or accepted without objection, a continuance of the case until the next term, with leave to the defendant to file within 15 days the grounds of his defense.

Pollard & Haw v. American Stone Co., supra, is to the same effect, where counsel for the plaintiffs in an action on the office judgment docket, knowing that the case would be contested, requested that a later day in the term be set for its trial, and the court, with the consent of counsel for the defendant, set the case for trial on a day subsequent to the fifteenth day of the term, on which last-mentioned day the office judgment would ordinarily become final. In each of these cases the plaintiff expressly or impliedly assented or consented to proceedings in his case which showed that he was not insisting upon the defendant's complying with the terms of the statute in making his defense.

[3, 4] In the case under consideration the proceedings in the cause relied on to establish the waiver or estoppel claimed are that there is no indorsement on the back of the declaration showing that the account and affidavit had been filed; that the rule docket does not show that they had been filed, and contained a statement when the common order was confirmed that was to be a writ of inquiry; that the case was placed upon the issue docket of the court; that the plaintiff, in opposing the defendant's motion to continue the case, made no claim that an affidavit had been filed with the declaration, or that the case should be placed upon the office judgment docket. It is further claimed by the defendant that the account and affidavit filed with the declaration were so attached to it that the defendant's counsel, in examining the declaration, would not be likely to see them, and that during the June term of the court one of the plaintiff's counsel had a conversation with the deputy clerk, which showed that the plaintiff's counsel were concealing the fact that the account and affidavit had been filed with the declaration.

Without discussing in detail the evidence that the plaintiff's counsel were attempting to conceal the fact that the account and affidavit were filed with the declaration, it is sufficient to say that they were so attached to it (the declaration ending on one page and the account and affidavit being on the succeeding sheet) that both the clerk and the deputy clerk saw them when the declaration was filed and the rules taken upon it; and as to the conversation between the deputy clerk and the plaintiff's counsel, it appears from the deputy's testimony that it was a mere casual conversation to which he paid no particular attention, and the attorney testified that not a word was said about this case in the conversation referred to by the deputy clerk. Under these circumstances, neither the manner in which the account and affidavit were attached to the declaration when filed nor the conversation of the plaintiff's counsel with the deputy clerk can have any weight in determining the question of waiver or estoppel.

Do the proceedings at rules and in court establish the waiver or estoppel relied on? As we have seen, the declaration, with the account and affidavit, were properly filed at rules by the plaintiff. He did nothing more in the case until the defendant made his motion to continue the cause at the June term. This motion he opposed, but the court overruled his objection and continued the cause. Up to that time it is clear that he had done no act upon which could be predicated a waiver or estoppel, unless it be, as the defendant insists, that in opposing the motion and insisting upon a trial of the cause he did not inform the defendant that an account and affidavit had been filed, and ask that the case should be placed upon the office judgment docket. It manifestly was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to inform the defendant that there was an account and affidavit filed—a fact which a casual, much less a careful, examination of the plaintiff's pleading (the original of which is before the court) would have shown, and which the plaintiff had the right to assume the defendant knew, and which in the exercise of ordinary care he ought to and would have known. Neither was it the duty of the plaintiff, in opposing the motion to continue, to ask the court to correct the errors of the clerk, either in taking the rules in the case, or in placing it upon the wrong docket. These were errors of the clerk for which the plaintiff was in no wise responsible, and which could not deprive him of his rights under section 3286. Price v. Marks, 103 Va. 18, 21, 48 S. E. 499.

In the case cited it was held that, if through error the case is placed on the writ of inquiry docket, and unsworn pleas be filed, and the case continued to another term, and the plaintiff then moves to strike out the pleas because not sworn to; and the trial court overrules the motion and compels a trial on the pleas, which results in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, the verdict and judgment should be set aside, the pleas stricken out, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

Under the facts disclosed by the record it cannot be said that the plaintiff intended to waive his right to a judgment under the provisions of section 3286 of the Code. Neither do the facts make out a case of equitable estoppel. Without discussing generally the requisites necessary to constitute such an estoppel, it is sufficient to say that there is one essential element lacking in this case, viz., that the party claiming to have been influenced by the conduct of the other to his injury was himself not only destitute of knowledge of the facts, but was destitute of any convenient and available means of acquiring such knowledge, and that where the facts are known to both parties, or both have the same means of ascertaining the truth, there can be no estoppel. See Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 434, cited with approval in C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 92, 93, 40 S. E. 633, 914.

[5] After the circuit court had, at its September term, 1910, set aside the judgment entered in the cause by the clerk the preceding vacation, and permitted the defendant to plead, the plaintiff agreed to a continuance at one term of the court, and asked for a continuance at another. These acts of the plaintiff it is also insisted were waivers of his right to have judgment under section 3286.

Consenting to or obtaining a continuance of the case after the circuit court had set aside his office judgment and permitted the defendant to plead cannot be regarded as a waiver of his right to ask that court to rehear and set aside the orders made by it at the September term, or to insist upon his rights as they existed when the cause was continued over his objection at the June term. Gring v. Lake Drummond, etc., Co., supra.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of to the prejudice of the defendant, and that it must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

CERRIGLIO v. PETTIT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. FRAUD (§ 65*)—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS—REPRESENTATIONS AS TO VALUE.

While plaintiff's requested instruction, in an action for deceit in the exchange of properties, that if representations were made by defendant as to the value of his property, what it was renting for and would rent for, and that loans could be secured on it, and these were relied on by plaintiff, and were material, and without them plaintiff could not conclude the transaction, and they were untrue to the knowledge of defendant, plaintiff was entitled to recover, was too broad, and so properly modified by a proviso that, before they could find for plaintiff, the jury must find said statements were made as facts, not opinions of defendant, the proviso would have been clearer and less calculated to deceive, had it warned the jury against reckless statements of fact, made in disregard of whether they were true or false.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 72-74; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

2. FRAUD (§ 65*)—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS—RELIANCE ON MISREPRESENTATIONS.

Plaintiff, in an action for deceit in exchange of properties, is entitled to an instruction that, if the jury believe plaintiff had not equal means of information with defendant in relation to his property, and, knowing this, defendant made representations as to its value, what it rented for, and what amount of loan could be procured on it, then, if defendant asserts that plaintiff did not rely on such representations, the evidence that he did not must be of the clearest and most satisfactory character, and not of mere inferences or implication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 72-74; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 158*)—REPRESENTATIONS—EFFECT AS TO PRINCIPAL.

The agent of plaintiff, in an exchange of properties with defendant, having also, without plaintiff's knowledge, been defendant's agent, representations made by the agent to plaintiff, during the negotiations, with regard to defendant's property, were binding on defendant as if made by him, though the agent made them honestly, having been deceived by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 589-598; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

4. FRAUD (§ 65*)—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

The instruction, in an action for deceit in exchange of properties, that mere assertions by vendors as to value of their property, or the price that has been offered for it, are assumed to be so commonly made that purchasers cannot rely on them, and are not fraudulent, but are considered as "trade talk," is objectionable, as not drawing the distinction between a mere opinion as to value of property and a vendor's statement of fact as to what he has been offered for it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 72-74; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 244*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SINGLING OUT FACTS.

Defendant's instruction, in an action for deceit in exchange of properties, was erroneous in laying stress on the fact that persons, applied to by plaintiff, during the negotiations, for a second loan of $3,000 on defendant's property, refused it on the ground of inadequate security, and leaving out of view defendant's subsequent reiteration of the value of his property, and his arranging such a loan, ostensibly from another, but in fact with his own money, as a further assurance that the estimate by the persons applied to by plaintiff of the value of the property was unreliable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 577-581; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Admitting evidence, in an action for defendant's fraudulent representations, in an exchange of properties, as to the value of his property, of a third person having been tricked into making an excessive loan on plaintiff's property, prior to plaintiff's acquisition of it, could have served no other purpose than to mislead the jury to a consideration of an irrelevant matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1069, 4153–4157, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

7. FRAUD (§ 38*)—ACTION—TIME.

Plaintiff's bringing of his action for deceit in exchange of properties was not too long delayed, with the result of estoppel or waiver; he not having had occasion to visit the property he got from defendant till several months after the exchange, when he desired to make a new loan on it, and re-rent it, and then, after a few months for finding out what redress he had, having brought the action.

Action by Antonio Cerriglio against R. M. Pettit. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Chas. Poe, C. V. Ford, and Moore, Barbour & Keith, for plaintiff in error. O. E. Nicol, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This action was brought by Antonio Cerriglio to recover damages resulting from fraud and deceit, alleged to have been practiced upon him by the defendant, R. M. Pettit, in an exchange of properties made between them on the 7th day of January, 1909.

At a trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, which judgment we are asked to review and reverse: (1) Because of misdirection of the jury by instructions given, and for error in refusing other instructions asked for by the plaintiff; (2) for error in allowing certain improper and irrelevant evidence to be submitted to the jury; and (3) because the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence.

The material facts which the evidence proved, or tended to prove, and which have to be considered in connection with the assignments of error with respect to the court's rulings in giving and refusing instructions, are as follows: Cerriglio owned a farm in Fairfax county, Va., containing 804 acres, with extensive and costly buildings thereon, known as "Hayfield," situated about 6 miles from Alexandria city and 14 miles from Washington, D. C., which points are accessible by good roads, and also about 2 miles distant from Franconia station on the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad. Upon the Hayfield farm there was a large quantity of valuable personal property, the larger part of which belonged to the foreman on the place, named Thompson; but the personalty owned by Thompson was purchased by Cerriglio and was included in the exchange. Pettit was the owner of a lot in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., with a dwelling and other improvements thereon, known as "1238 Fayette Street."

Cerriglio and Pettit were brought together through real estate agents in the city of Washington, D. C., and the exchange of their respective properties was there consummated. Pettit was represented by the real estate firm of Ballard & Lanham Company, and Cerriglio by Frank A. Harrison; but, as we shall later see, there is proof in the record going to show that Harrison, at the time of the negotiations and the closing of the deal between said contracting parties, was also in the employ and pay of Pettit, without the knowledge of Cerriglio.

Hayfield, at the time of the exchange, was incumbered by a deed of trust securing a balance of $28,500, due to one Thomas Cover, of Winchester, Va., on a loan of $32,000 to Cerriglio's predecessor in ownership, which Cerriglio assumed as part payment of his purchase of the property, but which he had reduced by payments to said sum of $28,500; and the real estate of Pettit, at the time of the exchange, was subject to a mortgage amounting to $8,000. The personal property on Hayfield was transferred by Cerriglio to Pettit free of incumbrance, and consisted in part of property owned by the foreman on the Hayfield farm, which Cerriglio had purchased in order to carry out the agreement of exchange; the agreement providing that the farm should be delivered to Pettit, together with all personal property thereon, with certain minor exceptions. There was evidence tending strongly to prove that in the negotiations leading up to said exchange Pettit and his agents represented to Cerriglio that the Pittsburgh property was worth $35,000; that it had a loan value of $16,000—i. e., that the latter amount could be borrowed upon it—and that it had a rental value of $125 per month; in fact, the initial contract of exchange provided that Cerriglio should have a tenant paying a rental for the Pittsburgh property of $125 per month until April 1, 1909, while the truth was that Pettit was agreeing to pay that rent for the property himself for the time named, as an inducement to Cerriglio to agree to the exchange being consummated, and that, too, in face of the uncontroverted facts that the Pittsburgh property had not at that time, nor down to the institution of this suit, a rental value of over $55 per month.

At the date of the initial agreement between these parties, December 19, 1908, Cerriglio had never been to Pittsburgh, and knew nothing of values there. After this agreement had been signed, however, and before deeds were exchanged, Cerriglio went to Pittsburgh, spending a few hours there, but was with Pettit the entire time, and made no inquiry of others as to the value of the Pittsburgh property. While these parties were together on that occasion, Pettit reiterated his assurances as to the sale value, loan value, and rental value of the property, and these representations were given additional force and credit in the estimation of Cerriglio, doubtless, by the handsome and attractive appearance of the buildings, but not a word was spoken to him to put him on notice that values in Pittsburgh in that locality had entirely changed in late years; the result being a very great deterioration in both the salable and rental values of properties there, a fact well known to Pettit. The property here in question, which had perhaps been worth, many years prior, the values placed upon it by Pettit, had declined until at the time of Cerriglio's visit to Pittsburgh it was worth no more than, if as much as, $11,000. Instead of telling Cerriglio the truth as to the value of his property, Pettit made a number of artful suggestions as to the desirable location of his property, among them that the neighborhood was the abode of millionaires.

At the beginning of these negotiations there was only a mortgage on the Pittsburgh property for $8,000, and it is true that before the exchange of said properties was closed Cerriglio applied to Thos. Cover (who held the $28,500 deed of trust on Hayfield) for a loan of $2,000 on the Pittsburgh property, to obtain the money with which to pay Foreman Thompson for the personalty he had on Hayfield, and that Cover, after he and his son-in-law, Kern, an attorney at law, had visited Pittsburgh and inspected the property, declined to make the desired loan, reporting to Cerriglio the information obtained; but it is also true that Cerriglio immediately sought out Pettit and his then undisclosed agent, Harrison, and reported what had been told him by Cover and Kern, but here again Cerriglio was thrown off his guard and his apprehensions removed by Pettit telling him that Cover and Kern were entirely mistaken, and that he, who had lived in Pittsburgh all his life, knew much better as to values than they, and that the values stated to Cerriglio by him were true. The initial contract provided, as we have seen, that Cerriglio should be paid a rental for the Pittsburgh property of $125 per month until April 1, 1909, and when told what Cover and Kern had reported with respect to the property, Pettit not only said that they did not know what they were talking about, but with the view, obviously, of inducing Cerriglio to believe that Cover and Kern were entirely mistaken, and that the values of the Pittsburgh property, as stated by him, were true, and should be relied on by Cerriglio, arranged himself the desired second mortgage of $3,000 on the property, which Cerriglio at the time thought, as he had every reason to think, was a bona fide loan, obtained through business channels, but which proved to be in fact a loan made by Pettit himself; the real truth of the transaction never coming to the knowledge of Cerriglio until months after his deal with Pettit had been closed.

The defense of Pettit does not rest to any extent upon a denial of the falsity of the representations charged to have been made by him to Cerriglio, but his endeavor is to justify his method of dealing by the defense that all he said was "trade talk," and by charging that the Hayfield property was not worth more than the deed of trust lien upon it. He does not seriously question that the Pittsburgh property was really worth no more than the mortgages upon it, and introduces no evidence to contradict statements made by leading real estate agents of Pittsburgh and a large property owner there, to the effect that the real value of the Pittsburgh property in question at the time of its exchange for Hayfield farm did not exceed $11,000, and that probably $10,000 would be the best price that could be gotten for it, and that its rental value, instead of being $125 per month, would not exceed $55 per month.

Cerriglio had been offered for Hayfield $35,000 but a short time before the exchange with Pettit, which offer did not include the personal property thereon, valued at $3,000, and it appears from documentary evidence in the record that in the fall following his taking possession of Hayfield, in January, 1909, Pettit was pricing the farm and what was on it at $150,000, and gave extravagant estimates of the productive character of the land, saying that under proper management it would, at the price he put on it, net the owner $15,000 or $20,000 per year; and in one or more letters written by him, when he had owned the farm but 10 months, he declared it worth the price he had put on it, and declared it to be the best farm in Virginia, and that a part of it the year before had yielded "98 bushels per acre." It is true that Hayfield had run down in value while owned by Cerriglio, and that Pettit made considerable expenditures upon it shortly after he became its owner; but there is quite a difference in opinion among his witnesses as to the amount so expended by him. He says that the amount was $30,000, while the witnesses testifying vary widely as to these expenditures, one of them putting his estimate of the amount as low as $5,000. Be that, however, as it may, it is hardly possible that an expenditure of even $30,000 on the Hayfield farm would have brought its salable value from $28,500 up to $150,000 within 10 or 12 months, and the productive character of the land up sufficiently to have crops upon it worth $25,000 and yield to the owner a net revenue of $15,000 or $20,000 per year.

The transaction which culminated in the exchange of properties under consideration began with a business visit of Frank A. Harrison (upon whom Cerriglio was relying to obtain a purchaser for Hayfield) to Pittsburgh for Ballard & Lanham Company, with which business Cerriglio was in no way connected. At this time Harrison met Pettit, and was requested by him to effect an exchange of the Fayette street property for other property—a Virginia farm desired. Thereupon Harrison listed this Pittsburgh property, and shortly after his return to Washington wrote Pettit submitting a list of properties which he had for various parties, including in the list the Hayfield farm. This letter so much interested Pettit that he came to Washington, and within a week from the date of Harrison's letter the contract with Cerriglio here in question had been procured. During the negotiations leading up to this contract, Pettit referred to Harrison, who vouched for Pettit's statements as to the Pittsburgh property. Months after the deal was closed, Cerriglio learned that Harrison had represented Pettit as well as him (Cerriglio) in the transaction, and had received one-half of the commissions of $1,000 paid by Pettit for effecting the deal. While it is fair to Harrison to say that it seems to be conceded that at the time he honestly believed the Pittsburgh property was valuable, and worth much more than the liens against it, yet he, like Cerriglio, was deceived by the attractive appearance of the property, and also, like Cerriglio, had heard the extravagant and reckless estimates of its value repeated by Pettit. When Harrison learned the results of the deal to Cerriglio, he returned to him the note for $750, received for his services in the transaction. It nevertheless appears that Harrison was the agent of Pettit, without the knowledge of Cerriglio, and vouched for the statements made by Pettit.

"Cerriglio," as Cover, a witness for Pettit, testifies, "is a man easily imposed upon and believes everything that is told him," and Harrison testifies that he represented both parties in this transaction, and, after stating how he brought them together, he corroborates Cerriglio in his statements as to how he was deceived as to the sale and rental value of the Pittsburgh property; that Cerriglio knew nothing of his (Harrison's) agency for Pettit, and declares that he was the party who influenced Cerriglio in making the deal; and, in effect, that he was led into doing so by the statements made by Pettit with respect to the Pittsburgh property, all of which he had repeated to Cerriglio, but found out afterwards to be unwarranted, as they were not in accordance with the truth.

The gravamen of Cerriglio's complaint is not so much what the property was worth which Pettit got from him in the exchange, but the fraud and deceit practiced upon him by Pettit with respect to the property which he deeded to him (Cerriglio), and which he was led to believe had a sale value of $35,000, a loan value of $18,000, and a rental value of $125 per month, when in truth the property did not exceed in value $11,000, had no loan value at that time beyond $8,000 then secured upon it, and could not, as the real estate and business men testified, be rented for over $55 per month, the amount of rent obtained for it after strenuous efforts to obtain a tenant for it when it became vacant by reason of the expiration of the time for which Pettit was paying $125 per month.

After all the evidence in the case had been introduced, Cerriglio requested the court to give to the jury eight instructions, four of which were given, but Nos. A—6, A—7, and A—8 were refused, and A—2 given with an amendment, to which ruling amending A—2 and refusing A—6 and A—7 Cerriglio excepted.

[1] It was sought by instruction A—2 to have the jury told that if they believed from the evidence that representations were made by Pettit as to the value of the Pittsburgh property, what it was renting for and would rent for, and as to the amount of loan that could be secured upon it, and that these representations were relied upon by Cerriglio, that same were material, and without which Cerriglio could not conclude the transaction, and that the same were untrue, and known by Pettit to be untrue, then Cerriglio was entitled to a verdict in this action for such an amount, not exceeding the amount sued for, as in the judgment of the jury was right and proper under all the circumstances. The court gave this instruction, but with the proviso added to the effect that before a verdict could be found for Cerriglio the jury must further believe from the evidence that said statements were made as facts, not opinions of Pettit.

While it was not error to modify the instruction as asked, because too broad in its statement of the proposition of law it was intended to expound, the proviso added to the instruction would have been clearer, and less calculated to mislead the jury, had it gone further and to the extent of warning them against reckless statements of fact made in disregard of whether they were true or false.

[2] Instruction A—6, which was refused, was to the effect that if the jury believed from the evidence that Cerriglio had not equal means of information with Pettit in relation to the Pittsburgh property, and that, knowing this, Pettit made representations as to its value, what it was rented for, and what amount of loan could be procured upon the same, then if Pettit asserted that Cerriglio did not rely upon such representations, the evidence to show that he did not must be of the clearest and most satisfactory character, and not of mere inference or implication.

We are of opinion that the refusal of this instruction was error. The evidence as to the statements made by Pettit, referred to in the instruction, and Cerriglio's reliance upon them, is clear and positive—in fact, the record does not show that Pettit seriously denied that Cerriglio did rely upon said statements. Harrison in his testimony went to the extent of saying that he and Pettit seemed to be Cerriglio's masters in the transaction. While Pettit is shown to be comparatively a young man, it also appears that he has been a successful business man, had lived all his life in Pittsburgh, where he had acquired considerable wealth, and was skilled in the arts of trade. On the other hand, as we have seen, Cerriglio was a man pronounced by witness Cover as "easily imposed upon, and who would believe anything that was told him."

It is said by Staples, J., in Grim v. Byrd, 73 Va. 293: "Even a matter of opinion may amount to an affirmation, and be an inducement to a contract, especially where the parties are not dealing upon equal terms, and one of them has, or is presumed to have, means of information not equally open to the other." Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. 713, 5 Am. St. Rep. 285; Buena Vista Co. v. Billmyer, 48 W. Va. 382, 37 S. E. 583.

In Fitzgerald v. Frankel, 109 Va. 603, 64 S. E. 941, the opinion by Harrison, J., says: "If the purchaser has not equal means of information with the seller, if it be a case in which he had the right to rely upon the representation, the evidence to show that he did not rely upon it must be of the clearest and most satisfactory character. In such cases, there ought to be no room for inference or mere implication"—citing Grim v. Byrd, supra.

The fraud and deceit complained of in Fitzgerald v. Frankel, supra, was of the same character in all essential features as the fraud and deceit alleged in the case at bar, and here it is made to appear that Pettit, who is charged with fraud and deceit, designedly led Cerriglio to rely upon the representations he (Pettit) made to him; for, when confronted with the opinion expressed by Cover and Kern as to the value of the Pittsburgh property, Pettit denounced the source of their information, and, to dispel any lingering doubt in Cerriglio's mind as to the truth of his representations, immediately procured for him a second loan of $3,000 on the Pittsburgh property, ostensibly arranging the same without difficulty by means of a telephone conversation carried on in Cerriglio's hearing, when in truth he was the only person willing to make the loan.

Instruction A—5, given for Cerriglio, was not broad enough to cure the error in refusing A—6.

[3] Instruction A—7, also refused, was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that, before and at the time of closing the said transaction, Frank A. Harrison was in the employ of the defendant, to be paid, and that he was thereafter paid, a consideration by the defendant for his services in relation to the said transaction, and that such relationship existing between the said Harrison and the said defendant was unknown to the plaintiff, and not ascertained by him until long after consummating the said deal, that then, any representations made by the said Harrison to the said plaintiff, prior to and at the time of the closing of the said transaction, in relation to the said Pittsburgh property, were made as the agent and in behalf of the said defendant, and that the defendant is bound by the same, to the same extent as if made by himself."

We have already referred to the evidence sufficiently to show that this instruction was intended to direct the attention of the jury to the question whether under all the facts and circumstances of the case they should find that Harrison was the agent of Pettit in the exchange of properties between Pettit and Cerriglio, without the knowledge of the latter, and that, if the jury should so find, then, upon the principle of law that a principal is bound by representations of his agent, made either in the scope of his employment or in furtherance of the object for which he is employed, Pettit was as much bound by any false representations made by his agent, Harrison, to Cerriglio with respect to the Pittsburgh property as if such representations had been made by Pettit himself.

The refusal of instruction A—7 was also error. Ferguson v. Gooch, 94 Va. 1, 26 S. E. 397, 40 L. R. A. 234; Beury v. Davis, 111 Va. 531, 69 S. E. 1050; 1 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 274, and cases cited. The fact that Harrison may have been honestly deceived by Pettit does not alter the case. If deceived, Harrison, as the evidence tended to show, in turn and in the interest of Pettit, deceived Cerriglio, who looked upon Harrison as his trusted agent, and lent the ready ear of confidence to all he said and did in relation to the exchange of properties in negotiation.

The giving of instructions 1, 2, 3, and 4 for Pettit is assigned as error.

[4] Instruction 1 told the jury that mere assertions by vendors of property as to its value or the price that has been offered for it are assumed to be so commonly made that purchasers cannot rely upon them, and they are understood as affording him no ground for neglecting to make examination for himself; that one relying upon such statements does so at his peril and must take the consequences; that the mere expression of opinion in strong and positive language is no fraud, though it be false; and that such statements are not fraudulent in law, because they do not ordinarily deceive, but are considered as "trade talk."

The objection to this instruction is to that part of it which told the jury that assertions by a vendor as to the price he has been offered for property are assumed to be so commonly made that purchasers cannot rely upon them, etc. We are of opinion that this objection to the instruction is well grounded, for the reason that the instruction does not draw the distinction in law between a mere opinion as to what a certain piece of property is worth, and the affirmation or statement by the vendor of the property, as an existing fact, that he has been offered a certain sum for the property, etc., which affirmation or statement proves to be false. The latter case is not in any way controlled by the rule respecting "trade talk" or "opinion utterances," but by the rule that, when the vendor of property states that he has been offered a given sum for it, the statement is one of fact, as the chief element of the value of property is the readiness with which it may be sold. Strickland v. Grayhill, 97 Va. 602, 34 S. E. 475; Hull v. Fields & Thomas, 78 Va. 606; Lake v. Tyree, 90 Va. 719, 19 S. E. 787.

The weight of authority does not sanction the doctrine that one who has fraudulently deceived another, and thereby induced him to enter into a contract to his disadvantage, can successfully defend an appropriate action against him for the fraud and deceit by saying: "It is true that I, by fraud and deceit, induced you to enter into the contract; but you were negligent in not finding out that I was deceiving you, and therefore guilty of negligence in believing me."

"If one represents as true what he knows is false, in such a way as to induce a reasonable man to believe it, and the representation is meant to be acted on, and he, to whom the representation is made, believing it true, acts on it, and thereby sustains damage, there is fraud to support an action of deceit at law, and to found a rescission of the transaction in equity. Whether the misrepresentation is made innocently or knowingly, if acted on, the effect is the same. In the one case, the fraud is actual; in the other, it is constructive. * * *

"One to whom a representation has been made is entitled to rely on it quoad the maker, and need make no further inquiry." Lowe v. Trundle, 78 Va. 66, and authorities cited. See, also, 2 Va. L. Reg. 694, and authorities cited.

[5] The same objection is urged to instructions 2 and 4, given for Pettit, that is made to instruction 1, just considered, with the additional objection that instructions 2 and 4 segregate some of the facts, calling particular attention thereto; and then tell the jury that, if they find those facts from the evidence, their verdict should be for the defendant.

These instructions lay stress upon the fact that Cover and Kern, after viewing the Pittsburgh property and reporting to Cerriglio that Cover would not make a loan of $3,000 secured by a second mortgage on it, but leave out of view the transaction, testified to and practically uncontradicted, which took place after Cover and Kern had left Cerriglio, and in which Pettit and Harrison reiterated their assurances as to the value of the property, and Pettit's act in arranging the desired second mortgage loan as a further assurance to Cerriglio that Cover's and Kern's estimate of the value of the property was unreliable. There was no evidence tending to show that Cerriglio after that transaction made inquiry or received information from any one other than Pettit and Harrison. Under these circumstances the instructions should not have laid stress upon the statements made by Cover and Kern, and left out of view the evidence tending to prove the artifice of Pettit as to a second mortgage loan on the property, procured for the purpose of showing that the property had then a present actual loan value in excess of what Cover and Kern had said, and equal to the value put upon it by Pettit.

The grounds for assignments of error 5 and 6, which are founded upon bills of exceptions 5 and 6, will not be elaborated. Suffice it to say that the evidence to which the exceptions referred was irrelevant, and, if offered at another trial of the cause, should be excluded.

[6] The trial court permitted, over the objection of Cerriglio, the witness Cover to state the circumstances under which he had placed a loan of $32,000 on the Hayfield farm in 1906, and how he was "tricked" into making the loan, which ruling is assigned as error.

We are of opinion that this assignment of error is well taken. The consideration which had induced Cover to make a loan upon Hayfield several years prior to the exchange agreement made between Cerriglio and Pettit which is involved in this cause, and prior to Cerriglio's acquisition of any interest in Hayfield, was wholly irrelevant to the issue, and could have served no other purpose than to mislead the jury to a consideration of another transaction concerning Hayfield farm, alleged to have been brought about by fraud, but with which Cerriglio had no connection whatsoever.

[7] There is no merit in the contention that Cerriglio too long delayed bringing this action, and therefore the doctrine of estoppel or waiver has no application to the case. Cerriglio did not find out, until he went to Pittsburgh in the fall of 1909 for the purpose of borrowing the money to pay the $3,000 loan, which Pettit made him, the extent to which he had been deceived and defrauded with respect to the Pittsburgh property. His efforts to rent the place for something like $125 per month, which Pettit said it would yield, were unsuccessful, and as long-distance telephonic communications had failed to get the money to pay the loan made by Pettit, he went to Pittsburgh to negotiate a loan on the property, when and where he learned, as he states, that he had been swindled. True, he did not go at once into court, but took time, as he had the right to do, to inform himself as to whether or not he had any redress, and, when advised that he had a remedy at law, he brought this suit within a few months, to wit, in May, 1910.

As the case has to go back for a new trial, we will not discuss the evidence, further than has been necessary in considering the instructions to the jury given and refused at the last trial.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the circuit court has to be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with this opinion.

Reversed.

WINFREE v. RIVERSIDE COTTON MILLS CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 123*)—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—CONSOLIDATION OF CORPORATIONS.

Under Code 1904, § 1105e, subsecs. 40, 41, providing that domestic corporations engaged in the same or similar business may consolidate, when authorized to do so by majority vote at a properly called meeting of the stockholders of each corporation, a corporation had a right, by a majority vote of its stockholders, to consolidate with another corporation engaged in the same business, though one stockholder objected, and though the corporation was organized in 1882, and prior to the enactment of this statute; Code 1873, c. 57, §§ 59, 60, which was the statute then controlling, expressly reserving to the state the right to change the powers granted to corporations, and the power exercised and conferred by the consolidation statute not, therefore, operating to impair the obligation of contracts.

Held that, under Const. § 156, subd. "d" (Code 1904, p. ccliv), providing that no court shall have jurisdiction to correct or annul any action of the Commission within the scope of its authority, the court had no jurisdiction to set aside a consolidation which had been effected between two corporations according to law, and for which the Commission's approval and certificate had been given.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Danville.

Bill by one Winfree against the Riverside Cotton Mills Company and others. From a decree overruling a demurrer to the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, and remanded.

Coleman, Easley & Coleman, Harrison & Long, and A. B. Percy, for appellant. R. W. Peatross, Harris & Harris, and A. A. Phlegar, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. [1] The first question to be determined in this case is whether or not the Riverside Cotton Mills, in which the appellant, who was complainant in the court below, was a stockholder, had the right by a majority vote of all of its stockholders to consolidate with the Dan River Power & Manufacturing Company, under the provisions of an act entitled "An act concerning corporations," approved May 21, 1903 (Acts of Assembly 1902-04, pp. 437, 476-480), and found in the Code of 1904 as chapter 46A.

By subsection 40 of section 1105e of that Code it is provided, with certain exceptions which do not affect this case, that any corporation organized or to be organized under any law or laws of this state may merge or consolidate into a single corporation with any other corporation organized for carrying on the same or a similar business under the laws of this or any other state of the United States.

By the following subsection (41) it is provided how such merger or consolidation may be effected. One of the provisions of that subsection is that such merger may be authorized by a majority vote at a meeting of the stockholders of each of the corporations proposing to consolidate, called and held in the manner prescribed by that subsection.

Separate meetings of the stockholders of the two companies were called to consider the proposed consolidation agreement entered into between the directors of the two companies. The appellant, who, as before stated, was a stockholder in the Riverside Cotton Mills, protested and voted against the consolidation at the meeting of his company; but the vote of the stockholders at the meeting of each company was, by a large majority, in favor of the consolidation, and the consolidation was subsequently completed or perfected in the manner prescribed by the statute.

The contention of the appellant is that, since the Riverside Cotton Mills was incorporated prior to the enactment of the statute in question authorizing the consolidation of corporations doing the same or a similar business by a majority of its stockholders, the consolidation could only be effected by the unanimous vote of the stockholders, notwithstanding the provision of the act that such consolidation might be effected by a majority vote.

The appellees, on the other hand, insist that in the year 1882, when the Riverside Cotton Mills was incorporated under the provisions of chapter 57 of the Code of 1873 (sections 59 and 60), the power to alter or amend the charter was expressly reserved by the state, and under that reserved power and section 158 of the Constitution (Code 1904, p. cclviii) and subsection 8 of section 1105a of Pollard's Code, passed pursuant thereto, the state had the right to authorize the consolidation in question, even against a stockholder who does not consent to it.

Section 59 provided that, after a charter was certified to the secretary of the commonwealth, the court granting it, "or the judge thereof, in vacation, may, upon the motion of said company * * * or on reasonable notice to said company, alter or amend said charter, or change the corporate name of said company; and such alteration, amendment or change shall be recorded by said clerk and in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth * * * and shall be as effectual and legal from that time as if originally a part of the charter."

Section 60 provided that, as soon as the charter of the corporation was lodged in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, the persons signing and acknowledging the certificate, their successors, and other persons associated with them, should be a body corporate, "and shall have all the general powers, and be subject to all the general restrictions provided by this edition of the Code of Virginia, or that may have been heretofore, or may hereafter be enacted by the General Assembly, in regard to such bodies politic and corporate."

It seems that such a reservation of power to the state prescribed by the laws in force when the charter is granted, whether written in the Constitution, in general laws, or in the charter itself, qualifies the grant, and that the subsequent exercise of that power cannot be regarded as an act impairing the obligation of contracts.

"The effect of such a provision," as was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Looker v. Maynard, 179 U. S. 46, 52, 21 Sup. Ct. 21, 23 (45 L. Ed. 79), "whether contained in an original act of incorporation, or in a Constitution or general law subject to which a charter is accepted, is, at the least, to reserve to the Legislature the power to make any alteration or amendment of a charter subject to it, which will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant, or any right vested under the grant, and which the Legislature may deem necessary to carry into effect the purpose of the grant, or to protect the rights of the public or of the corporation, its stockholders, or creditors, or to promote the due administration of its affairs."

This language is reiterated and approved in the case of Polk v. Mutual Reserve Fund, etc., 207 U. S. 310, 325, 328, 28 Sup. Ct. 65, 52 L. Ed. 222. See, also, generally, Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. 190, 212-214, 20 L. Ed. 550; Miller v. People of State of New York, 15 Wall. 478, 21 L. Ed. 98; Wright v. Minn. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 193 U. S. 657, 663-664, 24 Sup. Ct. 549, 48 L. Ed. 832; Anderson v. Commonwealth, 59 Va. 295.

[2, 3] In January, 1904, upon the recommendation of the directors of the Riverside Cotton Mills Company, the stockholders at a meeting regularly held, in which 18,002 shares of the entire stock of 20,000 shares of the company were present and voting, voted unanimously in favor of having the charter of the company amended so as to authorize it to acquire and own stock in other companies not exceeding 80 per cent. of the capital stock of that company. The charter was so amended in accordance with the act of assembly entitled "An act concerning corporations." The object of the amendment, as alleged in the bill, was to enable the Riverside Cotton Mills to acquire $350,000 of the stock of the Dan River Power & Manufacturing Company in addition to what the former then held in the latter company. The additional stock authorized to be acquired was acquired, and the charter as thus amended acted on without objection. At the time that amendment was sought by the Riverside Cotton Mills and granted by the State Corporation Commission, the present Constitution of the state was in force. Section 158 of that instrument (Code 1904, p. cclvii), which had been carried into a statute (subsection 8, § 1105a, Pollard's Code), provided that "every corporation heretofore chartered in this State, which shall hereafter accept, or effect, any amendment or extension of its charter, shall be conclusively presumed to have thereby surrendered every exemption from taxation, and every nonrepealable feature of its charter and of the amendments thereof, and also all exclusive rights or privileges theretofore granted to it by the General Assembly and not enjoyed by other corporations of a similar general character, and to have thereby agreed to thereafter hold its charter and franchises, and all amendments thereof, under the provisions and subject to all the requirements, terms and conditions of this Constitution and of any laws passed in pursuance thereof," so far as the same might be applicable to such corporation.

One of the objects of the convention which framed that Constitution was to get rid of special legislation in the creation and government of corporations, and to provide for the incorporation both of municipal and other corporations, and their government by general laws, as far as practicable. This is apparent from sections 117, 154, and 64 (Code 1904, pp. ccxxxviii, ccl, ccxiv). In the light of that purpose of the constitutional convention, it seems to us that one of the objects of section 158 was to bring corporations theretofore created under the operation of the same general laws which were enacted to govern corporations created after the Constitution went into effect, as far as practicable. The language is sufficiently comprehensive to so provide. It declares that the corporation, after accepting or effecting an amendment to its charter, holds its charter and franchises and all amendments thereof under the provisions and subject to all the requirements, terms, and conditions of the Constitution and any laws passed in pursuance thereof, so far as the same might be applicable to such corporation. The charter which is to be so held is not only a contract between the state and the corporation, but is also a contract between the state and the stockholders, the corporation and the stockholders, and between the stockholders themselves. The provision that the charter shall be held after such amendment under the provisions and subject to all the requirements, terms, and conditions of the Constitution and of any laws passed in pursuance thereof, so far as applicable, is not limited to the relations between the state and the corporation, but applies as well to the relations between the state and the stockholders, the corporation and the stockholders, and between the stockholders themselves.

That this is the construction which should be placed upon the language used is shown by the construction which has generally, if not universally, been placed upon the language reserving the power to the state to amend, alter, or repeal a charter. Although the power reserved is to alter, amend, or repeal the charter, it is not limited to changes or alterations solely between the state and the corporation, but authorizes amendments and alterations within certain limitations directly affecting the stockholders in their relations to the state, to the corporation, and to each other.

In Looker v. Maynard, supra, the power to alter or amend, etc., reserved to the state, it was held authorized the Legislature to give the right of cumulative voting to each stockholder.

Under a like power it was held in Anderson v. Commonwealth, 59 Va. 295, that although the charter of an express company did not make the stockholders personally liable for debts of the company, the Legislature had the power to so modify the charter as to make them personally liable. See, also, Lord v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc., 194 N. Y. 212, 87 N. E. 443, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 420; Gregg v. Granby, etc., Co., 164 Mo. 616, 65 S. W. 312.

These and other cases which might be cited show that, in order for the state to make amendments to or alterations in the charter of a corporation which affect stockholders in their relation to the corporation, to the state, or between themselves, it is not necessary that the stockholders shall be mentioned in terms in the instrument reserving the power to the state to alter or amend, but that the power reserved to alter or amend the charter is sufficient for that purpose.

But it is argued that the amendment made to the charter of the Riverside Cotton Mills Company in 1904, upon the application of that company, cannot have the effect of amending its charter and bringing it under the general laws of the state, so as to authorize it to consolidate with another company by a majority vote of its stockholders, because in its application it was declared that the amendment sought by that application was not to "affect or amend said charter in any other respect or particular, but that the same in all other respects shall continue as now."

If the effect of the amendment asked for and made was, as we have seen, to bring the corporation under the provisions of section 158 of the Constitution, the wish or declaration in the application for the amendment that the charter was not to be amended in any other respect would avail nothing. The amendment asked for could not be obtained, whatever might be the agreement of the stockholders or the desire of the corporation, upon terms inconsistent with the Constitution and laws under which it was asked and accepted. Yazoo & Miss. etc., R. Co. v. Adams, 180 U. S. 1, 23, 24, 21 Sup. Ct. 258, 45 L. Ed. 415.

[4] While under the provisions of section 1105e of the Code the Riverside Cotton Mills Company had the right to consolidate with the Dan River Power & Manufacturing Company by a majority vote, any stockholder of either corporation who did not give his assent to such consolidation and was dissatisfied therewith had the right to refuse to become a stockholder in the consolidated corporation, and was entitled to receive from such consolidated corporation the fair cash value of his stock as of the day before the vote for consolidation was cast, and a summary remedy was provided for ascertaining the value of such stock and to secure its payment to the dissenting stockholder. Subsection 41.

[5] While this summary remedy is given by the statute, and the appellant might have pursued it, he was not bound to do so. Although the consolidating statute took away from him the right to defeat the consolidation by refusing to assent to it, it did not take away from him the right to refuse to surrender his stock for stock in the new corporation, or to refuse to take anything for it less than its actual value at the date of the consolidation. Barnett v. Philadelphia Market Co., 218 Pa. 649, 87 Atl. 912; Colgate v. U. S. Leather Co., 73 N. J. Eq. 72, 87 Atl. 657; 5 Thomp. on Corp., § 6060.

[6] To ascertain that value, under the allegations of the bill, investigations into the condition of the Riverside Cotton Mills may have to be made and accounts taken, which could be much better done in a court of equity than in a court of law. The demurrer to the bill, on the ground that the appellant had a complete and adequate remedy at law, was therefore properly overruled. Hickman v. Stout, 29 Va. 6; Tyler v. Nelson, 55 Va. 214; Coffman v. Sangston, 62 Va. 263; Nat. Life Assurance, etc., v. Hopkins, Adm'r, 97 Va. 167, 33 S. E. 539.

[7] It is insisted by the appellant that, even if the Riverside Cotton Mills had the authority and right by a majority vote to consolidate with another company engaged in the same or a similar business, the consolidation in question was invalid, and should be set aside and annulled, because the provisions of section 1105e of the Code have not been complied with, and for the further reason that, even if they had been, the agreement of consolidation was so inequitable and unjust in its provisions to the appellant and other stockholders similarly situated that a court of equity should set aside the agreement on that ground.

By section 158 of the Constitution of the state, subsection "a" (Code 1904, p. ccll), it is provided: "Subject to the provisions of this Constitution and to such requirements, rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law, the State Corporation Commission shall be the department of government through which shall be issued all charters and amendments or extensions thereof, for domestic corporations, and all licenses to do business in this State to foreign corporations, and through which shall be carried out all the provisions of this Constitution, and of the laws made in pursuance thereof, for the creation, visitation, supervision, regulation and control of corporations chartered by, or doing business in, this State."

The agreement of the two corporations to consolidate, and the vote in favor thereof, were certified by the proper officers and in the manner prescribed by subsection 41 of section 1105e of the Code to the State Corporation Commission. Upon those papers being presented to the State Corporation Commission, the same subsection declares that it "shall ascertain and declare whether the applicants have, by complying with the requirements of the law, entitled themselves to the merger or consolidation applied for, and shall issue or refuse a certificate thereof accordingly; if it be issued, the said agreement and certificate, with the action thereon of the Commission, shall be certified by the Commission to the secretary of the commonwealth, and shall be recorded and lodged in the manner in this act before provided as to the recordation and lodging of the original certificate of incorporation or articles of association of the corporation so consolidating, and when such certificate shall be filed for recordation in the office required as to original certificates of incorporation or articles of association, as the case may be, the said merger or consolidation shall be complete and the merged or consolidated corporation may proceed to carry out the details of said merger and consolidation according to the terms of the agreement and to transact and carry on business for which it was formed." All this was done in this case.

By subsection "d" of section 156 of the Constitution (Code 1904, p. ccliv), it is provided that "no court of this commonwealth (except the Supreme Court of Appeals, by way of appeals as herein authorized), shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any action of the Commission, within the scope of its authority, or to suspend or delay the execution or operation thereof, or to enjoin, restrain or interfere with the Commission in the performance of its official duties: Provided, however, that the writs of mandamus and prohibition shall lie from the Supreme Court of Appeals to the Commission in all cases where such writs, respectively, would lie to any inferior tribunal or officer."

The State Corporation Commission having approved the consolidation of the two corporations and issued the certificate prescribed, which action was clearly "within the scope" of its authority, the trial court very properly held, under the plain language of subsection "d" of section 156 of the Constitution, that it had no jurisdiction to set aside or annul the consolidation thus effected.

[8] It is also insisted that the consolidation of the two corporations was in violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States (article 1, § 8) and of the act of Congress known as the "Sherman Anti-Trust Act" (Act July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200]).

Whether these were not questions to be considered and passed upon by the State Corporation Commission when it approved the consolidation and issued its certificate to the consolidated company need not be determined; for, whether they were or not, it is plain, under the allegations of the bill, that the consolidation was not in violation of either the commerce clause of the federal Constitution or the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. See Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 31 Sup. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834; United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 31 Sup. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663.

The court is of opinion that the corporation court properly overruled the demurrer to the bill, and to that extent its decree must be affirmed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nicholas County.

Bill in equity by H. W. Herold and others against David McQueen, Sheriff, and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Price and Squire Halstead, for appellants. Brown, Jackson & Knight, A. B. Koontz, A. L. Craig, S. R. King, Brown & Eddy, and Alderson & Breckinridge, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. H. W. Herold and 89 other taxpayers of Nicholas county, suing on behalf of themselves and all other taxpayers of said county, filed a bill against the sheriff, the board of directors of the Nicholas county high school, and the county court of said county, to enjoin the collection of a certain tax which had been levied for the purpose of raising funds with which to purchase ground in the town of Summersville, or near thereto, for the erection of a county high school building thereon, pursuant to a special act of the Legislature, passed at the regular session of 1911. A temporary injunction was awarded, but was later dissolved on motion of defendants, after due notice. From that order of dissolution, made on the 27th of November, 1911, plaintiffs have appealed.

In view of the nature of the case, it being one affecting the interest of all the citizens of a county, we thought we ought to determine it as soon as possible; and therefore we have taken it up for decision out of its regular order on the calendar of submitted cases. The bill assails the act creating the Nicholas county high school on the alleged ground that it contravenes certain provisions in the Constitution; and counsel for appellants, in their brief, assign a number of reasons why they think the act should be held to be unconstitutional.

[2] For a few years after the adoption of the United States Constitution it was a much mooted question whether or not the court had the power and the right to declare an act of Congress to be void on the ground that it contravened some provision of the Constitution. Many able lawyers thought it was not in the power of the court to do so. Among those who held to that view was the eminent statesman, Thomas Jefferson. But the question was early set at rest by the Supreme Court, which, in opinions handed down by the court in 1803 and in 1810, prepared by the distinguished Chief Justice, John Marshall, in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. Ed. 60, and in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. Ed. 162, held that the court had such constitutional power. These are the leading cases on the subject, and they have been since followed, not only by the United States courts, but by the state courts as well. "But," says the Chief Justice in Fletcher v. Peck, "it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the Legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." Every presumption, therefore, is in favor of the validity of the legislative enactment; and, unless the court can clearly see that the act is contrary to the fundamental law, it ought not to declare it unconstitutional. If the court entertains a doubt, that is enough to determine the question in favor of the legislative act; for the rule is that the court must be clearly and strongly convinced of its unconstitutionality before it will be justified in declaring an act void. It is a grave responsibility for the court to sit in judgment upon the acts of a co-ordinate branch of the government, and it should approach such a task with the greatest of caution, and should always be sure of its footing before pronouncing them void.

[1] Counsel claim that the act in question violates section 39, art. 6 (Code 1906, p. lxii), of the Constitution, which reads as follows, viz.: "The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases; that is to say, for * * * regulating or changing county or district affairs; * * * the opening or conducting of any election, or designating the place of voting. * * * The Legislature shall provide, by general laws, for the foregoing and all other cases for which provision can be so made; and in no case shall a special act be passed, where a general law would be proper, and can be made applicable to the case, nor in any other case in which the courts have jurisdiction, and are competent to give the relief asked for." The act provides for the establishment, in the town of Summersville, or near thereto, of the Nicholas county high school, and creates a board of directors, which is to consist of five members. It constitutes the president and commissioners of the county court and the county superintendent of free schools ex officio members of said board, and gives them full power to act until the fifth member is elected, whose election is to take place at the next general election after the passage of the act. The board of directors is given the power to manage and control the school, employ teachers and fix their salaries, prescribe courses of study, and grant diplomas of graduation. It is also empowered to levy taxes for the purpose of raising revenue to purchase the necessary grounds, erect a school building thereon, and maintain the school. The funds provided for are to be collected and disbursed by the sheriff. The act also provides that, before it shall become effective, it shall be submitted to the voters of Nicholas county for their ratification or rejection at a special election to be ordered by the county court, notice of which is to be published for a given time before the election is had. Such special election was ordered and taken, and a majority of the votes cast in the whole county was for the high school, although a majority of the votes in some of the magisterial districts was against it.

The act does not attempt to regulate or change the county and district affairs of Nicholas county. Such county and district affairs as the Legislature is inhibited from regulating or changing by a local or special act are still carried on in that county under the general laws applicable alike to all the counties and districts of the state. The act only creates a county high school, and provides for its support by a tax to be levied on the taxpayers of the whole county. It does not work a change in, or operate as a regulation of, the general county and district affairs which already existed, but it is a creation of something in addition thereto. It makes no change in the plan provided by general law for the creation of district high schools; and, under the general law, any two or more districts of Nicholas county may still combine and establish district high schools.

It is insisted that the act violates the constitutional inhibition upon the Legislature to pass a special act "where a general law would be proper and can be made applicable to the case." But must not the Legislature determine for itself, before passing the law, whether or not a general law can be made applicable to the case? We think clearly that the question is chiefly one of expediency, a matter for legislative, and not judicial, judgment. Whether or not a special act is proper, for the reason that a general law cannot be made applicable to the case, often depends upon facts, circumstances, and local conditions which do not appear on the face of the act; and to ascertain whether such facts and conditions exist, as will justify a special act, is a preliminary question for the Legislature, and the passage of the special act must be taken as an expression of the legislative opinion that they do exist. The determination of such preliminary matters by the Legislature is not reviewable by the courts. They are not judicial questions. Indianapolis v. Navin, 151 Ind. 139, 47 N. E. 525, 51 N. E. 80, 41 L. R. A. 337; 36 Cyc. 991. Article 6 of the Constitution deals especially with matters concerning the rights, powers, and duties of the legislative branch of the government, and section 39, qualifying in a manner the legislative powers, must generally leave the matter of the propriety of a special act to the discretion of that body, and particularly must this be so with reference to such special acts as the one in question. We must therefore assume that the Legislature ascertained such facts and conditions to exist in Nicholas county, as justified the passage of the act. We have no power to review that finding. Lusher v. Scites, 4 W. Va. 11; Roby v. Shepperd, 42 W. Va. 286, 26 S. E. 278. The wisdom or propriety of passing a general law, providing for county high schools in all the counties of the state, in order that a county high school might be established, in pursuance thereof, to meet the needs of Nicholas county, thereby avoiding the necessity of passing the special act in question, was a matter wholly within the legislative discretion. 36 Cyc. 991. The general law now in existence has no provision for the establishment of county high schools, and the expediency of passing such a general law, when perhaps only a few counties of the state stand in need of such schools, is a question determinable alone by the Legislature. "The expediency or in expediency of an act is a question for the Legislature and not for the courts." Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612.

Numerous special acts have been passed at various times since the adoption of the present state Constitution, creating independent school districts, establishing branch schools of the state normal school at Huntington, and also special acts establishing preparatory schools for the state university. These acts are similar in nature to the one in question, and can claim no higher constitutional sanction. The validity of those acts has not been questioned in any of the courts, so far as we know; and to decide the present act unconstitutional would be, in effect, to hold all those schools to be unlawfully established, and might occasion great disturbance and confusion.

The fact that the Legislature submitted the act to a vote of the people of the county was not a violation of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of a special act "opening or continuing any election or designating the places of voting." The act does not provide the manner of conducting the election, or name the places of voting. Presumably the election was to be conducted under the general law regulating the holding of elections, and the voting to be had at the places theretofore determined pursuant to general law. That the general law, in force at the time this act was passed, provided for the establishment of district high schools by two or more districts in any county, the majority of the voters of each district voting in favor thereof, does not prove the act unconstitutional by showing that no necessity therefor existed. The Legislature must have determined that such general law did not meet the needs of Nicholas county. "The fact that the preceding Legislature may have considered that a general law on the subject could be made applicable is not binding upon a succeeding Legislature." 36 Cyc. 991, editorial note 87. Wilburn v. Raines, 111 Va. 334, 68 S. E. 993; Indianapolis v. Navin, supra.

It is urged that the act violates section 1, art. 12, of the Constitution (Code 1906, p. lxxxii), which says: "The Legislature shall provide, by general law, for a thorough and efficient system of free schools." The Legislature has, by general law, provided a system of free schools throughout the state. But it will be noted that it is not prohibited from augmenting, and making more efficient, the general system of free schools, by the establishment of special high schools and graded schools in any locality where it may think it wise to do so. The Constitution does not provide for the establishment of the state university, or the state normal school at Huntington, or their respective branch schools. These are established and maintained by special legislation; and, while the people of their respective locations are in a position to receive a greater benefit from them than people in other parts of the state, yet the right and power of the Legislature to create them, and to provide for their maintenance by taxing the people of the whole state, has not been questioned. We think the Legislature can, with equal right, tax the county as a unit to support a county high school. True, sections 6 and 10, art. 12, of the Constitution (Code 1906, pp. lxxxiii, lxxxiv), recognize the districts existing at the time the Constitution was adopted, as the unit for free school purposes, but those sections also recognize the inherent power vested in the Legislature to change the unit, and they do not divest it of that power. There is nothing in article 12, which is the article dealing especially with the subject of public education, prohibiting the Legislature from making the county, instead of the district, the unit, if it should see fit to do so; and nothing to prevent it from retaining the district as the unit for the general or common free schools, and establishing the county as the unit for graded or high schools. The Legislature could have established the high school without submitting the question to a vote of the people at all, and may have submitted it to a vote only for the reason that it thought it unwise to establish the school unless a majority of the voters of the whole county were in favor of it. Our attention is called to section 10, art. 12, which reads: "No independent free school district or organization shall hereafter be created, except with the consent of the school district or districts out of which the same is to be created, expressed by a majority of the voters on the question." But the act in question does not create a school district out of any part of any school district or districts of the county. The integrity of the different districts remains intact, and the several boards of education thereof have the same territorial jurisdiction, and the same amount of property on which to lay their levy to raise revenue to run the schools of their several districts that they had before the act was passed. Hence we do not think the act is repugnant to the sections referred to in article 12 of the Constitution.

It is claimed that the act, in authorizing the board of directors to levy a county tax, violates section 24, art. 8 (Code 1906, p. lxxiv), of the Constitution; and also that, in constituting the county superintendent of free schools and the members of the county court members of the board of directors for the high school, it violates section 8, art. 7, which prohibits the Legislature from appointing or electing officers. The authority to levy taxes to support the school is a necessary incident to the management and control given to the board of directors, and while the tax may be regarded as a county tax, being leviable upon all the property in the county, it is, nevertheless, no interference with the right and power conferred upon the county court by section 24, art. 8, giving to that tribunal control of the police and fiscal affairs of the county, and the power to lay and disburse the county levy. The county levies there mentioned relate to the revenues to be raised for the administration of those matters and affairs over which the county courts are given supervision and control. The public education is not under the management of the county courts. But even those powers which are given by that section to the county courts are subject to "such regulations as may be prescribed by law." That section does not say, nor does it mean, that the county court is the only tribunal that can be given the power to make county levies for any purpose.

By constituting the president and commissioners of the county court and the county superintendent of free schools ex officio members of the board of directors for the high school, the Legislature did not violate the Constitution, in that it thereby elected men to office. Those men had already been elected to their respective offices; and the act only places upon them additional duties that are not inconsistent with those which they were elected to perform. This question, we think, has been determined by the case of Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 562; and we do not think it is necessary to enter upon a discussion of it in this opinion. We approve the decision made in that case, and think the reasons assigned in the opinion therein rendered are applicable here. We do not think their duties as members of the board of directors are at all incompatible with their duties as members of the county court. We cannot see wherein their respective duties will conflict. Only a small portion of their time will necessarily be occupied in the discharge of duty in either respect. And, by increasing their duties, and providing additional compensation for the extra services to be performed, the selection of persons properly fitted to discharge the duties of the office is facilitated.

[3] It is insisted that the act violates the Constitution by increasing the salary of the members of the county court. The per diem stipend of $2 now allowed them by law can scarcely be called a salary. But, if it be a salary, the act does not increase it, for, when they meet as a board of directors, they are not then sitting as members of the county court; and the $2 per day allowed by the special act to each member of the board of directors for time actually employed in transacting the business of the high school is not an increase of the per diem compensation to the members of the county court. It is not to be supposed that they would meet as a county court, and also as a board of directors, on one and the same day, and render an account for two days' services performed in one.

The decree appealed from is affirmed; and as that decree does not and could not make final disposition of the case, it being a vacation order, we are not authorized to enter a decree here dismissing plaintiffs' bill. Therefore the cause is remanded for final disposition by the lower court.

COMMISSIONERS OF ROADS AND REVENUES OF SUMTER COUNTY v.
McMATH et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 168*)—PROCEEDINGS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

McMath and others, citizens of Sumter county, applied to the judge of the superior courts of the Southwestern circuit, under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 5441, for a mandamus against the commissioners of roads and revenues of that county, to compel them to have a designated public road of the county worked and repaired, so as to bring it up to that standard now required by existing laws of this state, as embodied in Civil Code 1910, §§ 632, 633, 654, and so that ordinary loads, with ordinary ease and facility, could be continuously hauled over such road. The answer of the defendants raised material issues of fact which were submitted to a jury during term. Held, evidence offered by the defendants was immaterial and inadmissible which tended to show (a) that the road complained of was "up to the average roads, other than graded roads, in Sumter county"; (b) that in another designated road in the county, before it was graded, "there were places where people in traveling the road turned out of the main right of way, as was done on the road in question"; (c) that the road in question was "comparatively as good as the other roads of the county," or as good as the average roads of the same class in the county; (d) and that holes had been seen in "the graded roads in the county."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-374; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 128*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

One ground of the defendants' motion for a new trial is: "Because, as movants contend, the court erred in refusing to allow the defendants, over the objection of the plaintiffs, to prove by R. G. Christian, superintendent of the roads of the county, whether, with the force you have, you have been able to maintain all the roads in the county so that they are free from stumps, trees, bushes, at least on first-class roads 80 feet wide, on second-class roads 20 feet wide, and third-class roads 16 feet wide, and driveways for carriages 5 feet 6 inches wide, and absolutely free from obstruction." Counsel for defendants stated that he expected to prove by this witness that such is a fact, and that such fact was material to the issues in the case. Said ruling is error, for the reason that was stated to the court at that time, indicated herein, and for the further reason that it was not the intention of the law to give one citizen the right to require the defendants to work and maintain any particular road to the standard as required by law." No sufficient assignment of error is made in this ground, for the reason that it does not appear therefrom which fact was sought to be proved by the witness, whether he had been able, or whether he had not been able, to maintain all the roads in the county so that they were free from stumps, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-262; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 128*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

Nor is there a sufficient assignment of error in the following ground of the motion for new trial: "Because the movants contend the court erred in refusing to allow [one of the defendants], as a witness for the defendants, to answer the following question: 'How long would it take to go over all the roads in Sumter county and to keep them free from stumps, holes, ruts, and roots'"—it not appearing what answer the witness would have made to the question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-262; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

4. MANDAMUS (§ 173*)—PROCEEDINGS—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "I charge you that, if you should determine that this road was either a second-class or third-class road, it was kept and maintained in accordance with the law and with the standard as required by the law for that class of roads—whether second-class road or third-class road—whichever you may determine it was, then if the road got in a bad condition from heavy rains, or matters of that character, if while in that condition it had been destroyed or injured or put out of that condition by excessive or heavy rains, the county commissioners would be entitled to a reasonable time (and it is a question for the jury to determine as to what would be a reasonable time) to put said road back in the condition in which the law requires such roads to be maintained." This charge related to one of the defenses set up, to the effect that the road in question, if not in the condition required by law, was out of repair by reason of recent heavy rains, and that the defendants had not had sufficient time, with the force at their command, to repair it and the other public roads of the county which had also been damaged by excessive rains. The instruction was therefore not erroneous, and especially in view of the whole charge, (a) as in effect telling the jury that "unless the road in question was up to the standard as required by law before the injury occasioned by heavy rains, then the fact that rains had washed and ruined the road in question would be no reason why a mandamus absolute should not be granted"; or (b) "because said charge is inconsistent with and contrary to the following portion of the charge of the court to the jury in said cause: 'If the facts disclose that the road is not below that standard, that is, that reasonable loads with reasonable ease and facility can be transported continuously over said road, then the plaintiffs would not be entitled to a verdict in their favor.'"

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 378-380, 388-390; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

5. MANDAMUS (§ 173*)—PROCEEDINGS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Another ground of the motion for new trial was that "the court erred in giving the following in charge to the jury: 'If you should find against the plaintiffs, and in favor of the defendants, that is, that the road is maintained in such manner (as the court has already explained) that reasonable loads could be continuously hauled over it with reasonable ease and facility, then it would be your duty to render a verdict finding in favor of the defendants.'" The error assigned upon this excerpt from the charge is that the court thereby instructed the jury that the road in question must not only be such that reasonable loads can be continuously hauled over it with reasonable ease and facility, but that it must be up to that standard also, as prescribed by sections 632 and 633 of the Code of 1910." The exception is without merit. Civil Code 1910, § 5441, authorizes judges of the superior courts, and makes it their duty upon a proper showing made to them, "to issue the writ of mandamus against such parties having charge of and supervision over the public roads of such county, and to compel by such proceedings the building, repairing, and working of such public roads as are complained of, up to that standard now required by existing laws of this state as embodied in said sections [two of them being sections 632 and 633], and so that ordinary loads, with ordinary ease and facility, can be continuously hauled over such public roads." Certainly a public road over which reasonable or ordinary loads cannot, with reasonable or ordinary ease and facility, be hauled is not up to the standard required by law in this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 378-380, 388-390; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

The assignments of error upon the failure of the court to instruct the jury in certain particulars, not being referred to in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, must be considered as abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

7. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL—NO ERROR.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

POWELL v. FOWLER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ALLEGATIONS OF FRAUD—NO DEMURRER.

No demurrer was filed raising the question of whether the charge of fraud in the petition was sufficient.

2. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY (§ 8*)—REAL PROPERTY—REMEDIES OF PARTIES.

An exchange of lands was made between two parties. One of the parties sued the other, alleging that the defendant had fraudulently represented that the tract which he was to convey to the plaintiff contained 300 acres, when it in fact contained much less, and the plaintiff sought to recover proportionately for the shortage. Held, that the evidence as to the existence of actual fraudulent representations and the reliance thereon was sufficient to be submitted to the jury; but the only evidence as to the actual contents of the tract of land being the deed made to the defendant by the person from whom he purchased it, in which the tract was described as containing "240 acres, more or less," this was not sufficient to show the actual shortage to be 60 acres, and authorize a recovery on that basis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exchange of Property, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-18; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—OTHER GROUNDS NOT MERITORIOUS.

None of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial were meritorious.

BOWEN et al. v. DRIGGERS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REVERSIONS (§ 3*)—MERGER—FEE SIMPLE.

A testator devised a tract of land to his wife "for and during her life, until her death; then the above property to go back to the estate of the said [testator]." After the death of the testator his wife remarried and died. She was survived by her second husband. She left no children or descendants of children as the offspring of either marriage. Held that, by the will of the testator, his wife took a life estate in the land; and there being no other heir at the time of the testator's death, she inherited the reversion, and the two estates merged into a fee simple.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reversions, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 61*)—PERSONS ENTITLED—MERGER OF ESTATES.

Upon the death of the woman in whom a fee-simple estate had vested by merger, her surviving husband inherited the property as her sole heir; and persons claiming to be heirs of the testator after the death of the life tenant acquired no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 175-185; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

Error from Superior Court, Toombs County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by Louis Bowen and others against C. W. Driggers. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Williams & Giles, of Lyons, and P. W. Meldrim, of Savannah, for plaintiffs in error. Hines & Jordan, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. [1] If a testator devises a life estate in land, the devisee takes only a life estate by virtue of the will. If the testator makes no provision as to what shall become of the reversion, upon his death it passes to and vests in his heir or heirs. Here the widow of the testator took a life estate under the will. No provision was made as to who should take the remainder. Therefore, upon the death of the testator, by inheritance it passed to his heir. It happened that the widow was his sole heir. Thus she took under the will a life estate, and as sole heir was vested with the remainder by inheritance. There is nothing to indicate any intention on her part to keep the two estates separate. They accordingly merged, and she became the owner in fee simple of the property.

[2] Upon her death her sole heir inherited from her. Persons who claim to be heirs of her first husband had no interest in the land, and no right to recover it from her second husband. It was accordingly proper to sustain a demurrer to an action filed for that purpose; the facts stated in the headnote appearing on the face of the petition. Civil Code, § 8929; Wilder v. Holland, 102 Ga. 44, 29 S. E. 134; Oliver v. Powell, 114 Ga. 592 (4), 40 S. E. 826; Smith v. Moore, 129 Ga. 644, 59 S. E. 915.

EDENFIELD v. MILNER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 140*)—ENTRY OF LEVY—SUFFICIENCY.

An entry of levy by a constable in these words: "Georgia, Emanuel County. I have this day levied the within fi. fa. on one half interest in 123 acres, more or less, in the 58th District G. M., of said county, adjoining lands of John Edenfield Sr., and others, as the property of W. A. Oliver, defendant; legal notice given said W. A. Oliver; property pointed out by the plaintiff"—was too indefinite and uncertain to authorize the sale of the half interest in any particular tract of land. Civil Code, § 6026; Crawford v. Verner, 122 Ga. 814, 50 S. E. 958, and citations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 334-341; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 140*)—ENTRY OF LEVY—SUFFICIENCY.

Such a levy gave no authority to the sheriff to sell, not a one-half interest in the tract of land containing 123 acres, more or less, but the entire interest in a tract described as containing 61½ acres, more or less.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 334-341; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 72*)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD—INFANCY OR PARTY.

The uncontradicted evidence showing that the plaintiff, who sued in her own right, was 25 years of age when the suit was brought, and that the other plaintiff, for whom she appeared as next friend, was 20 years of age at that time, prescription could not have run against either of them, and therefore it is unnecessary to determine whether the sheriff's deed would have been admissible as color of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 390-398; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the recovery of a one-half interest in the land for which suit was brought, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

McAFEE et al. v. FLANDERS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 7*) — DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE—SUBSTITUTE JUDGE.

Where an ordinary was disqualified from presiding in a proceeding to probate a will, on account of relationship to some of the parties, and called in the ordinary of an adjoining county, who presided in his stead, a judgment rendered by the latter was not void, although the disqualification was not entered on the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 373*) — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION.

Upon objection being made to the admission in evidence of a certified copy of the record in such case, on the ground that the ordinary of the county other than that where the case was pending was without jurisdiction, there was no error in admitting parol evidence of the disqualification, and the consequent request for the other ordinary to preside, and thereupon allowing the certified transcript to be introduced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1581-1586, 1590, 1592, 1593, 1610, 1611; Dec. Dig. § 373.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 451*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

It was error to charge: "I charge you, on the other hand, if you find from the facts and circumstances of this case that the defendants were named as executors in the will, and that, when this will was about to be set up and probated in solemn form, there was an agreement entered into by and between all of the heirs of [the testator] that the estate should be collected and turned over to the widow, and the widow has distributed it under that agreement, then I charge you that the defendants would not be liable to the plaintiff in any amount whatever, and you should find for the defendants." And also in charging: "On the other hand, if you find that there was an agreement entered into, whereby all the heirs consented and agreed that the estate should be collected and turned over to the widow, and by her used, and it was further agreed by the heirs, the plaintiff included, that it was to be by her used and distributed, and it has been distributed by her in pursuance of that agreement, then I charge you that the defendants would not be liable." Such charges made the liability of the defendants depend, not only upon whether such agreement as that hypothetically stated had been made, and whether the defendants had delivered the property to the widow in accordance therewith, but also upon whether it had been distributed by her in pursuance of that agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1877-1882; Dec. Dig. § 451.*]

Error from Superior Court, Johnson County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by S. A. Flanders against J. K. McAfee and others, executors of John A. McAfee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

John A. McAfee, of Johnson county, died testate. He devised a life estate to his wife in certain property, and a town lot in fee simple, with instructions to the executors to build a house upon it. He left certain specific legacies to named children, among them being a bequest of $200 to the plaintiff, who was his daughter, "provided she has not received that amount above the $200 given or desired to be given the others of my children." He directed that the remainder of his property should be kept together by his executors for the use and benefit of his wife, "provided, from misuse or adverse circumstances the profits from the bequest mentioned in item 1st, and item 2nd, become inadequate to the demands of my wife, Mary Ann Elizabeth McAfee." He then declared that whatever might remain of his estate after the death of his wife should be equally divided among his children named in the will, and appointed his two sons as his executors. His daughter sued the executors for the legacy of $200 given to her by the will. The executors set up, among other defenses, that the will omitted one of the testator's children from the distribution, and that the heirs had entered into an agreement for a different mode of distribution, so as to admit such child of the testator to an equal share. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and they excepted.

B. H. Moye and J. L. Kent, both of Wrightsville, and Hines & Jordan, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Wm. Faircloth, of Wrightsville, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] 1, 2. One ground of the motion for a new trial was that the court admitted in evidence a certified transcript of the record from the court of ordinary, probating the will of the testator. The ground of objection was that the judgment of probate was signed by the ordinary of Washington county, who was without jurisdiction to preside in Johnson county; it not appearing from the record that the ordinary of the latter county was disqualified. The court allowed the ordinary of Johnson county to testify that he was disqualified from presiding by reason of being the uncle of the children of the testator, and that he called in the ordinary of Washington county to preside for him, and then admitted the certified transcript. Error was assigned upon the admission of the parol evidence and also of the transcript. There was no error in such ruling. The proper and orderly method of procedure would have been to enter of record the fact of the disqualification of the ordinary of Johnson county and the consequent presiding of the ordinary of Washington county. This would have made the record speak all the facts, and have shown on its face the jurisdiction of the presiding ordinary. But if the disqualification in fact existed, and the ordinary of the adjoining county was therefore called in to preside, his judgment will not be held void because the reason for his presiding was not duly entered of record. Section 4785 of the Civil Code of 1910 contains two provisions, one as to matters presented to the ordinary "as such ordinary." In that event the statute declares that, "if any disqualification exists, he shall enter it upon the papers, and the ordinary of any adjoining county shall pass upon it and certify his action in the matter to the ordinary of the county where the business arose, and the latter shall record it." The second provision is "when any ordinary is disqualified to try any case or issue pending before the court of ordinary." In that event he shall call upon the ordinary of an adjoining county to preside on the hearing of such case or issue, provided that the judge of the county or city court, or, if none, the clerk of the superior court, may exercise the jurisdiction, without the necessity to call in the ordinary of another county. In the latter part of the section, which deals with the trial of cases before the court of ordinary, the statute does not in terms require an indorsement of the disqualification upon the papers. While it may be good practice to make such entry, and may have the advantage of furnishing a permanent memorial thereof, it is not made a statutory requirement.

[3] 3. If the evidence showed the facts hypothetically stated in the third headnote, the charge based upon them was too restricted. If the executors were authorized to deliver to the widow the property of the estate for use and distribution by her, their liability for special pecuniary legacies would not depend on whether she distributed the estate in accordance with the agreement or not. If the funds and personal property of the estate were rightfully delivered to her under such agreement, the executors would not be liable for the use and distribution which she made of them.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices con-r.

ADAMS et al. v. WHITE.

WHITE v. ADAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 45*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence authorized the finding of the jury that the plaintiffs were entitled to a reformation of the bond for title, as prayed for in their equitable petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 157-183; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 176*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—PAYMENT OF PRICE—ABATEMENT.

Where land is sold by the acre, generally an apportionment for a deficiency is to be made proportionally to the number of acres in the deficiency; and under the evidence this case falls within the general rule.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 833-340; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 44*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

It follows from the foregoing ruling that evidence tending to show that certain portions of the land were more valuable than other portions was irrelevant and immaterial, and should not have been admitted over objections duly made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 155, 156; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

4. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 46*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court erred in giving instructions which authorized the jury, in case they found the sale of the land was by the acre at a fixed price per acre, to make any other reduction than one proportionally to the deficiency in acreage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 157-183; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 340*)—VERDICT—CORRECTION.

The court did not err in refusing, on motion of the plaintiffs, "to correct and amend the verdict by striking therefrom the finding that the purchase price of the land be abated in the sum of $1,000, and inserting in lieu thereof that the purchase price be abated in the sum of $1,376," and to amend the verdict in certain other respects.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 795-799; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

6. REFUSAL TO DIRECT VERDICT—No ERROR.

The court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendants.

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by E. H. Adams and others against Hugh White. To the judgment plaintiffs except, and defendant files a cross-bill of exceptions. Reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill.

F. C. Foster, Sr., of Madison, for plaintiffs in error. Rogers & Knox, of Covington, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. E. H. Adams and others brought their equitable petition against Hugh White, seeking to reform a bond for title to 42 acres of land, "more or less," made by White to petitioners, so as to make the bond show that it was an obligation to convey 42 acres of land by the acre at $100 per acre, and not a sale of the land by the tract, as it appeared by the terms of the bond. Petitioners prayed for an abatement of the purchase price of the land, and a reduction from the amount of certain promissory notes given therefor, on account of a deficiency of 13.76 acres in the tract sold, and to enjoin against certain suits of White against petitioners on the notes, then pending in the city court of Covington. White answered, denying petitioners' right to a reformation of the bond for title, and insisting that the land had been sold by the tract, and that petitioners were not entitled to a reduction in the purchase price in proportion to the deficiency in the number of acres of land. By way of cross-action White prayed for a judgment and decree against the plaintiffs for the full amount of principal, interest, and attorney's fees due on the notes. The alleged deficiency in acreage was admitted. At the conclusion of the introduction of evidence, the defendant moved that the court direct a verdict in his favor for the full amount of the notes, and against reformation of the bond for title. The motion was denied. Specific questions were submitted by the court to the jury, and in answer to these questions the jury found, in effect, that the contract between White and petitioners was for a sale of the land by the acre, and not by the tract; that there was a mutual mistake in drawing the bond for title, which showed that the sale was by the tract; and that the sum of $1,000 should be deducted from the amount of the notes, and that White should recover of the plaintiffs $1,415.19 principal, $365.52 interest, and $141.80 attorney's fees. The court thereupon entered a decree accordingly. The plaintiffs moved to amend the verdict by striking the finding that the purchase price of the land be abated in the sum of $1,000, and inserting in lieu thereof that the purchase price be abated in the sum of $1,376, on the ground that, the jury having found that the sale was by the acre at $100 per acre, the bond for title should be so reformed as to express a sale at $100 per acre, and, it being admitted in the pleadings that there was a deficiency of 13.76 acres, it followed as a matter of law that the deficiency in acreage should be apportioned, and the purchase price abated at the rate of $100 per acre, and that there should be a corresponding reduction in the amount of principal, interest, and attorney's fees recovered, and that the costs should be equitably apportioned between the parties according to this finding. The plaintiffs also filed their motion for a new trial upon the general grounds and certain special grounds. The court overruled both motions, and the plaintiff excepted. The defendant took a cross-bill of exceptions to the refusal to direct a verdict in his favor, and to the refusal of a new trial.

[1] 1. The evidence was sufficient to authorize the finding of the jury, in favor of the petitioners, that the sale of the land was by the acre at the price of $100 per acre, and that the bond for title should be reformed as prayed.

[2] 2. Having found that the sale of the land was by the acre, and not by the tract, it follows that the plaintiffs were entitled to a reduction from the purchase price of an amount proportional to the deficiency in the acreage at the rate of $100 per acre. In the case of Kendall v. Wells, 126 Ga. 343, 352, 55 S. E. 41, 45, it was said: "If land is sold by the acre, generally an apportionment for a deficiency is to be made proportionally to the number of acres in the deficiency. Yost v. Mallicotte's Adm'r, 77 Va. 610. But there are exceptional cases where it is otherwise. And the defendant in error in the main bill of exceptions insists that the present case is one of the exceptional cases, and cite, among other authorities to support this contention, the case of White v. Adams, 7 Ga. App. 765, 68 S. E. 271. This case is cited both as authority that cases like the present are to be classed as exceptional cases, and to show that this is an adjudication binding upon the parties; that it is one of the exceptional cases where the abatement of the purchase price should not be calculated "by mere comparison with the number of acres described in the bond for title with the admitted deficiency." We do not think that this is an adjudication binding upon the parties in the trial of the case in the superior court, made by the petition to reform the bond for title and the answer and the cross-petition filed in the equitable proceeding. The ruling in the Court of Appeals was based upon the status of the case as made under the strictly common-law proceeding in the city court, as modified by the admissions and concessions of the parties—where the plaintiff was clearly entitled to a verdict for the full amount of the notes for the purchase money—"that the plaintiff was willing to allow a fair abatement of the purchase price." In the equitable proceeding, with which we are now dealing, the petitioners, who were the defendants in the suit at law in the city court, based upon the notes for the purchase money, became the plaintiffs and insisted upon their right to have the bond for title so reformed as to show that the land was sold by the acre, and to have an abatement made proportionally to the deficiency in the acreage.

Nor can we agree with our able Brethren of the Court of Appeals in the conclusion reached, and broadly stated, that this was such an exceptional case as took it out of the general rule, stated above, that "where land is sold by the acre, generally an apportionment for the deficiency is to be made proportionally to the number of acres in the deficiency." If this had been a sale of land by the tract, and not by the acre, and there had been a failure of title to any part of the tract sold, and that portion to which there was a failure of title had been more valuable on account of improvements upon it, or valuable mineral deposits, or because of a water power upon it, or was of greater value in proportion to acreage than the remainder of the tract because of similar facts to those enumerated, the purchaser would be entitled to an abatement of the purchase price in proportion to the value of that part of the lands which he did not obtain under the contract of purchase and sale because of such failure of title. But where there is no failure of title to any portion of the tract of land sold, and where the purchaser obtains the entire tract purchased and included in the boundaries by which it was described, and the land was sold at a fixed price per acre, there can be no deduction from the purchase price, other than proportionally to the deficiency in acreage. It is impossible to conceive of any rule by which the jury, in a case like the present, if instructed in the charge of the court to make "a fair abatement of the purchase price," would be guided. It is true that it appears from the evidence that that portion of the land immediately on Poplar street, because of its availability for building purposes, was worth more than other portions of the land. But from what part of the land could the jury deduct the 13.76 acres, the amount of the shortage, from the tract of land sold? Could they say that the shortage was on that part of the tract most remote from the street, or that the shortage was in the center of the tract, or that it was on either one of the two sides of the tract? Manifestly not. This case is one in which the general rule of an abatement of the purchase price proportionally to the deficiency in acreage should be applied.

[3] 3. It follows, from what we have said above, that evidence tending to show that certain portions of the land were more valuable than other portions was irrelevant and immaterial, and should not have been admitted over objections duly made. If the sale was by the tract, the vendor would have been entitled to recover the entire amount of the purchase money as represented by the purchase-money notes; but if by the acre, as the jury found to be the truth of the case, then the reduction should have been proportionally to the deficiency in acreage.

[4] 4. It was error for the court to charge the jury that, "if they found that the land was sold by the acre, they could answer 'how much abatement should be made from the sum of $4,200 on that account, if any.'" For if, as we have ruled above, the sale was by the acre, the jury should have been instructed that they should make a reduction in the amount represented by the purchase-money notes proportionally to the deficiency in acreage.

[5] 5. The court did not err in refusing, on motion of the plaintiffs, "to correct and amend the verdict by striking therefrom the finding that the purchase price of the land be abated in the sum of $1,000, and inserting in lieu thereof that the purchase price be abated in the sum of $1,376," and to amend the verdict in certain other respects. While the jury's verdict fixing the amount of the abatement from the purchase price of the land was inconsistent with their finding that the sale of the land was by the acre, we do not think the court was authorized to amend the verdict and fix a different amount, and thus allow the plaintiffs a greater amount as a reduction from the amount of the purchase money than that which the jury had determined should be a proper amount of reduction.

The other exceptions to the court's rulings are without merit.

[6] 6. The court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict upon the defendant's motion therefor.

Judgment reversed on the main bill of exceptions and affirmed on the cross-bill. All the Justices concur.

GAY v. PARISH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 444*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—ERASURE.

Where a bidder at an administrator's sale, who failed to comply with his bid, was liable for the difference between the amount of such bid and what the property brought at a resale, and was sued therefor, and, shortly before the time for the trial, gave to the administrator a check having written upon it the words, "In full payment," of the suit, and the payee caused such words to be erased before indorsing and cashing the check, parol evidence was admissible to show the circumstances under which such check was given and the erasure was made, and to show whether it was in fact given and received in full settlement or compromise of the liability, or only as a partial discharge thereof. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1929-1944, 2049; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 372*)—SALE OF PROPERTY—LIABILITIES OF PURCHASER—RESALE.

Where an administrator, under order of the court of ordinary, sold land at public outcry, and the bidder, after frequent urging, failed to comply with his bid, and the administrator thereupon notified him that he would resell the property, the bidder was liable, under the statute, for the difference between his bid and the amount which the property brought at a second sale, although the notice of resale did not expressly state that the bidder would be held liable for such difference.

Error from Superior Court, Jefferson County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by H. G. Parish, administrator, against W. S. Gay. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Isaac S. Peeples, Jr., and Milton O. Barwick, both of Augusta, for plaintiff in error. R. N. Hardeman, of Louisville, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. [1] An administrator sold property; the terms being cash. The successful bidder failed to comply with his bid. The administrator readvertised the property and again sold it. At the second sale it brought less than at the first, and the administrator sued the purchaser for the difference, together with the cost of readvertisement. The suit was for $614.15. The purchaser contended that he had settled it for $324. He prepared and gave a check, payable to the administrator individually, for that amount. On the face of this check were written the words: "In full payment. H. G. Parish, Admr., Suit v. W. S. Gay." The evidence tended to show that the administrator refused to receive this check as full payment, or as a full adjustment of the suit, which was to be tried in a few days; but he was anxious to retain the check as a partial payment. There was no conflict in the evidence as to the difference between the two bids. After receiving the check, and before it was cashed, the words quoted were stricken from it. The plaintiff testified that he sought to find the defendant, in order to get the latter to do this; that he could not find the defendant; and that a bank officer or agent made the erasure. He also testified that, after he refused to receive the check in full payment, and stated that he desired it as a partial payment, the defendant expressed a willingness for him to keep it. The defendant contended that he had not agreed for the words to be stricken from the check, and that the plaintiff kept it to consult with heirs of the estate as to receiving it in full settlement, and then cashed it. He admitted that the plaintiff did not in terms agree to receive it as a full settlement at the time of its delivery, but claimed that it was the amount agreed upon some time before. He denied that it was tendered back to him, or that he agreed for it to be taken as a partial payment.

The words indicating full settlement were stricken from the check before its indorsement. There was no written contract of settlement excluding parol evidence, within what is commonly known as the parol evidence rule, so as to bring the case within the ruling in Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Smith, 129 Ga. 553, 59 S. E. 215, and Pennsylvania Casualty Co. v. Thompson, 130 Ga. 766, 61 S. E. 829. See, also, Copeland v. Montgomery, 8 Ga. App. 633, 70 S. E. 30. Whether the check was in fact delivered and received as a partial payment, or as full payment, and the circumstances under which the words were erased, were open to parol evidence, the check as drawn stated that it was "in full payment" of the suit. Palpably it was not a payment of the full amount of the liability. There was no error, either in admitting parol evidence, or in submitting to the jury the question raised.

[2] 2. The plaintiff testified that, upon the failure of the defendant to comply with his bid, he gave notice to the defendant of his intention to resell the property at the risk of the latter. The defendant was unable to remember this, and thought that the plaintiff said that if he did not comply with the bid there would be a resale, but said nothing about this being at his risk. The jury evidently believed the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, as they had a right to do. A request was made to charge to the effect that there must not only be notice of an intention to resell, but also that the resale would be at the risk of the defendant as the original bidder, and that the advertisement of the second sale would not suffice for that purpose. Reliance was had upon the cases of Green v. Ansley, 92 Ga. 650, 19 S. E. 53, 44 Am. St. Rep. 110, and of Davis Sulphur Ore Co. v. Atlanta Guano Co., 109 Ga. 607, 34 S. E. 1011. The distinction between these cases and the present one is that in them there was a sale by a private individual. Upon the failure of a bidder at an auction sale by an individual, if the seller desires to sue the defaulting bidder for damages, the question is, How much is he hurt? A private owner of land is not obliged to resell it at all. He may sell at private sale. According to some authorities, he may sue the bidder for the difference between the bid and the market value of the property, or he may notify the bidder that he will resell the property, and hold the bidder liable for the difference between his bid and what the property brings at the second sale. In such event, the cases above cited hold that there must be notice to the bidder of the intention to pursue the latter course, in order to establish the difference in the bids as the measure of damages, at least where there has been no tender and refusal of the property. But in a public sale under legal process, such as by a sheriff under an execution, or an administrator under an order of court, if the bidder fails or refuses to comply with his bid, the statute gives to the officer the right to sue him for the purchase money, or to resell the property and hold the bidder liable for the difference between his bid and what the property brings at the second sale, if a less amount. The officer does not own the property, and has not the discretion of a private owner. He can only sell at public outcry in the manner pointed out by law. If he proceeds to resell, the statute fixes the liability of the first bidder. If, therefore, the administrator in the case now under consideration notified the defaulting bidder of an intention to resell, the statute gave to such bidder notice as to what might be the result of such resale, and his liability consequent thereon. Civil Code 1910, § 6071. The notice that the administrator intended to proceed with a resale as provided by the statute was notice enough to the defaulting bidder of what his liability would be under the statute. It would have added nothing to the notice if the administrator had said to the bidder that, upon a resale, the statute would render the latter liable, if the property brought less than at the first sale. None of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial require a reversal.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 918*)—TRIAL—RENDITION OF VERDICT—ABSENCE OF COUNSEL.

Error from Superior Court, Stewart County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Jack Baldwin was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

G. Y. Harrell, of Lumpkin, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Williams, Sol. Gen., of Americus, and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

EVANS, P. J. The plaintiff in error, Jack Baldwin, was convicted of the murder of Alice Scott. From the evidence and the defendant's statement, the jury were authorized to find: That the accused and the deceased had been living in a state of concubinage; that, having been informed that the deceased intended to marry another man, the accused went to a house where the deceased and this man were visiting, called the deceased to him, and, with a declaration that he intended to kill her, stabbed her 11 times, with the result that she died in 10 minutes from the wounds. The accused introduced a witness that he was in a drunken condition shortly before the homicide; and in his statement the accused admitted that he went to the house where the homicide occurred on the invitation of the deceased, but disclaimed knowing anything about inflicting the mortal wounds.

[1] 1. In his motion for new trial, the accused complains that the court received the verdict in the absence of his counsel. The trial judge certifies that during the term counsel for the accused had absented himself from the courtroom in other cases in which he was sole counsel, after the case had been submitted to the jury, resulting in delay in the effort to call counsel into the courtroom, and he was twice admonished by the court that if he voluntarily absented himself again the court would receive verdicts in his cases during his absence. When the jury in the present case came into the courtroom to render their verdict, the defendant was present; but counsel for defendant, without permission of the court, had absented himself from the courtroom. The judge directed an officer to look for counsel in the lawyers' consulting room. He was not there. Counsel was then called from the courtroom window, but not at the instance of the judge. The judge waited a little while for counsel to appear, and then received the verdict. The jurors were standing at the bar rail, on the outside of the space reserved for the bar, when the verdict was received. Counsel entered just as the jurors were taking their seats, not in the jury box, but just out of the bar railing. The judge could not say that the jurors did not sit down where persons other than the jury were sitting; but few of the jurors were actually seated when counsel came into the courtroom. He was at once informed of the verdict and its nature, and made no request for a poll of the jury. Under these circumstances, the refusal to grant a new trial, on the ground of the absence of defendant's counsel at the time of the reception of the verdict, was not error. Roberson v. State, 135 Ga. 854, 70 S. E. 175; Richards v. State, 136 Ga. 67, 70 S. E. 868.

[2] 2. The accused called a witness to establish his character for peaceableness or violence. On cross-examination, this witness was allowed to testify that he had heard of the accused whipping the deceased a time or two, over the objection that the testimony was hearsay. There was no error in this ruling. Where a defendant calls a witness to establish his good character, and the witness testifies that from general reputation he regards the defendant's character as good, it is competent, on cross-examination, to elicit the witness' information of specific instances of conduct tending to disprove the witness' estimate of his character. Dotson v. State, 136 Ga. 243, 71 S. E. 164.

[3] 3. Complaint is made that the court failed to instruct the jury that the testimony to which reference is made in the preceding division of the opinion was admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the accuracy of the witness' knowledge of the defendant's character. There was no request for such an instruction. In the absence of a written request, the failure of the judge, in his charge, to apply a rule of evidence to the testimony of a particular witness is not cause for a new trial. Holmes v. State, 131 Ga. 806, 63 S. E. 347.

The verdict is supported by the evidence, and no reason appears for reversing the judgment refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

Error from Superior Court, Jenkins County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by Mattie A. Jones and others against W. M. Wadley, executor, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

The petition, as amended, of Mattie A. Jones, James H. Anderson, and Howard Anderson, shows substantially the following: They are the surviving children of Susan J. Anderson, deceased, and bring their action against John Brady and others to recover a certain tract of land in Jenkins county containing 262½ acres more or less. The defendants are tenants of W. M. Wadley, executor of the estate of W. O. Wadley, deceased, and rent and work said land as croppers of said Wadley, executor. Petitioners claim title to the land and mesne profits since June 1, 1907. Wadley, executor, claims title to said land from Augustus H. Anderson, the husband in his lifetime of Susan J. Anderson. Petitioners claim title as follows: (a) A marriage contract in 1854 between Augustus H. Anderson and his wife, Susan J. Anderson, conveying the land in trust for Susan J. Anderson for life, and at her death to petitioners, who are surviving children of said marriage and the remaindermen under the said deed of trust. (b) Death of Susan J. Anderson in 1907.

The material parts of said deed of trust are as follows: "Whereas the daughter of Col. Augustus H. Anderson, before and at the time of her intermarriage with Augustus H. Anderson, Jr., was possessor of and entitled unto a considerable estate both real and personal property derived unto her by and under the will of her grandmother Jane Jones, formerly of said county and state, deceased, to wit, to a tract of land situated, lying, and being in said county, which will be more particularly described by reference to the division of the estate of the said Jane Jones, deceased, aforesaid, and which is a part and parcel of a tract of land on which the said testator resided at the time of her death, and of the following negro slaves, viz., Rose, Washington, Charles, Everline, Kilt, Wesley, Caty, Margurite, Sam, Abraham, and Littleton, together with the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars in money, the artificial increase of the said property since the division as aforesaid under the will of said deceased; and whereas the said Augustus H. Anderson is desirous of securing unto his said wife and to the issue of said marriage the aforesaid property: Now this indenture made and executed this 21st day of Feb., A. D. 1854, for and in consideration of the premises and of the love and affection which he hath and doth bare unto his said wife Susan J. Anderson, and for the further consideration of the sum of ten thousand dollars which he acknowledges to have received at or before the sealing and of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, hath granted, bargained and sold, and by virtue of these presents doth grant, bargain and sell, upon the following trusts, uses, limitations, and conditions, unto the trustees hereinafter to be nominated and appointed, for the uses hereinafter set forth, the foregoing described land and negroes and the sum of eight thousand dollars to be hereinafter appropriated, viz., to the said trustee for the joint and separate use, maintenance, and support of the said Augustus H. Anderson and his wife Susan J. Anderson, for and during the term of their and each of their lives, and to the survivor of them during his or her life, the corpus or principal of said property not to be subject or liable to any debt heretofore contracted for or to hereafter be contracted for by the said Augustus H. Anderson or the said Susan J. Anderson; and it is further stipulated that the aforesaid sum of eight thousand ($8,000) dollars shall be vested in land, negroes, stock, or in such other property as the said Augustus H. Anderson and his said wife Susan shall consent and agree upon, which said property or stock when purchased shall be subject to all the uses, trusts, limitations, and conditions in this indenture set forth and declared. It is further stipulated that the said Augustus H. Anderson shall have the possession, custody and control of the aforesaid property, and that the artificial increase or proceeds shall be appropriated in so far as may be necessary to the support and maintenance of the said Augustus H. and the said Susan J. Anderson, and of their family. It is further stipulated that any of the aforesaid property now in possession or hereafter to be purchased may, upon the written consent of the aforesaid Augustus H. and Susan J. Anderson, be aliened, sold, and conveyed; but it is expressly required that the proceeds of such sale or sales shall be reinvested in such other property as the parties hereinbefore named shall require, and that when so invested the property so purchased shall be subject to all the uses, limitations, and conditions in this indenture set forth and declared. It is further stipulated and conveyed [covenanted?] that upon the happening of the death of the survivor of the said Augustus H. Anderson or the said Susan J. Anderson, the aforesaid property, with the natural increase of the female slaves, shall go to and vest in the children of the said Augustus H. Anderson and Susan J. Anderson, if any, share and share alike, in fee simple. It is further stipulated and covenanted that upon the happening of the death of either of the said Augustus H. Anderson or the said Susan J.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Anderson, leaving no issue or children capable of inheriting, that then and in that case the aforesaid property shall be vested and remain in the survivor, in fee simple forever, free from the aforesaid trust. It is further covenanted, stipulated, and agreed upon, that Wm. J. Rhodes be and he is hereby appointed trustee, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this indenture; and it is further understood and covenanted and declared that in the event of the trusteeship so as aforesaid becoming vacant by death or resignation or any other cause, that the said Augustus H. Anderson and Susan J. Anderson, or, in the event of the [death of] one of them, the survivor of them, shall have full power and authority to appoint, by this writing under seal such person as trustee as they may deem advisable and proper."

The defendants in their answer to the petition denied all of its material allegations. Evidence being submitted to the jury by both plaintiffs and defendants, on motion of the plaintiffs' counsel the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the premises described in the petition. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendants, and, being overruled, they excepted.

E. L. Brinson and W. H. Davis, both of Waynesboro, and Miller & Jones, of Macon, for plaintiffs in error. R. O. Lovett, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The crucial question in this case is, Did the power conferred by the trust deed on the first trustee to sell the fee-simple estate in the lands in controversy survive to the second trustee? It is insisted by the defendants in error that the power of sale conferred upon the first trustee was a personal trust and did not pass to his successor. But to this contention we do not agree. We shall endeavor to demonstrate from the recitals contained in the trust deed that the power of sale conferred upon the first trustee survived to the second trustee. In the marriage settlement of 1854 the husband was waiving his marital rights, by which, prior to the act of 1866, the title to the land would vest in him as the husband upon his reducing it to possession. He therefore executed a postnuptial contract whereby he conveyed all the property, real and personal, of which he was possessed from his wife, "unto the trustees hereinafter to be nominated and appointed." The word "trustees" in the above quotation is used in the record both in the plural and singular number. In the exhibit attached to the petition it is used in the singular, "trustee," but in the brief of the evidence, which contains what also purports to be a copy of the trust deed, the plural noun, "trustees," is employed. Which is correct we are unable to say from the record. If the maker of the instrument used the word "trustees," it is an added argument to the effect that he intended the powers to survive to the second trustee who was to be appointed in case of the death of the first. If the word "trustee" was used, it would still not affect the conclusions here reached, for we think that what follows makes it manifest that the intention of the maker was that the power of sale conferred on the first trustee should survive to the second. And we are holding that it was the intention of the maker, as expressed in the instrument itself, which must control. See Freeman v. Pendergast, 94 Ga. 369, 389 (2), 21 S. E. 837.

The settlor provides that the sum of $8,000 shall be vested in land, negroes, or stock, or in such other property "as the said Augustus H. Anderson and his said wife Susan shall consent and agree upon," etc. It is also stipulated that "the said Augustus H. Anderson shall have the possession, custody and control of the aforesaid property, and that the artificial increase or proceeds shall be appropriated, in so far as may be necessary to the support and maintenance of the said Augustus H. and the said Susan J. Anderson and of their family." It is further provided that any of the property "now in possession or hereafter to be purchased may, upon the written consent of the aforesaid Augustus H. and Susan J. Anderson, be aliened, sold and conveyed; but it is expressly required that the proceeds of such sale or sales shall be reinvested in such other property as the parties heretofore named shall require," etc. "It is further covenanted, stipulated, and agreed upon, that William J. Rhodes be and he is hereby appointed trustee for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this indenture; and it is further understood, covenanted, and declared that in the event of the trusteeship so as aforesaid becoming vacant by death or resignation or any other cause, that the said Augustus H. and Susan J. Anderson, or, in the event of the [death of] one of them, the survivor of them, shall have full power and authority to appoint, by this [their?] writing under seal, such person as trustee as they may deem advisable and proper."

It seems clear from reading these provisions of the trust deed that the maker intended to reserve to himself and wife, or, in case of the death of either, to the survivor, the right to name the "trustees," and also the right to have the trustee, only upon the written consent of the beneficiaries, or either of them in case of the death of the other, alien, sell, and convey any of the property "now in possession, or hereafter to be purchased." The power to sell was clearly intended to be in the trustee as such, with the written consent of the beneficiaries, and not in any particular trustee. It was not a "personal trust" to be executed by one particular trustee only, but it was the clear intent to vest the power to sell in the trustee, whoever he might be, under the appointment of the settlor and his wife or either of them on the death of the other. And herein lies the distinction between the present case and that of Luquire v. Lee, 121 Ga. 624, 49 S. E. 834, cited by the defendant in error. In that case the court held, under its facts, "that the power in the deed was not incident to the office of trustee, but personal to the trustee." The decision indicates a discretionary power in the trustee, but it is also said that "the grantor, if she wished to deprive the trustee of any discretion as to the sale and reinvestment, could very well have made it his duty to sell and reinvest at the will of Mr. and Mrs. Lee, thus constituting the trustee the mere conduit of passing the legal title. Id., 121 Ga. 629, 49 S. E. 834. In the present case the land "may" be sold, but the discretion is reserved in the settlor and his wife, or the survivor in the event of the death of the other, and if it is sold it "shall be reinvested," not as the trustee may say, but "as the parties hereinbefore named [the settlor and his wife] shall require." Here the discretion is reserved by the trust deed in the grantor and the other cestui que trust, and the trustee cannot act except upon the written consent of the former. The trustee cannot exercise his discretion independently of the maker of the trust deed and his wife. The discretion was not in the trustee, but in both the trustee and them.

This case differs from the ordinary case of the appointment of a trustee for others. Here a man was creating a trust and naming a trustee for himself and wife with the power reserved in them to appoint a successor to the first trustee in case of his death, with like powers in and limitations on the second trustee. They could hardly be supposed to be lacking in confidence in themselves. They appointed the first trustee. If he died, they were to appoint his successor. He was not to be appointed by a court or by any one other than themselves. They retained possession of the property. Reinvestment was to be made only by their consent. The trust property was not to be sold at the discretion of the trustee alone, but with the consent of the husband and wife or the survivor. Again we ask, Did the power of sale provided by the trust deed survive to the successor of the first trustee? It seems clear from a careful reading of the trust deed that the maker intended the second trustee should have the same powers as the first. It would be strange indeed if the makers of the trust deed should appoint the first trustee with certain powers, reserve the right to appoint the second trustee, and then confer on the second trustee powers different from those conferred on the first trustee. The creator of the trust intended that both trustees should have the same powers. The power to convey attached to the office of trustee and not to the individual, and this intent of the makers appears from the trust deed itself. In view of all the various indicia on the face of the trust deed, we hold that the powers conferred on the first trustee were intended to and did survive to the second trustee as such, and, this being so, it follows that, when the second trustee, with the written consent of the surviving cestui que trust, sold and conveyed the fee-simple title to the land in controversy, the purchaser obtained a fee-simple title thereto, and on the death of both cestuis que trust their children have no interest in the lands thus conveyed.

The court below therefore erred in overruling the motion for a new trial in this case. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. TROUT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 210*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

In an action to recover damages for personal injuries, where the recovery depended largely on the testimony of the plaintiff, and his testimony is attacked as being improbable, it is reversible error for the court to charge the jury: "In this connection I charge you that, if a witness swear to an improbable story, that in itself would not be sufficient to discredit him; but slight circumstances in conflict therewith might or might not be sufficient to authorize a jury to disbelieve his testimony, as the jury might determine from all the facts and circumstances proven in the case. But if a witness swear to an impossible story, then the jury will be authorized to disregard his testimony entirely, without any conflicting evidence other than the circumstances surrounding his story."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 490-494, 501; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

For the reasons stated in the second division of this opinion, the following charge is inaccurate in the respects pointed out: "If he is entitled to recover at all, he is entitled to recover for the injury actually sustained, the pain and suffering endured, mental and physical; and as to this the law lays down no definite rule to govern the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, so far as pain and suffering is concerned, and the rule is, not what you would have suffered it for, but what is plaintiff entitled to recover for the pain and suffering he has actually endured. He would also be entitled to recover for his lost time and doctor's bills paid out. If you find that his injuries are permanent, and his capacity to labor has been decreased on that account, you will determine what you will allow for that; that is, on account of his decreased capacity to labor. Determine what he was able to do at the time and just prior to the injury, and what he is able to do now. Find what his earning capacity was before and since, and the difference would be what he is entitled to recover on that account. Then you would get a fair average yearly value of his decreased capacity to labor, remembering that he might or might not have constant employment, that he might or might not continue to work, that he might voluntarily or otherwise abstain from labor, and, further, that as old age comes on his capacity to labor would naturally decrease; and having determined what would be a fair average yearly value of his decreased capacity to labor, then determine his expectancy—that is, how long he would probably live; then multiply the fair average yearly value of his services by his years of expectancy, and this would be the gross sum; then get the present value of that at 7 per cent., and that would be the amount, if any, you will find on that account, what you would allow him on account of decreased capacity to labor; then you would add together the various items, and the sum total would be the amount of your verdict."

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by James W. Trout against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. W. Blair, of Marietta, O. N. Starr, of Calhoun, and Tye, Peeples & Jordan, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. J. G. B. Erwin, Jr., of Calhoun, and Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, of Dalton, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. James W. Trout brought suit for damages against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for alleged injuries to his person by the running of the defendant's trains. On the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The only assignments of error that need be considered are those with reference to the charge of the court. The following charge is alleged to be error: "In this connection I charge you that, if a witness swear to an improbable story, that in itself would not be sufficient to discredit him; but slight circumstances in conflict therewith might or might not be sufficient to authorize a jury to disbelieve his testimony, as the jury might determine from all the facts and circumstances proven in the case. But if a witness swear to an impossible story, then the jury will be authorized to disregard his testimony entirely, without any conflicting evidence other than the circumstances surrounding his story." It is insisted that this charge invades the province of the jury, by instructing them the amount of credit that should be given to the witnesses in the case; it being the province of the jury to determine for themselves the amount of credibility that should be given the testimony of all witnesses in the case, as well as to determine for themselves what fact or facts would be sufficient to discredit the witness, without an expression of opinion from the court. Undoubtedly the credit to be given witnesses is for the jury. The court may have intended the use of the word "discredit" in the sense of impeach; but discrediting a witness is not confined to total rejection of his evidence.

It is also used in the sense of disbelief in the accuracy of his testimony. It is not the province of the court to tell the jury what will discredit a witness. The jury may consider the evidence and determine for themselves what testimony is probable or improbable. The Minnesota Supreme Court has declared: "In all cases the positive testimony of an otherwise unimpeached witness can only be disregarded when its improbability or inconsistency furnishes a reasonable ground for doing so, and this improbability or inconsistency must appear from facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence in the case. It cannot be arbitrarily disregarded by either court or jury, for reasons resting wholly in their own minds, and not based upon anything appearing on the trial." Second Nat. Bank of Winona v. Donald, 56 Minn. 491, 58 N. W. 269. The charge in the present case hereinabove quoted was calculated to confuse and mislead the jury, and to so instruct them is to invade their province, and is reversible error.

[2] 2. Complaint is also made of the following charge of the court to the jury: "If he is entitled to recover at all, he is entitled to recover for the injury actually sustained, the pain and suffering endured, mental and physical; and as to this the law lays down no definite rule to govern the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, so far as pain and suffering is concerned, and the rule is, not what you would have suffered it for, but what plaintiff is entitled to recover for the pain and suffering he has actually endured. He would also be entitled to recover for his lost time and doctor's bills paid out. If you find that his injuries are permanent, and his capacity to labor has been decreased on that account, you will determine what you will allow for that; that is, on account of his decreased capacity to labor. Determine what he was able to do at the time and just prior to the injury, and what he is able to do now. Find what his earning capacity was before and since, and the difference would be what he is entitled to recover on that account. Then you would get a fair average yearly value of his decreased capacity to labor, remembering that he might or might not have constant employment, that he might or might not continue to work, that he might voluntarily or otherwise abstain from labor, and, further, that as old age comes on his capacity to labor would naturally decrease; and having determined what would be a fair average yearly value of his decreased capacity to labor, then determine his expectancy—that is, how long he would probably live; then multiply the fair average yearly value of his services by his years of expectancy, and this would be the gross sum; then get the present value of that at 7 per cent. and that would be the amount, if any, you will find on that account, what you would allow him on account of decreased capacity to labor; then you would add together the various items, and the sum total would be the amount of your verdict." This charge is inaccurate in some respects; and, as the case is to be returned for another hearing, we point out the inaccuracies. In the first place, the court instructed the jury: "Find what his earning capacity was before and since, and the difference would be what he is entitled to recover on that account." The court doubtless meant to charge that, in using the difference in earning capacity as a basis of calculation, they should ascertain what was the diminution of such capacity resulting from the conduct of the defendant. There was some evidence tending to show that the plaintiff suffered from some ailment before the injury. Other causes than the conduct of the defendant might bring about an impairment in his earning capacity. The defendant would only be liable for the result of its own conduct; and therefore it was inaccurate to charge that the difference between the earning capacity before the injury and afterwards furnished the measure of the damages which he was entitled to recover, without reference to the cause of such diminution. Again, at one point in the charge the jury were instructed to "multiply the fair average yearly value of his services by his years of expectancy, and this would be the gross sum." From the context it would seem that the judge did not mean "the fair average yearly value of his services," but the fair average yearly value of the decreased capacity to labor and earn money resulting from the injury, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover therefor. Moreover, a recovery was sought, both for special damages, as to which there is one rule of calculating the amount recoverable, and also as to damages of another character touching which the amount is left to the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors. The reference to these different classes of damages claimed was such that the distinction was perhaps not as clearly drawn in the minds of the jury as it might have been; but these matters will doubtless be made more exact upon another trial.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ALABAMA GREAT SOUTHERN R. CO. v.
BROWN.

SAME v. FRY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NONSUIT REFUSED—No ERROR.

The court did not err in refusing to grant a nonsuit.

2. RAILROADS (§ 401*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "When the plaintiffs have shown, if they have, that the personal injury occurred, and the damage to the personal property was done on account of the running of the engine and cars of the defendant company, then the burden of proof would be upon the defendant company to show that it used all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the injury, and, if it shows that, then it would not be liable at all; otherwise, it would be, provided Brown could not, by the use of ordinary care, have prevented the injury to himself and the property." The charge correctly stated the law, and was applicable to the issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1382-1390; Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 194*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "I charge you in this connection that it is the duty of the engineer and fireman to be upon their seats, at their posts of duty, looking ahead, unless otherwise engaged in other duties necessary, ordinary, and usual for the running of the engine and cars, or the train." Whether it was the duty of the engineer and fireman, at the time of the collision with one of the plaintiffs and with the personal property of the other plaintiff, to be upon their seats, was a question of fact for decision by the jury, and should have been left to them for their determination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 439-441, 446-454, 456-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 401*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "The burden is upon the plaintiff, Brown, in the first instance to show that he was injured and damaged as he contends, and also upon the other plaintiff to show that his property was injured and damaged as he contends. If they have carried that burden, then the burden would be upon the defendant company to show that it used all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the injury and damage to plaintiff."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1382-1390; Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

5. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

The charge in reference to the law for the ascertainment of damages for permanent injury was wanting in completeness and accuracy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 39*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

In the absence of a written request upon the subject, the omission to charge that, if the injury resulted from accident, there could be no recovery, was not such a failure to charge in regard to a distinct and substantive defense as will require the grant of a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 57-61; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 259*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

Failure of the court to charge the law applicable to the diminution of damages on account of contributory negligence, and a failure to charge that if the negligence of the plaintiff and the defendant company were equal the plaintiff could not recover, in the absence of pertinent written requests so to charge, is not cause for the grant of a new trial, under the facts of this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 648-650; Dec. Dig. § 259.*]

8. RAILROADS (§ 401*) — OPERATION — INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS — INSTRUCTIONS.
The other charges of the court complained of were not error for any of the reasons assigned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1382-1390; Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

Error from Superior Court, Dade County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Actions by J. P. Brown and by J. W. Fry, respectively, against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, of Dalton, for plaintiff in error. Foust & Payne, of Chattanooga, Tenn., for defendants in error.

BECK, J. J. W. Fry sued the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company to recover damages for the killing of a team of horses, and the destruction of a wagon and set of harness, caused by the agents and employes of the railroad company in negligently and recklessly running against and upon the same with an engine and train of cars. He alleged that the engineer and fireman, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, could have discovered the wagon and horses upon the track in time to stop the train before reaching them, but that they failed to exercise ordinary care in stopping the train and preventing the collision. In the same court J. P. Brown filed suit against said railroad company to recover damages for injuries sustained at the time and place designated in the petition filed by Fry, and alleged that, while driving a team of horses along a public highway near a cut on defendant's railroad, the horses became so frightened and unmanageable on account of the approach of a train designated as No. 1, by reason of the unusual and unnecessary noises made by it and by the escape of steam and blowing of the whistle, the wagon and team and petitioner were carried over an embankment and into a cut on the railroad; that petitioner was rendered partially unconscious and unable to remove himself; that while he and the horses and wagon were in the cut, unable to get out, another of defendant's trains, designated as No. 6, negligently and recklessly ran upon and over petitioner and the horses and wagon, and in the collision petitioner was greatly injured, either by being struck by the engine and cars, or by portions of the horses or wagon or contents of the wagon being knocked against him with force and violence; and that at the point where this collision occurred the public constantly used the tracks and right of way of the defendant as a highway, and this practice was recognized and acquiesced in by the defendant. Upon the trial plaintiff Brown did not ask for a recovery on account of any negligence alleged as to the operation of train No. 1, and the court instructed the jury that under the evidence no recovery could be had on account thereof.

The two cases were tried together. At the conclusion of the evidence on behalf of plaintiffs the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit in the case of Brown, which was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were filed. The jury returned verdicts in favor of both plaintiffs. A motion for a new trial in each case was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. Under the evidence the right of the plaintiff to recover was a question of fact for the jury, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a nonsuit.

[2] 2. Complaint is made of the following charge of the court: "When the plaintiffs have shown, if they have, that the personal injury occurred and the damage to the personal property was done on account of the running of the engine and cars of the defendant company, then the burden of proof would be upon the defendant company to show that it used all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the injury, and, if it shows that, then it would not be liable at all; otherwise, it would be, provided Brown could not, by the use of ordinary care, have prevented the injury to himself and the property." This charge is a substantial restatement of the provisions contained in sections 2780 and 4426 of the Civil Code, and is not open to the criticism made upon it.

[3] 3. The court charged the jury as follows: "Now, as I said before, the plaintiff Brown was a trespasser upon the railroad, whether he so willed it or not, so far as the railroad is concerned, or its liability is concerned; and as to trespassers I give you this in charge: As to trespassers upon the track of a railroad company, the duty to observe ordinary care and diligence for his protection does not devolve upon the company's servants in charge of the train until his presence upon the track becomes known to them. I charge you in this connection that it is the duty of the engineer and fireman to be upon their seats, at their posts of duty, looking ahead, unless otherwise engaged in other duties necessary, ordinary and usual for the running of the engine and cars or the train." Exception is taken by plaintiff in error to that part of the charge embraced in the last sentence thereof; and we are of the opinion that the court erred in laying down as a principle of law the proposition there stated. Whether in the exercise of due diligence, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, it was the duty of the engineer and fireman to be upon their seats looking ahead, unless otherwise engaged in their duties, was a question of fact for the jury to decide, and they should have been permitted to decide that very material question unhampered by instructions from the court in the shape of a hard and fast rule of law. It was the duty of the employees of the railroad company engaged in running the engine at the time it struck the plaintiff Brown, and the horses and wagon belonging to the plaintiff Fry, to exercise the degree of care and diligence imposed upon them by law under the circumstances as they existed at that time, and the court could not properly go further than to submit to them the rule prescribing the degree of care and diligence which should have been observed by these employees; and when it went further, and stated broadly that "it was the duty of the engineer and fireman to be upon their seats, at their posts of duty, looking ahead," etc., the court stated absolutely as a rule of law that which might or might not be the law of this case, according to the opinion of the jury as to the existing facts at the time.

[4] 4. Another excerpt from the charge is brought under criticism by the motion. It reads as follows: "The burden is upon the plaintiff Brown, in the first instance, to show that he was injured and damaged as he contends, and also upon the other plaintiff to show that his property was injured and damaged as he contends. If they have carried that burden, then the burden would be upon the defendant company to show that it used all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the injury and damage to plaintiff." This charge was not error. It merely placed upon the plaintiff the burden, in the first instance, of showing injury to person and property by the running of the defendant's cars in the manner alleged in the declaration, and then instructed the jury that, if injury had been shown as alleged, the burden was shifted to the defendant to show that it exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the injury complained of. And such is the law under the Code. Civil Code 1910, § 2780.

[5] 5. It is contended that the court erred in the following instructions to the jury: "But you could allow him for the breaking of his arm, if you find that it was broken, and the road liable therefor, and the time he lost on account of the broken arm, and the pain he endured on that account, and the difference between what he would be able to earn, but for the broken arm, and what he is now able to earn with the broken arm. You would ascertain that as best you can from the evidence, and determine what would be a fair average yearly value of the difference, what he would have been able to do, and what he is now able to do, and the difference would be the amount. You would ascertain, first, what would be a fair average yearly value of his services, and then multiply that by the years of his expectancy, how long he would probably live, which you will arrive at from all the facts in the case, and that would give the gross amount, and you will then get the present value of that at 7 per cent., and this would be the amount of your verdict for Brown." This charge is criticised on the grounds: "(a) Because it is not a correct statement of law as to how to ascertain permanent damages; (b) because it fails to call the jury's attention to the contingencies that might or might not happen—the fact of old age coming on, and the decreased capacity of plaintiff to labor—that plaintiff might or might not secure continuous employment, that he might or might not continue in good health." The charge complained of is lacking in completeness and accuracy under the decision in the case of L. & N. R. Co. v. Trout, 75 S. E. 328, this day decided, and the decisions in Central Railroad Co. v. Dottenheim, 92 Ga. 425, 17 S. E. 662, Florida Central, etc., Railroad v. Burney, 98 Ga. 1, 26 S. E. 730, and Central Railroad v. Thompson, 76 Ga. 770.

[6] 6. Complaint is made that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury that, if the injury to the plaintiff was the result of an accident, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The failure of the court to charge the jury specifically what their finding should be in case they should determine from the evidence that the injury complained of resulted from an accident does not afford a ground for a new trial, in the absence of a written request to charge upon that subject. "An accident, as the term is used in connection with cases of this character, means an injury which occurs without being caused by the negligence of either the plaintiff or the defendant. That the defendant itself is free from fault furnishes it a defense, not that the plaintiff is faultless. Where the judge instructs the jury that, if the defendant has used all ordinary care and diligence, there can be no recovery, it cannot be said to add a distinct and substantive defense to also prove that the plaintiff is free from fault. A charge that if the injury resulted from an accident, and neither party was at fault, there can be no recovery, is in the nature of an elaboration or additional statement of the proposition that the defendant is not liable if it is without fault. It may be proper to give such a charge, if requested; but, being merely elaborative, it does not involve such a distinct defense as to make it error to fail to give it, in the absence of a request." Savannah Elec. Co. v. Jackson, 132 Ga. 563, 64 S. E. 682. This rule is applicable, also, to the ground of the motion for a new trial complaining of the failure of the court to charge the law that "no person shall recover damages from a railroad company for injury to himself or his property where the same is done by his consent or occasioned by his own negligence."

[7] 7. Elaboration of the ruling made in the seventh headnote is unnecessary. Savannah Elec. Co. v. Bennett, 130 Ga. 597, 61 S. E. 529; Savannah Elec. Co. v. Crawford, 130 Ga. 421, 60 S. E. 1056; Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co. v. Gornto, 129 Ga. 204, 210, 58 S. E. 769.

[8] 8. The defendant in the court below requested the court to charge as follows: "The plaintiff Brown being a trespasser, as I have charged you, relative to him the engineer and fireman were not bound to anticipate his presence upon the track and be on the lookout for him, and the duty to exercise ordinary care did not arise until the presence of Brown and the horses became known to those upon the engine; and if you find from the evidence that the engineer, as soon as he saw the objects upon the track, exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the injury, then the plaintiffs would not be authorized to recover." The court gave the charge as requested, with the addition of the words, "otherwise they might be." We do not think the giving of the request to charge with the words added by the court was error as against the plaintiff in error. The words added by the court, "otherwise they might be," had merely the effect of referring the jury to the general instructions upon the entire case, and made the question of defendant's liability referable to his charge in its entirety, without restating all the rules and principles of law which the jury would consider in passing upon the question of plaintiff's right to recover. But if the finding in the case had been in favor of defendant, and the plaintiffs in the court below, the defendants in error here, were challenging this portion of the court's instructions, a very different question would be raised. Inasmuch as the defendant in error is not as a matter of fact criticising the court's charge (having prevailed in the trial below), we merely call the court's attention (as the case is to be remanded for a new trial) to his unqualified instructions that Brown was a trespasser on the tracks of the defendant company. A trespasser is a wrongdoer; and if Brown, without fault upon his part, was thrown upon the tracks of the railway company, could he be a trespasser in the proper and legal meaning of that term?

Judgment reversed in both cases. All the Justices concur.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 57*)—TRANSACTIONS INVALID—INSOLVENCY OF GRANTOR.

A bona fide sale of property, not made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, is not rendered invalid because the vendor may have been insolvent at the time.

Error from Superior Court, Effingham County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Claim by Mrs. B. G. Hadden to property levied on by N. McQueen as that of defendant. Judgment for plaintiff, and claimant brings error. Reversed.

H. B. Strange, of Statesboro, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Cohen, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This is a claim case. The claimant is the wife of the defendant. The property levied on is personality which the claimant contends she purchased from her husband at the time she purchased a tract of land from him. The claimant submitted evidence tending to show that at various times, beginning in 1905 and extending to 1907, her husband gave her certain money which she deposited in her own name in a named bank; that her husband bought at auctioneer's sale a certain tract of land and personality, and she lent him the money with which to pay for this land; that in 1908 he sold the land and personality to her in satisfaction of the debt; and that she paid for the same with the money which he had previously given her. The fl. fa. was issued on a judgment obtained in April, 1909.

The court instructed the jury: "That a conveyance made in payment of a bona fide debt, where the creditor [debtor?] or where the grantor in the conveyance is himself solvent at the time, if not made for the purpose to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors, or if the conveyance is in good faith, untainted with fraud, it is a valid paper. * * * If you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant in fl. fa. was owning the property and was solvent at the time, and he made a bona fide sale of it to his wife and received a consideration for it, that it would be a good transaction and a valid transaction. * * * If at the time the deed alleged to have been made, or the sale alleged to have been made, the title was in the defendant in fl. fa., and he was at the time solvent, and he sold this property to his wife for a valuable consideration, it would be, gentlemen, a valid sale." Exception is taken to these excerpts from the charge, on the ground that the court in his instruction to the jury made the validity of the sale depend on the solvency of the defendant in fl. fa. at the date the sale and conveyance were made.

A debtor, though insolvent, may prefer one creditor to another, and there is no inhibition of law against a bona fide sale of property by the owner thereof, though he may be solvent at the time of the sale. The tendency of the court's instruction was to impress the jury that the sale by the defendant in fi. fa. to his wife would be invalid unless he was solvent at the time. So far as the record discloses, there was no lien against the defendant's property at the time it is contended that he made the sale to his wife. If the sale was made to her bona fide, and with no intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, the sale would be upheld, notwithstanding he at the time may have been insolvent. As the case is to be tried over again, we express no opinion upon the evidence. The charge of the court was erroneous; and, as the evidence did not demand a verdict, a new trial will have to be granted.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BROWN v. COLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 163*)—RESTRAINING ORDER—DISSOLUTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The plaintiff sought to enjoin the defendant from prosecuting a distress warrant and also a warrant to dispossess him as a tenant holding over, on the ground that he was a purchaser of the land, and not a tenant, and was unable to give the statutory bond to prevent his dispossession as a tenant holding over. The defendant in his answer admitted that the plaintiff went into possession of the land as a purchaser, but averred that he had not paid any of the purchase money, and that subsequently he had attorned to the defendant, and that the rent was past due. On a motion to dissolve the restraining order, the court, after hearing evidence, passed an order dissolving the temporary restraining order, unless the plaintiff gave bond conditioned to pay the defendant the rent. If the plaintiff failed to give this bond, then, upon the defendant's giving bond conditioned to pay the plaintiff such damages as may be assessed on the final trial, the defendant was awarded possession of the land until the further order of the court, and the sheriff was directed to place him in possession. Held:

(1) There was no abuse of discretion in dissolving the temporary restraining order upon the plaintiff's failure to give bond. Zorn v. Murray, 127 Ga. 389, 56 S. E. 454.

2. INJUNCTION (§ 176*)—RESTRAINING ORDER—DISSOLUTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

(2) That, although it would be the duty of the sheriff to proceed to execute the dispossessionary warrant as provided by the statute upon the failure of the plaintiff to give the bond required by the order, it was error for the court to grant a mandatory order ejecting the plaintiff from the land, and putting the defendant in possession. Kerr v. Black, 137 Ga. 832, 74 S. E. 535. Accordingly, the judgment refusing an injunction is affirmed, with the direction that the order be modified by vacating that part of it directing that the defendant be put in possession of the land upon the terms indicated in the order.

ATTACHMENT (§ 287*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—RIGHTS OF CLAIMANT.

A. was indorser on a promissory note made by B., payable to C. The note matured, and C. demanded payment. B. had no money with which to pay the note, and agreed with A. that, if A. would pay it, he would turn over to A. a certain piano which was in his (B.'s) possession and to which he had title. A. paid the note, and B., in pursuance of his promise, turned the piano over to A. Subsequently one of B.'s creditors levied an attachment upon the piano as the property of B., and A. interposed a claim. Held that, in the absence of any evidence tending to show the existence of bad faith in the transaction between A. and B., a verdict for A. was demanded.

Action by John W. Clark against J. M. Wilson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Anderson, of Ringgold, Foust & Payne, of Chattanooga, Tenn., and Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, of Dalton, for plaintiff in error. Wm. E. Mann, of Dalton, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. John Clark sued out an attachment and had it levied upon a certain piano, which was claimed by Wilson. On the trial of the claim case, on appeal in the superior court, the jury returned a verdict finding the property subject to the attachment. The claimant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted. The evidence discloses that Wilson, the claimant, was security on a promissory note made by one J. P. Roberts and payable to J. C. Bell, or order for $167.45. The piano levied upon was the property of J. P. Roberts. After the note had matured, and before the levy, Bell, the holder of the note, demanded payment of Roberts and his surety. Roberts was unable to pay the note, and agreed with Wilson, his surety, that if he would pay this note he would turn over the piano to him as compensation. Wilson paid the note and took it up, and Roberts thereupon gave Wilson an order for the piano. Wilson sent a wagon to Ringgold to Roberts' home to get the piano, and while the piano was being moved from Roberts' house by Wilson's agent, sent for that purpose, it having been boxed by Wilson's agent and brought outside and placed on the porch of the house, the sheriff appeared with the attachment in favor of Clark and made his levy. These facts are undisputed. It thus appears that, not only had the title of the piano passed to Wilson for a valuable consideration, but the piano was actually in the possession of Wilson's agent before the levy of the attachment was made, and it would seem that this uncontradicted evidence would have demanded a finding in favor of the claimant.

The trial judge charged the jury to the effect that if Wilson paid the note for Roberts in good faith, and with no purpose to protect Roberts from his creditors, but "to protect himself and get the piano as a protection against having to pay the note, then it would be Wilson's property and not subject to the attachment," irrespective of whether there had been an actual delivery of the property to Wilson or not; but if, on the contrary, it was not done in good faith, but was done to protect Roberts against his creditors, the property would be subject, and it would also be subject if the purpose of Wilson in paying the note was to hinder and delay the creditors of Roberts. The latter part of this excerpt is excepted to on the ground that it was not authorized by the evidence. We think the objection is well founded. There is nothing in the evidence which indicates any scheme or combination on the part of Wilson and Roberts to defraud or delay the creditors of the latter. The suggestion, therefore, in this instruction, that the transaction between Wilson and Roberts might have been in bad faith and for the purpose of benefiting Roberts, raised an issue which was not in the case under the evidence, and probably prejudiced the jury against Wilson's claim. The view, however, which we take of the undisputed evidence, makes this question immaterial. The verdict was demanded for the claimant, and was returned for the plaintiff, and the claimant's motion for a new trial, for this reason, should have been granted.

Judgment reversed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Charles Dean against the Constitution Publishing Company. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice was affirmed on certiorari, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman and John K. MacDonald, Jr., all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. C. G. Battle and A. C. Corbett, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. For convenience and in order to expedite business the magistrate in the 1,026th district of Fulton county pursues a practice which may best be described by quoting from his answer, as follows: "That his regular and established court day is the fourth Monday in each month; that he has at every term of court numerous cases on his docket, so that it is impossible to dispose of all of them in one day; so that on said court day he calls the cases from the docket and renders judgment, where the suit is on an unconditional contract in writing, and no defense by plea or appearance is made, or where the suit is on account, with personal service on the defendant and no plea is filed or appearance made. All other cases are assigned for trial on a given day and hour. In order to do this, he has a calendar, and in this calendar each case is entered for the day and hour to which it is assigned for trial on the call. Cases are assigned for each successive week-day for some two or three weeks, as the number of cases require. In this way the continuity of the term is kept up. There is no intermission of a day from the call day to the day at which the last case is assigned for trial, except Sundays. The foregoing was followed at November term, 1911. As the cases are reached on the calendar, he hears them and orally announces the judgment he renders, and makes a notation of it on the calendar. In the case of a judgment for the full sum sued for in favor of the plaintiff, the entry on the calendar is the single word, 'Judgment,' entered after or below the name of the case. In case the judgment is against the garnishee for failure to answer the summons of garnishment, the words written on the calendar are 'Judgment by default.'"

Summons of garnishment was served on the Constitution Publishing Company, returnable to the November term, 1911, of the justice's court. The garnishee, having mistaken the date for December, failed to answer. When the November term of the court arrived, the case against the main defendant and also against the garnishee was set down for December 9, 1911. On that day the justice first called the case against the principal defendant from the calendar upon which the case had been entered, and orally announced judgment in favor of the plaintiff, making a notation of the judgment on the calendar. He then called the case against the garnishee, and, no answer having been filed, entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff by default, after announcing it, and made a notation of this judgment on the calendar. On December 11th, the magistrate entered both judgments upon the docket. On December 12th the garnishee tendered to the justice an answer, and asked that the answer be filed and the garnishment case be set down for trial. The justice declined to permit the answer to be filed, and declined to reopen the case, and this is complained of in the petition for certiorari, which was overruled by the judge of the superior court. The contention of the garnishee is that the judgment entered against it on December 11th was void, for the reason that the justice had no authority to orally announce his judgment, noting the same on the calendar, and then enter the judgment at a later date on his docket; that, no legal judgment having been entered against the garnishee on December 8th, the case stood over for trial at the next term of the court, since in the justice's court all continuances must be for the term, and that when the answer of the garnishee was tendered on December 12th there had never been a valid judgment against the principal defendant or against the garnishee.

This point is settled adversely to the contention of the garnishee by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Ryals v. McArthur, 92 Ga. 373, 17 S. E. 350: "A judgment rendered by a justice of the peace at the regular time and place of holding his court, but which was written out and signed at some other time and place in the district, is not void. The word 'rendered,' as used in section 462 of the Code of 1882 [Civ. Code 1910, § 4705], refers to the making up and announcement of the judgment, and not to the clerical act of reducing it to writing." That decision was cited approvingly in Scott v. Bedell, 108 Ga. 205, 209, 33 S. E. 903, and again in Hargrove v. Turner, 108 Ga. 580, 583, 34 S. E. 1. See, also, Brown v. Bonds, 125 Ga. 833, 54 S. E. 933. It is true that this court, in N. C. & St. L. Ry. v. Brown, 3 Ga. App. 561, 60 S. E. 319, questioned the soundness of the decision in the Ryals Case, supra; but that decision is alike binding upon this court and the Supreme Court until reviewed and overruled in the manner prescribed by law. In our opinion it absolutely settles the question involved in the present case.

There is no merit in the contention that the garnishee should have been allowed to file the answer, because it mistook the term to which the summons was made returnable. The original summons is not before us, so that we can ascertain whether the summons is legible or not; and if the garnishee was in doubt as to the term to which it was required to make answer, it should have applied to the court for information.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eva, Judge.

Action by John Y. Sutton against the Farmers' Union Warehouse Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. E. Dinmore, of Atlanta, and R. D. Smith, of Tifton, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Hawkins, of Valdosta, and J. S. Ridgill, of Tifton, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. John Y. Sutton brought suit against the Farmers' Union Warehouse Company, a corporation, on an open account for money which he had paid out for the use of the corporation. By consent the case was tried by the judge, without the intervention of a jury, and he found in favor of the plaintiff the sum of $37.50. The plaintiff excepts to this finding.

The facts in the case, substantially stated, are as follows: The Farmers' Union Warehouse Company, through its board of directors, elected John Y. Sutton as the general manager of the company, with authority to take charge of its affairs and conduct its business. He found the corporation somewhat involved, and used from time to time his private funds in payment of its valid existing obligations. These payments were made by him with the knowledge and acquiescence of a majority of the officers and directors of the corporation. His suit was brought to recover the payments so made by him for the use and benefit of the corporation. It was agreed that, as an accounting was necessary to determine the amount actually due by the corporation, an expert accountant should be employed for the purpose of determining the exact amount, and that this accountant should act with the judge in the trial of the case and report his findings to the judge, but that the ultimate liability of the corporation, under the law, should be left to the determination of the judge. The accountant reported that the balance due the plaintiff was $594. Included in this balance was the price of a typewriter which belonged to the plaintiff, and this amount was allowed by the judge in favor of the plaintiff; but he disallowed the balance of the account, on the ground that the payments made by the plaintiff while acting as the agent and general manager of the company were mere voluntary payments, and wholly unauthorized by the corporation.

The amount of the balance is not disputed; nor is it denied that the payments were made by the plaintiff for and in behalf of the corporation, in settlement of valid existing indebtedness, and that the corporation, as a matter of fact, received and enjoyed the benefit of the payments. It is also not denied that the management of the affairs of the corporation was left by the board of directors entirely to the general manager, with authority to use his own judgment in its management, and that his conduct in the affairs of the corporation had been very beneficial. The evidence showed that he paid the debts of the corporation and, in fact, transacted its entire business; the directors giving very little, if any, attention to its management. Some of the directors testified that they knew of the payment of these debts of the corporation by the general manager, and that the payments were made, not only with their acquiescence, but with their approval. Other directors testified that they had no knowledge of the payment of these debts, and, so far as they knew, the general manager had no authority from the board of directors to pay them. It is not contended that these debts paid by the plaintiff were contracted ultra vires, or that they did not constitute valid existing obligations of the corporation. The sole contention is that the plaintiff, as the general manager and agent of the corporation, voluntarily paid these debts for the benefit of the corporation, without the authority of the directors. The evidence is clear that the corporation received, not only the services of the plaintiff, but also received his money, with the knowledge and approval of the majority of the directors.

If a corporation accepts the services of another, and actually receives and uses money advanced by him for its benefit, with the knowledge of its directors, it would be unjust to permit the corporation, under these facts, to resist the repayment of the money, on the ground that it was paid voluntarily and without authority. Wood Mining Co. v. King, 45 Ga. 42. A merchant, whose agent purchases goods on a credit, although the credit was unauthorized, cannot refuse to pay when he has received and sold the goods, especially where he has paid other bills made by the same agent. McDowell v. McKenzie, 65 Ga. 630. And it is well settled that an unauthorized contract, made by an assumed agent or real agent in excess of his authority, becomes binding upon his principal, if the latter accepts the benefit of the contract. Such acceptance amounts to a ratification. Haney School Furniture Co. v. Hightower, 113 Ga. 289, 38 S. E. 761, and citations. Here the evidence largely preponderates in favor of the contention that the plaintiff, as general manager, had express authority from the board of directors to advance the money to pay the debts of the corporation. Whether this is true or not, it is undisputed that he did pay these valid debts, and that the corporation got the benefit of his money. We think, therefore, that the learned trial judge erred in finding that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the undisputed amount which he had paid out for the use of the corporation, and of which the corporation had received the full benefit. The question of whether he had express authority to pay the debts is not material, in view of the evidence that he was put in charge of the business of the corporation and intrusted with its entire management by the board of directors, and that these debts were paid by him for the use and benefit of the corporation, and accepted by it. Authority to pay these debts was implied; but whether it was or not, the actual payment of valid debts against the corporation, and the use by the corporation of the plaintiff's money, entitled him to recover it back.

Judgment reversed.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 756*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—RECITALS OF EVIDENCE.

There is no merit in the assignment of error based upon the excerpt from the charge of the court; nor is the exception that the court erred by intimating an opinion as to what had been proved sustained by the record. It is permissible for the trial judge to state his recollection of what has been testified, when, in doing this, he does not intimate any opinion as to the weight which the jury should attach to the testimony, or that any statements which have been made are true.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 371*)—EVIDENCE—SIMILAR OFFENSES.

There was no error in the ruling upon the admissibility of the testimony to which objection was made. As to this point, the decision is controlled by the ruling of the Supreme Court in Farmer v. State, 100 Ga. 41, 28 S. E. 26. An intent to defraud is not a presumption of law, but a matter of fact for the jury. "A single act or representation, in many cases, would not be decisive, especially where the accused has sustained a previous good character. But when it is shown that he made similar representations, about the same time, to other persons, and by means of such representations obtained goods, all of which were false, the presumption is greatly strengthened that he intended to defraud." *Trogdon v. Mozley & Moss, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error. Hugh M. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., and E. A. Stephens, both of Atlanta, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Judgment affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Upon the original investigation of the record and the briefs in this case, the point raised by the demurrer was maturely considered, and, in the opinion of the court, the demurrer was properly overruled; but, by inadvertence, the point was not dealt with in the decision.

In our opinion, the rulings in Townsend v. State, 92 Ga. 732, 19 S. E. 55, and Brazil v. State, 117 Ga. 32, 43 S. E. 460, have no application whatever to the question presented by the case at bar. In the Brazil Case, the indictment (which contained two counts, one charging forgery and the other that the accused did "falsely and fraudulently pass, pay, and tender in payment" the paper alleged to have been forged by him) was held to be sufficient; and the statement that "our penal laws fail to provide a punishment for uttering a bank check drawn in a fictitious name" is clearly obiter dictum, because that specific point was not before the court for decision. In the Townsend Case, Judge Simmons was dealing with an indictment based upon the second division of section 4453 of the Code of 1882 (now section 247 of the Penal Code of 1910), and the controlling question before the Supreme Court was whether a check upon a bank is a bill of exchange, within the meaning of that section; and the judgment was reversed solely because the court was of the opinion that a check is not a bill of exchange, within the purview of our criminal statutes. The indictment in the Townsend Case charged the defendant with making a bill of exchange in a fictitious name, and set out a check upon the Merchants' National Bank of Rome. In concluding the opinion, and showing that evidently the case was decided upon that point alone, the court held that, "the paper in question here being an ordinary bank check, it follows that the conviction under section 4453 was improper, and the court below erred in overruling the motion for a new trial." It is clearly to be seen that the trial court in the case at bar properly held that the indictment in the present case was brought under the provisions of section 249 of the Penal Code of 1910; and therefore the question presented to us, instead of being, as in the Townsend Case, whether a check is a bill of exchange, is whether or not a check can properly be construed to be a "writing," under the terms of the above-stated section.

[5] We are of the opinion that, although criminal statutes are to be strictly construed, the broad generic term "writing" can aptly include the more specific term "check," and, therefore, that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer. It was properly held in the Townsend Case, supra, that in prosecutions under section 4453 of the Code of 1882 (now section 247 of the Penal Code of 1910) a distinction exists between the term "bill of exchange" and "check," for the reasons pointed out in the opinion. The accused in the case now before us, however, was not indicted under section 247 of the Penal Code, but is charged under the provisions and in the terms of section 249 with obtaining money by means of a false writing made in a fictitious name. It is true the paper set out is what is ordinarily called a "check"; it may be said to be a check, but it is none the less a "writing," and section 249 is intended to cover any case of obtaining goods or money on a false writing.

Section 247 is directed against the man who draws or makes the papers dealt with, or indorses or accepts them. Section 249 denounces the obtaining of goods or money, though the accused may not have written the writing which is used to defraud another. Section 247 refers only to cases in which a fictitious name is used. Section 249 punishes one who employs a false or forged writing, issued in the name of a real person, as well as him who employs a false writing made in a fictitious name. An essential element in the offense penalized by section 249 is the obtaining of goods or money, or both; one may violate section 247 without obtaining anything of value.

Robt. L. Berner, of Macon, for plaintiff in error. L. D. Moore, of Macon, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. An action was brought in the city court of Jeffersonville to recover for certain services alleged to have been performed by the plaintiff in hauling wood and fertilizer, and services of a like nature, and for the breach of a contract alleged to have been made by the defendant with the plaintiff to remove a certain quantity of clay at an agreed price per ton, and also for the value of a certain number of bushels of corn, which the plaintiff alleged the defendant, over the objection of the plaintiff, had removed from the land which the plaintiff had cultivated and appropriated to his own use. The defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction, alleging that the city court of Atlanta and the superior court of Fulton county were the only courts which had jurisdiction of the action. The case was tried upon this special plea, and a verdict directed against the plea. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and error is assigned upon this ruling.

The defendant is a mining corporation, engaged in the business of mining clay in Twiggs county, Ga. It operates under a charter granted by the superior court of Fulton county, which fixes its principal office or place of business in the county of Fulton, and confers upon the corporation the power to open branch offices within and without the state. The defendant maintains and operates a plant for the mining of clay in Twiggs county. A superintendent resides at the plant and is in charge of its operations. There is a room at the plant for the use of the superintendent, with a table and a chair in it, and he does his writing in that room. He employs and pays off the laborers, and makes out a pay roll of the daily wages and sends it to the president of the company, or draws a draft on him, and in this way obtains the money to pay the hands. He does not keep any books, but keeps only a daily report, which he sends to the president of the company. He keeps a record of the clay that is shipped out, and to whom it is shipped, a record of the coal that is shipped to the plant, and also a record of any other goods bought for the plant. He makes reports of these matters as often as they are called for. All contracts for the sale of clay are made in Atlanta, and remittances for such sales are sent there. All of the financial part of the company's business is carried on in Atlanta. The duties of the superintendent are generally to employ and discharge laborers, and overlook and supervise the operation of the business at the mine. There is no desk or safe in the room where the superintendent transacts his business. The superintendent does not remain in any particular place all of the time, but moves around and about the plant, superintending its operations.

The question for decision is whether under this state of facts, the verdict was properly directed against the plea to the jurisdiction. The correct determination of this question depends upon the construction of the act of October 16, 1885, entitled "An act to define where corporations, mining, or joint-stock companies may be sued, and to define how service of the suit may be effected." Acts 1884-85, p. 99. This statute is embodied in Civil Code 1910, § 2259, and is in the following language: "Any corporation, mining, or joint-stock company, chartered by authority of this state, may be sued on contracts in that county in which the contract sought to be enforced was made or is to be performed, if it has an office and transacts business there. Suits for damages, because of torts, wrong or injury done, may be brought in the county where the cause of action originated. Service of such suits may be effected by leaving a copy of the writ with the agent of the defendant, or if there be no agent in the county, then at the agency or place of business." Under the Constitution of this state a defendant can be sued only in the county in which it resides. Generally a domestic corporation resides where its principal office or place of business is located by its charter. But it is well settled that a corporation may have as many superadded statutory residences for special purposes, such as for purposes of suit, as the Legislature may see fit to prescribe. Watson v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 91 Ga. 222, 18 S. E. 306; See, also Etowah Milling Co. v. Crenshaw, 116 Ga. 406, 42 S. E. 709. Under the statutes of this state all actions ex contractu against a corporation must be brought in the county where its principal office is located, unless the contract was made or was to be performed in a county where the corporation has an office and transacts business, in which event the suit may be brought either in the county where the principal office is located, or in the county where the contract was made or was to be performed. Tuggle v. Enterprise Lumber Co., 123 Ga. 480, 51 S. E. 433.

We think it is clear that the evidence in the present record demanded a finding that the defendant had an office in Twiggs county and transacted business there, within the meaning of Civil Code, § 2259. The word "office" has been defined as "a place where business is transacted." English's Law Dictionary, 584. Webster defines it to be "the place where a particular kind of business or service for others is transacted." See, also, 6 Words and Phrases, p. 4920. The contention of the plaintiff in error that, when the principal office of a corporation is by its charter located in a given county, the suit must be brought there, cannot be sustained, in view of the provisions of section 2259 of the Civil Code. The suit may be brought in the county where the principal office is located; but it may also be brought in any other county where the defendant has an office and transacts business, upon any contract made or to be performed in the latter county. The word "office" is synonymous with the words "place of business," and the evident intention of the General Assembly was that whenever a contract was made with a corporation, or was to be performed, in any county where the corporation was transacting its business, suit to enforce the contract might be brought in that county.

In the present case it appears that the only plant which the defendant has is located in Twiggs county, that all of its mining operations are conducted there, that it maintains at this plant a superintendent and a large force of laborers, all under the control and management of the superintendent, and that the superintendent transacts for the corporation all of the business incident to the operation of its plant. Fulton county may be the location of the office of the company, that is to say, the principal office of the company, where its directors meet, and where its financial operations are conducted; but it certainly cannot be said that the corporation has not an office and a place of business in Twiggs county, where its mining operations are carried on. The mere fact that the corporation does not maintain an office in Twiggs county, with a desk and an iron safe and other articles usually found in an office of that character, is immaterial. Indeed, we are not prepared to say that it would be necessary to have even a room in a house occupied by an agent of the corporation. If a corporation has a place where its business is being carried on, and has an agent in charge of it, performing such acts as are necessary in carrying on its business, it has an office and a place of business, within the meaning of the statute.

There is nothing in the decision in Dade Coal Co. v. Haslett, 83 Ga. 549, 10 S. E. 435, in conflict with the views herein expressed. In that case it appeared that the principal office of the corporation was not fixed by its charter, nor was the company located in any particular county of the state. It selected Fulton county, and located its principal place of business there, for the purpose of electing its officers and conducting its financial operations. An action was brought against the corporation in the city court of Atlanta, to recover damages alleged to have been inflicted upon the plaintiff. The defendant set up, in a special plea to the jurisdiction, that all of its operations were located in Dade county, and all of its books relating to the shipment of the products of this company were kept in that county, in the office located therein; that all of its mining operations were carried on in Dade county, and that it maintained an office in Atlanta for the purpose of electing its officers and for the purpose of conducting its financial operations. The effect of the decision of the Supreme Court was that the city court of Atlanta had jurisdiction of the action. The court did not hold that the proper court in Dade county would not also have had jurisdiction. The corporation in that case really occupied the same position, under this decision of the Supreme Court, as if its charter had located its principal office in the county of Fulton. The suit might have been brought in Fulton county or in Dade county. And so we hold, in this case, that while the suit might have been brought against the defendant in Fulton county, it was likewise maintainable in Twiggs county. The purpose of the act of 1885 was not to curtail, but to enlarge, the venue of suits against domestic corporations. There was no error in directing a verdict against the plea to the jurisdiction. Judgment affirmed.

HORKAN v. BEASLEY. (No. 3,727.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. STATUTES (§ 227*) — CONSTRUCTION—TIME OF DOING ACT.

Where a statute directs the doing of a thing in a certain time, without any negative words restraining the doing of it afterwards, generally the provision as to time is directory, and not a limitation of authority; and in such case, where no injury appears to have resulted, the fact that the act was performed after the time limited will not render it invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 808, 809; Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

2. COURTS (§ 66*) — TERM OF COURT—ADJOURNMENT.

Section 4877 of the Civil Code of 1910, which declares that "it shall be the duty of the judges of the superior and city courts to adjourn the regular and adjourned terms of said courts at least five days before the commencement of the next regular terms of said courts," is directory to the judges, and was not intended to take away from the presiding judge the inherent authority to control the continuance of a term of the court to meet the exigencies of the public business. An order or judgment rendered during a regular or adjourned term, and within less than five days from the commencement of the next regular term, is not for that reason invalid.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; J. D. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by G. A. Horkan against A. W. Beasley. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order vacating the same, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Edwin L. Bryan, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error. Jas. Humphreys, of Moultrie, and G. C. Edmondson, of Quitman, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit on a promissory note, brought to the February term, 1911, of the city court of Moultrie, to which the defendant sought to set off an open account. The case was called for trial on June 13, 1911, which was at the May adjourned term of the court, when the plaintiff moved to strike the answer upon the ground that an open account could not be set off against an unconditional contract under seal. The court granted an order striking the answer, and thereupon allowed plaintiff to take judgment for the amount of the note. Subsequently, on August 10th, just four days prior to the convening of the regular August term of 1911, the presiding judge, without any formal application, granted an order vacating the judgment rendered on June 13, 1911, and reinstating the defendant's answer, and on August 24th thereafter by letter advised the plaintiff's attorney of the grant of this order. Immediately upon receipt of this letter, the plaintiff, through his attorney, filed a written motion, asking that the order vacating the judgment be itself vacated and declared void, upon the ground that the judge had no jurisdiction to render it, as the term of court at which the original judgment was granted had ended. This motion the court overruled, and to the order vacating the judgment the plaintiff excepted, upon the ground that, after adjournment by operation of law of the term of the court at which the judgment was rendered, the court had no power or authority to vacate, change, or in any way modify the same; said judgment being no longer in the breast of the court, and the court no longer having any power or authority to control it. The order vacating the judgment was as follows: "G. A. Horkan v. A. W. Beasley. Suit on note in the city court of Moultrie. June adjourned term, 1911. The above-stated case having been called in its regular order, and there having been filed a set-off in said case, and upon motion of plaintiff's counsel to strike the set-off, on the ground that a set-off could not be filed to a suit on a note, the set-off being an account, and, before allowing the order, stating to attorney for both sides that, in case the court should find any authority allowing the said set-off, the said case was to be reinstated, and the judgment taken to be set aside, and it appearing to the court, upon authority presented, and while the court is still in session, that the same was error, it is hereby ordered that the judgment taken in said case stand upon docket as it was originally, ready for trial at the next term of the court as though no judgment had ever been taken. This the 10th day of August, 1911. J. D. McKenzie, Judge of the City Court of Moultrie."

[1] The order striking the defendant's answer is based solely upon the ground that the defendant was undertaking to set off an open account against a suit on an unconditional contract under seal. The order is not conditional, and not dependent upon any change of mind which might subsequently be caused by the presentation of authority, and the judgment rendered on the note is in the usual form. The statement of the presiding judge, thereafter incorporated in his order of August 10, 1911, vacating his judgment and reinstating the plea, cannot be accepted as in any manner qualifying the original order striking the defendant's plea and entering up final judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The statement made in the order of August 10, 1911, that "the court is still in session," it is insisted, should have no force and effect, in view of section 4877 of the Civil Code of 1910, which declares: "It shall be the duty of the judges of the superior and city courts to adjourn the regular and adjourned terms of said courts at least five days before the commencement of the next regular terms of said courts." The proviso to this section contained in the amendatory act of 1896 (Acts 1896, p. 49), making it inapplicable to any superior or city courts having as many as six terms per year, is not pertinent, as the city court of Moultrie is not within the class of courts covered by the proviso. The regular August term of the city court of Moultrie convened on August 14, 1911, and the order of the presiding judge, vacating his original judgment, was dated August 10, 1911, four days before the beginning of the August term of the city court of Moultrie. The plaintiff in error insists that under the section of the Code above quoted the June adjourned term of the city court of Moultrie adjourned automatically five days before August 14, 1911, and, therefore, that when the order of August 10th was passed the June adjourned term was at an end, and he had no authority to pass that order. It is well settled that after the expiration of the term at which a judgment is rendered it is out of the power of the court to amend it in any matter of substance, or in any matter affecting the merits. During the term, the record is said to be in the breast of the judge; after it is over, it is upon the roll. The power to amend nunc pro tunc is not revisory in its nature, and is not intended to correct judicial errors. Hence the express judgment of the court, however erroneous, cannot be corrected at a subsequent term. McCandless v. Conley, 115 Ga. 51, 41 S. E. 256; Watkins v. Brizendine, 111

Ga. 458, 36 S. E. 807; Dyson v. Southern Railway Co., 113 Ga. 327, 38 S. E. 749.

[2] The question raised involves the construction of section 4877 of the Civil Code, supra. Is this section mandatory or directory? If mandatory, the June adjourned term of the court was at an end, and the order of the judge vacating his previous judgment was non coram judge. If the statute is simply directory, then the order vacating the judgment was valid. The language of the statute is that "it shall be the duty of the judges of the superior and city courts," etc.; but the use of the word "shall," in a statute, does not always make the statute mandatory. The word may be construed to be directory wherever the public interest or right is concerned. Courts have inherent power to control the times of adjournment, or to extend the terms as the business of the court may require, and this power should not be restricted, unless it is clear that it was the legislative intent to do so. And where it might injuriously affect the public interest to construe the terms of a statute as imperative, such construction will not be adopted, if it can be avoided. Suppose the superior court or the city court were actually engaged in the trial of an important case, which was not completed five days previous to the beginning of the next term; would it not seriously affect the public interest for the court to discontinue its term and render the trial nugatory? Or suppose the case on trial was of a criminal character, and not only the public interest, but the interest of the individual, demanded a speedy termination of the trial; was it intended by the Legislature that the term of the court should, regardless of the public interest or individual rights, automatically terminate five days previous to the beginning of the next term of the court? The language of the statute is: "It shall be the duty of the judges," etc. Suppose the judge should disregard this duty, and continue the term to within a less number of days from the beginning of the next term, because the business of the court demands it; would his action be illegal, and the judgments entered after the five days be nullities? We think not. The statutes of this state fix the time for the courts to be held and the terms to begin, and no court is held unless a judge is present to hold it, and the holding of the session of the court is postponed until the judge arrives and begins a session. Perdue v. State, 134 Ga. 305, 67 S. E. 810. In the Perdue Case the law provided that Pike superior court should be held on the first Monday in every October, and that Henry superior court, which is in the same circuit and presided over by the same judge, should be held on the third Monday in every October, and the trial of that case, which was a murder case, was pending in Pike superior court at its October term, beyond the time when, under the law, Henry superior court should have convened, and the presiding judge continued the session of Pike superior court in order to complete the trial of the case. It was held by the Supreme Court that the two courts were not in session at the same time, and that the holding of Pike superior court on the third Monday in October was not illegal. While that decision is not exactly in point, it illustrates the power of the presiding judge to continue a session of the court until the trial of a pending case is concluded.

The purpose of the act codified in the section cited supra is simply the public convenience, and especially the convenience of the officers of the court in completing the minutes of the pending term and preparing for the business of the ensuing term, and where a statute requires an official act to be done by a given time for public purposes, it is generally construed as merely directory. In re Heath, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 42. It has been held that the most satisfactory and conclusive test of the question whether the provisions of a statute are mandatory or directory is whether the prescribed mode of action is of the essence of the thing to be accomplished; in other words, whether it relates to matters material or immaterial, to matters of convenience or of substance. Gallup v. Smith, 59 Conn. 354, 22 Atl. 334, 12 L. R. A. 353. And the Code section now under consideration, it seems to us, does not affect the substance of judicial action, but merely refers to matters of convenience, both as to the officers of the court and to those who may have business in the court. It is held that statutes fixing the time for the doing of an act are considered generally as only directory, where the time is not fixed for the purpose of giving a party a hearing or for some other important purpose; and where the statute directs the doing of a thing in a certain time, without any negative words restraining the doing of it afterwards, the provision as to time is generally directory, and not a limitation of authority; and in such case, where no injury appears to have resulted, the fact that the act was performed after the time limited will not of itself render it invalid. See Gallup v. Smith, supra, and authorities cited in the notes.

It cannot be said that a judgment rendered by a superior or city court in a case where such court has jurisdiction is invalid because the judgment was rendered within less than five days from the time when the next term of the court should commence. We think it very clear that the statute which is embodied in the Code section now under consideration is merely directory, and must be construed in connection with the inherent power of the court to control its terms as the exigencies of the pending business require, and the fact that the June adjourned term of the city court of Moultrie was not finally adjourned by the presiding judge until four days before the beginning of the next term of the court, and the judgment complained of was rendered less than five days before, while still in that term, did not render the judgment invalid. Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by R. B. Young against the Peninsular Naval Stores Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Branch & Snow, of Quitman, for plaintiff in error. Denmark & Griffin, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This case is here on exceptions to the judgment sustaining a general demurrer and dismissing the petition.

The facts alleged in the petition are as follows: Plaintiff had been engaged in the naval stores business, and the defendant had acted as his factor. In the course of his business he had been accustomed to ship naval stores to the defendants, who would sell them for him, and, after paying expenses and deducting commissions, would hold the remainder subject to the plaintiff's draft. Plaintiff sold to Frank L. Gibson his turpentine property, and entered into a contract with Gibson, by which the latter was to pay, as a part of the consideration for the property, plaintiff's note for $3,000, held by defendant, which was not due until May 1, 1910. When the sale was made, plaintiff had on deposit to his credit with defendant, on open account, $450.42, which was subject to plaintiff's draft at any time. On January 31st, three months before this note fell due and while the money due the plaintiff was still deposited with the defendant, Gibson went to the office of the defendant in Jacksonville for the purpose of complying with his contract and paying the note. It is expressly alleged that Gibson was at that time ready, willing, and able to pay the note, and offered to do so. The defendant declined to accept the $3,000 in payment of the note from Gibson, but did accept from Gibson for the note an amount less than its face, and charged the balance due on the note to the open account. The allegation is also specifically made that Gibson at the time of the institution of the present suit was insolvent, and is still insolvent. On demand the defendant refused to pay the $450.42 to the plaintiff, and the suit is to recover that amount.

In our opinion the application by the defendant, the Peninsular Naval Stores Company, of the amount due the plaintiff, which it held subject to his draft, in part payment of the note which it held against him and which was not due, was unauthorized, especially in view of the fact that Gibson offered to pay to the defendant the whole amount of the note in accordance with his agreement with the plaintiff. The defendant, without making any investigation as to Gibson's authority to pay less than the full amount of the note, refused to accept Gibson's tender of the full amount, and accepted from him a less amount. The allegations of the petition are that Gibson was ready, able, and willing to pay the note in full, and offered to do so, and that the defendant declined to accept the cash; and these allegations are admitted by the demurrer to be true. In other words, it must be accepted as a fact that the defendant deliberately refused to accept the full amount of the note which Gibson offered to pay, and which, under Gibson's contract with the plaintiff, he was bound to pay to the defendant; and the defendant, by investigation or inquiry, could have found that Gibson was not authorized to pay less than the full amount, and was not authorized to receive from the defendant any credit by open account in part discharge of the note. The legal and actual effect was that Gibson paid to the defendant $450.42 which belonged to the plaintiff, and which was subject to the plaintiff's draft, without making any inquiry as to his right or authority to accept this credit on the note, and without endeavoring to find out whether the credit on this open account was a proper payment on the note. Of course, the plaintiff was under no duty to put the defendant on notice of his contract with Gibson, for he was under no duty to pay the note until its maturity on May 1st.

The defendant could properly have refused to accept payment on the note when Gibson offered payment upon the ground that the note was not then due; but, if it accepted payment, it was under a duty to accept the payment as tendered, and it had no right to charge against the plaintiff the $450.42 due him and subject to his draft, as part payment of the note, which was not due until three months thereafter. The general rule is that a creditor cannot apply a deposit to an indebtedness that has not matured. 5 Cyc. 553. Of course, this general rule is subject to the exception where the debtor or owner of the deposit is insolvent. This unwarranted application of the deposit to the plaintiff's unmatured note left Gibson indebted to the plaintiff, under his contract, in the sum of $450.42, and this sum cannot be collected by the plaintiff out of Gibson, for the reason, as alleged, that Gibson is insolvent. Now, if the defendant had accepted the tender of Gibson, the only tender that he was authorized to make or that the defendant was authorized to accept, to wit, payment of the full amount of the note in cash, the defendant would still have held on deposit the $450.42 belonging to the plaintiff and which was subject to his draft. It was the unauthorized appropriation of this deposit by the defendant on the note, instead of accepting the cash from Gibson, that has resulted in loss to the plaintiff. Now, who should lose this money, the plaintiff or the defendant? Even conceding to the defendant good faith and good motive in making the application of the deposit to the note as part payment, and in refusing to accept the full amount tendered, we must also concede that the plaintiff cannot be charged with any lack of good faith in offering to pay in cash his note which was not matured. It was the refusal of the defendant to accept the cash from Gibson that put it in the power of Gibson to commit a legal wrong upon the plaintiff by refusing to pay the balance of his note which he owed to the plaintiff, or (which is the same thing) put it out of the power of Gibson, by reason of Gibson's subsequent insolvency, to pay this balance to the plaintiff. The loss is not due to any act of the plaintiff, but is solely due to the unauthorized act of the defendant, which makes applicable the familiar doctrine that, "when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third person, he who put it in the power of the third person to inflict the injury must bear the loss." Civil Code 1910, § 4537. Did not the defendant put it in Gibson's power to commit a legal wrong upon the plaintiff; that is, by a refusal or inability to pay the balance which Gibson owed to plaintiff under the contract? We think so, because the allegations of the petition are distinct that Gibson was ready, able, and willing to pay the full amount of the note, and offered to pay the same to the defendant, who declined to accept it, and the allegation is also made that Gibson, at the time when the present suit was instituted, was insolvent, and is still insolvent. We think that justice and equity require that the defendant should be held responsible for this loss. The loss was due alone to the defendant's refusal to accept the cash from Gibson, and the unauthorized credit of plaintiff's deposit on the note.

The position here stated becomes more clearly manifest upon an examination of the copy of the contract between Gibson and the plaintiff, which is attached to the petition. It appears from this contract that the plaintiff's turpentine farm and still were sold by him to Gibson subject to a mortgage which the plaintiff had made to the defendant to secure this very note for $3,000 which Gibson was to pay, and Gibson's contract was to assume the payment of this note. Gibson's title to this place was subject to the lien of the mortgage, and he could not dispose of the place until the mortgage was paid in full. Now, when the defendant surrendered to Gibson the plaintiff's note, marked "paid," this was in legal effect a satisfaction of this mortgage, and took it out of the power of the plaintiff to compel Gibson to comply with his contract; for Gibson could then sell the place free from the mortgage. As a result of this negligent conduct and unauthorized act on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff has been deprived of his leverage, in the form of this mortgage, to force Gibson to pay the note, or to pay the $450.42 which he unquestionably owes to plaintiff on his contract, and he has sold this place and has become insolvent.

We conclude that under the allegations of the petition a cause of action was set up, and the judge erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto.

Judgment reversed.

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 44*)—CONTRACT—RIGHT TO RESCIND.

Where, in an entire contract, an agency to sell certain articles manufactured by one of the parties is created for a specified territory, and in furtherance of such agency an order is given by the agent for the delivery at a future date of a certain number of the articles, for the purpose of being resold by the agent, a stipulation in the contract that the agent shall have the right to cancel the contract at any time, upon notice to his principal, relates both to the creation of the agency and to the order for the articles described in the contract.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; A. M. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by the White Company against the American Motor Car Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

Walter C. Hendrix and Mayson & Johnson, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman and John K. MacDonald, Jr., all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The White Company, a non-resident corporation, sued the American Motor Car Company upon an open account. The defendant admitted the correctness of the account, except as to an item of $75, charged for the services of an automobile salesman whom the plaintiff had sent to the defendant at the latter's request. The defendant also in its answer claimed a set-off in the sum of $400; it being alleged that the plaintiff had been paid this sum by the defendant, and had not accounted for it in the account sued on. The case was submitted to a jury, and a verdict was returned in favor of the defendant, finding against the item of $75 charged in the account sued on, and in favor of the defendant's claim of $400. The plaintiff's motion for new trial was overruled.

[1] 1. The case turns mainly upon the construction of a written contract between the parties. The plaintiff was a manufacturer of automobiles, and the defendant was engaged in the business of selling automobiles at retail. The contract was, in substance, as follows: Plaintiff agreed to sell defendant five automobiles at a specified price. Defendant ordered these five cars to be shipped upon specified dates in the future, covering a period of about nine months. Defendant paid the plaintiff $500, receipt of which was acknowledged by the plaintiff, "the same being a deposit of $100 on each of the automobiles ordered above; the balance due on each car shipped to be paid by sight draft attached to bill of lading. All money deposited hereunder at any time shall be and become the property of the first party, as liquidated damages, if second party fails to take any of the automobiles as ordered." Defendant was to have the exclusive sale in Fulton county, Ga., of the automobiles manufactured by the plaintiff. Defendant agreed to order, accept, and pay for the automobiles, upon the terms and conditions specified in the contract, and to sell no machines except in the territory mentioned in the contract, or at a less price than the retail catalogue price, to have on hand at all times one or more demonstrating cars, to report on or before the 10th of each month, the number of each automobile sold during the previous month, with the name and address of each purchaser, and not to contract for the sale of any other cars without obtaining the consent of the plaintiff and certain other automobile manufacturers. It was mutually agreed that the contract was to be subject to strikes, fire, delay, or other causes beyond the control of the plaintiff; that the plaintiff should have the right to reject any order for goods made by the defendant, as it might deem fit; that, if the defendant should sell cars in territory other than in Fulton county, plaintiff had the right to charge defendant the full retail price received by the defendant. The contract contained the further stipulation: "This agreement to take effect from and after its acceptance by said first party, which acceptance is evidenced only by the signature of an officer or branch office manager, acting within his authority, of the said first party hereunto, and the same is to continue in force until September 1, 1908; but it may be dissolved by either party giving notice, and in case of violation of this contract by said second party the first party may cancel it without notice. This contract supersedes all contracts of prior dates."

The contract was regularly accepted by the plaintiff, and one of the cars shipped out, accepted, and paid for by the defendant. A second car was also shipped, but while en route to Atlanta the defendant notified the plaintiff in writing that it desired to dissolve and cancel the contract. In response to this notice the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, acknowledging receipt of the notice of dissolution, and stating that, while the notice was received too late to stop the second car, which had been shipped, as soon as freight charges were ascertained the plaintiff would bill defendant for the charges. There is no issue in the case as to this second car. It is inferable, from the testimony, that this matter was satisfactorily adjusted between the parties. The plaintiff contends that under this contract there was a completed sale of the five automobiles to the defendant, and that, the defendant having failed to take and pay for four of the cars, it became, under the contract, indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $400 as liquidated damages. The defendant contends that the stipulation in the contract that the plaintiff should be allowed to retain the $400 in case of a breach by the defendant, while denominated "liquidated damages" in the contract, was really in the nature of a penalty; that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover only the actual damages which it had sustained, and that there was no proof of any such damages. The defendant further contends that, even if this provision in the contract is valid and enforceable, nevertheless it had a right, under the express terms of the contract, to dissolve it by giving notice to the plaintiff, and that the stipulation giving the right of dissolution applied to the whole contract, both that part of it which created an agency to sell automobiles and that part in which the defendant had agreed to take and pay for five automobiles.

In our opinion the contract was an entire one. The plaintiff appointed the defendant its agent to sell automobiles in a specified territory. It was expected that the defendant would be able to place at least five of the cars, and a preliminary order for this number of cars was given. Taking the whole contract together, a fair construction of it is that, if the defendant ascertained that it would be unable to place the plaintiff's cars in the territory mentioned in the contract, it would have a right to dissolve and cancel the entire contract. In other words, the order for the cars was inseparably connected with the agency of the defendant. If the agency was dissolved or ceased to exist by any act on the part of either the plaintiff or the defendant, under the contract the plaintiff was under no obligation to furnish the cars, and the defendant was under no obligation to take them. The defendant was not buying the cars under this contract for its own use. That was well understood by both parties. But the cars were ordered for the purpose of being resold at retail, and the only fair interpretation which can be given to the contract is that if the defendant could not resell these cars, and could not create a market for them in Fulton county, Ga., it would have the right to notify the plaintiff to this effect, and thereupon the contract would cease, and the defendant would be under no further obligation to take any cars under the terms of the contract.

The stipulation giving the defendant the right to cancel the contract was inserted therein for the defendant's benefit, and the evident purpose of it was to guard against loss to the defendant by reason of its inability to create a market for the plaintiff's cars and to resell cars which it had ordered under the contract. Unless the contract be given this construction, the result would be that, although it was well known and well understood between the parties that the defendant did not desire the cars for its own use, yet if it failed to sell the cars it would be bound to take and pay for them, though they would be practically worthless to the defendant for the purpose for which they were ordered. Again, if the stipulation as to cancellation applied only to that part of the contract which created the agency, then the result would be that the defendant would be no longer the plaintiff's agent, and authorized to sell its cars in Fulton county, yet it would have on hand five cars which it had been unable to dispose of as the contract contemplated would be done. There is nothing in the contract which shows that the parties intended that the stipulation in reference to the notice of cancellation should apply only to one portion of the contract, and, being an entire one, there is no reason for holding that upon notice given the whole contract was not dissolved—the part relating to the purchase of machines described in the contract, as well as the agency for the sale of machines in the future.

This being, in our opinion, the proper construction to be given the contract, it is unnecessary to determine the question whether the stipulation relating to the retention of the $400 as liquidated damages is enforceable. The whole contract having been dissolved, the plaintiff was bound to return to the defendant the $400 held on deposit as part payment on the cars which were not shipped out.

[2] 2. It appears, from the correspondence and testimony of witnesses, that after the execution of the contract the defendant desired the services of an expert salesman for the cars manufactured by the plaintiff. The defendant wrote to the plaintiff, asking that such a salesman be sent to Atlanta, and agreeing to pay the salesman $25 a week for his services. It appears from the evidence that for convenience an arrangement was made whereby the salesman was to be paid by the plaintiff, and the defendant was to reimburse the plaintiff for the amount so expended. The salesman came, and remained in Atlanta for three weeks; but his services were unsatisfactory. According to the testimony for the defendant, he was intoxicated a part of the time, and refused to sell cars in the defendant's territory, but claimed the right to go outside of this territory and solicit orders for cars. The salesman did not arrive promptly upon the date on which he was to have reached Atlanta, under the terms of the agreement between defendant and plaintiff. It is undisputed that the defendant did not notify the plaintiff that the services of the agent were unsatisfactory, but allowed the salesman to remain in Atlanta for a period of three weeks, knowing at the time that he was being paid $25 a week by the plaintiff, and that it expected to be reimbursed this sum by the defendant. Under the circumstances it was clearly the duty of the defendant to notify the plaintiff promptly that the services of the salesman were unsatisfactory and that the defendant would not pay for the same. If the contract had been made directly with the salesman, the case would have been altogether different. The grossly negligent and improper and insubordinate conduct of the salesman, as shown by the testimony of the defendant's witnesses, was such as to have clearly justified its refusal to pay the salesman anything. But, in view of the fact that the defendant knew that the plaintiff was to pay the salesman and look to the defendant for reimbursement, it was clearly the duty of the defendant to have notified the plaintiff not to pay the salesman. In the absence of such notice, the plaintiff had a right to assume that the services of the salesman were satisfactory, and, under the undisputed evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the $75 paid the salesman under the agreement with the defendant.

The defendant having recovered a verdict for $109.23, besides interest, direction is given that the sum of $75, together with interest thereon from April 17, 1908, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, be written off from the verdict and judgment, that the costs of this writ of error be taxed against the defendant in error, and that the judgment of the court below, overruling the motion for a new trial, be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

SHEPPARD v. JOHNSON. (No. 4,148.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

HIGHWAYS (§§ 172, 184*)—NEGLIGENCE—AUTOMOBILES.

In view of the provisions of section 4 of the act approved August 13, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 91), regulating the use of automobiles, it is negligence per se to operate an automobile along one of the public highways of this state from one hour after sunset to one hour before sunrise without having displayed on the front of the machine at least one white light, throwing a light at least 100 feet in the direction in which the machine is going. The evidence in the present case authorized a finding that the defendant was negligent in failing to display upon his machine such a light as that described in the act of 1910, and that this omission of duty contributed to the plaintiff's injury. The evidence also authorized a finding that the plaintiff could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence after the same became apparent to her. While the evidence preponderated in favor of the defendant upon the question of negligence, there was some evidence to authorize a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and, no errors of law having been committed, this court is without power to set aside the verdict.

Error from City Court of Sandersville; E. W. Jordan, Judge.

Action by C. T. A. Johnson against W. H. Sheppard. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The suit was for damages claimed to have been sustained as a consequence of an automobile, owned and driven by the defendant, having run into a wagon owned by the plaintiff and being driven on one of the public highways. The collision occurred about 7 o'clock at night, at a point where the highway was intersected by another public road. The allegations of negligence are: (1) That the defendant did not have any light displayed on the front of his automobile at the time of the collision; (2) that he was running at an unlawful rate of speed, to wit, 15 miles per hour or more; (3) that the defendant did not give any warning of his approach by bell, horn, gong, or other signal; (4) that the defendant was intoxicated, and was guilty of negligence in driving an automobile in that condition. Defendant answered, denying all of the allegations of negligence, and averring that he was in the exercise of all ordinary care and diligence, and that the collision between plaintiff's wagon and the automobile was unavoidable. Plaintiff recovered, and the case is here on exceptions to the judgment overruling a motion for a new trial.

Evans & Evans, of Sandersville, for plaintiff in error. Gross & Swint, of Sandersville, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The only question presented for decision is whether or not the verdict in the plaintiff's favor was supported by the evidence. There was no presumption of negligence against the defendant, and consequently the burden was on the plaintiff, not only to prove injury as alleged, but to prove that the defendant was guilty of some one or more acts of negligence set forth in the petition, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury received by the plaintiff. By the act approved August 13, 1910, it is provided that from one hour after sunset to one hour before sunrise there shall be displayed on the front of every automobile and machine of like character, while being operated on or along any of the public highways of the state, at least one white light, throwing a bright light at least 100 feet in the direction in which the machine is going, and also on the rear of each machine at least one red light, which shall effectually illuminate the number tag on the rear. The act further provides, in section 5, that no person shall operate a machine on one of the highways of this state described in the act "at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of such highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property, and upon approaching a bridge, dam, high embankment, sharp curve, descent, or crossing of intersecting highways and railroad crossings, the person operating a machine shall have it under control and operate it at a speed not greater than six miles per hour." A further provision in the act is that, on approaching pedestrians or persons operating other vehicles on the highway, the driver of the automobile "shall give reasonable warning of its approach by the use of a bell, horn, gong, or other signal, and use every reasonable precaution to insure the safety of such person or animal." Acts 1910, p. 92.

Under the provisions of this act it is negligence per se for one to drive an automobile along one of the public highways of this state without displaying at least one white light, of the character described in the act, in front of the machine. It is also negligence per se to approach a public road crossing at a speed greater than six miles per hour, or to approach any person on the highway without giving reasonable warning of the approach by the use of a bell, horn, gong, or other signal. If an automobile collide with a person on one of the public highways of this state in the nighttime, without having displayed in front of the machine such a light as is described in the act above cited, and injury result to him, he would be entitled to recover, unless he could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence after he became aware of its existence. While using a public highway at any point and at any time, whether in the daytime or nighttime, no greater speed can be used than is "reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of such highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property." The maximum rate of speed that can be used by an automobile along the public highway is not fixed by the act at any point on the highway, except when approaching a bridge, dam, high embankment, sharp curve, descent, or crossing of intersecting highways, or railroad crossing. The question as to what speed is reasonable and proper under the circumstances is a question for the jury in each case. There may be circumstances in which 25 or 30 miles an hour, or even a greater rate of speed, would not be unreasonable or improper. On the other hand, circumstances may arise where 10 miles an hour would be neither reasonable nor proper.

The great object and purpose of the act of 1910 was to require the drivers of automobiles to so handle their motors as to protect pedestrians and other persons on the highway. The act recognizes that the driver of an automobile has an equal right to the public highway with any other person, but it is provided that this right shall be exercised only in the manner and upon the terms and conditions prescribed by that act. The public highways belong to the state. The state has a right to regulate the manner in which they shall be used, and when the General Assembly prescribes certain rules and regulations which must be observed by a particular class of persons who use the highways, if damage results to another using the highway, in consequence of a failure to observe such rules and regulations, a prima facie case of liability is made out. The General Assembly, in the passage of the act of 1910, saw fit to prescribe definitely the maximum rate of speed which could be attained when approaching a public crossing or a railroad crossing on the public highway, and this rate of speed was fixed at six miles per hour. Courts are not concerned as to whether er this is the proper rate of speed to be fixed; but, under the terms of this act, whenever it appears that the driver of an automobile has approached a crossing along the public highway at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour, and a person on the highway at or on the crossing is injured, he is entitled to recover for such injury, unless it should appear either that the violation of this portion of the act was not the proximate cause of the injury, or that the person injured could have avoided the consequences of the negligence in exceeding the rate of speed fixed by the act, after he discovered such negligence. A failure to give warning upon approaching a person upon the highway, by the ringing of a bell, horn, gong, or other signal, is negligence per se, and if one going in the same direction as the automobile shall be injured, a prima facie case for recovery would be made upon proof of failure to give the statutory warning without reference to the rate of speed at which the machine is being driven.

The question, therefore, is whether, in view of the provisions of this act of the General Assembly, the plaintiff made out a case which entitled her to recover. In considering this question it must be borne in mind that, so far as this court is concerned, the jury settles absolutely all disputed issues of fact. If one witness testifies to a single fact which supports the verdict, this court has no power to interfere, unless an error of law has been committed, even though a hundred witnesses testify to a contrary state of facts. The plaintiff testified that she was driving along the public highway at or very near a public road crossing near the town of Tennesse, at a place where an electric light was shining brightly; that she did not hear any signal from the automobile; that when the machine struck the wagon it knocked the wagon round in the road and broke the wagon, and knocked down the mule hitched to it, threw the plaintiff down in the wagon, and injured her in the back and side and head, breaking the coupling pole attached to the wagon. When first on the stand the plaintiff testified that the lights on the automobile were burning, but when recalled at a later stage of the trial she testified as follows: "There was but one light on Mr. Sheppard's machine at the time of the accident, and it was so dim that it appeared to be several hundred yards from us when I first saw it, and actually ran into us before we knew it was anyways close to us. It ran into us almost simultaneously with my seeing it, and was actually into us before I realized how close they were on us." The defendant himself, while denying that he was running at an excessive rate of speed, and averring that his automobile had proper lights displayed in front of it, testified that when he saw the plaintiff he gave a signal of his approach, sounding the horn, and that when he saw the wagon he was running about 6 miles an hour. He further testified that his machine was in "intermediate" gear, and that in that gear it was impossible to run his car up the grade at that point on the highway at a greater speed than 10 miles an hour. There was no evidence to support the allegation that the defendant was intoxicated. The act of intoxication would not be, in and of itself, such negligence as to authorize recovery. It might be pleaded and proved by way of inducement, for the purpose of illustrating the negligent conduct alleged against the defendant; but if one, even though intoxicated, should drive his machine in a proper manner and observe the rules and regulations prescribed by the act of 1910, an injury inflicted by his machine would not render him liable merely because he may have been under the influence of intoxicants at the time the injury occurred.

In the present case the preponderance of evidence was in favor of the defendant, and tended to disprove every allegation of negligence set forth in the petition; but, without reference to other allegations of negligence, there was some evidence to support the averment that the defendant did not have displayed on his automobile such a light as is described in the act of 1910, and the jury were authorized to find that this omission contributed to the injury sustained by the plaintiff. An effort was made to impeach the plaintiff by evidence of contradictory statements previously made; but it was exclusively a question for the jury as to whether they would believe the plaintiff, notwithstanding she was thus contradicted, or would credit the testimony of the witnesses brought to impeach her. Where there is any evidence, or any legitimate inference deducible from any evidence, which, under any theory of law, will support a verdict returned by the jury, this court has no power to interfere, unless some material error of law has been committed.

No such error having been committed in the present case, it follows that the judgment overruling the motion for new trial must be affirmed.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

J. Grusin was convicted of violating the prohibition law, and brings error. Affirmed.

Isaac S. Peebles, Jr., for plaintiff in error. J. C. O. Black, Sol., and John M. Graham, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Grusin was convicted under an accusation charging him with having violated the prohibition law by selling intoxicating liquors, and by keeping such liquors on hand at his place of business. He excepts to the refusal of a new trial.

As to the general grounds of the motion for a new trial, it is sufficient to say that there was proof that on the day alleged in the accusation a policeman, who searched the grocery store and adjoining "near beer" saloon of the accused, found in both places a large quantity of whisky in bottles, enough to make a wagon load, and that the accused begged him not to take it all, but to take "just enough to make out a good case," and that others testified to both the keeping and the frequent selling of intoxicating liquors by the accused at his place of business.
